Such action does not depend upon intimidation; it depends upon establishing a right that can be enforced either by the police or through the courts. I have identified the two remedies—the action in trespass and the powers to remove under section 39 of the Public Order Act—to highlight the problems in this instance. To use those remedies it is necessary to identify the owners of the land and to obtain their concurrence to the necessary action upon which everything else depends.

I believe that the situation may be more promising than my hon. Friends believe. My understanding is that there is one owner of the land who owns a great majority of the land affected at Waldens farm. I understand that that person has instructed a solicitor to take proceedings in the High Court. I am further told that that person has secured the consent of the great majority of the other owners of the land who have now been identified. The majority landowner is thus able to go to the High Court on behalf of himself and of the great majority of the other landowners.

If that is correct, I believe that the cause of action is complete. Clearly it would be wrong for the House or, indeed, a Minister, especially a junior Minister, to prejudge in any way the likely decision of the court. However, on those facts it would seem to me that there is a good prospect of a High Court judge making the injunction that my hon. Friend has in mind. Therefore, ordinary civil remedies may now apply in this case because the majority landowner has the consent of the other occupants.

A different situation will obviously arise if the High Court declines to make an order of the kind that we have been discussing. The question that then arises is whether the police would be entitled to act under section 39 of the Public Order Act.

It being Ten o'clock, the Motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Durant.]

Mr. Hogg: The decision whether to invoke the powers under section 39 of the 1986 Act is a matter for the police. Again, it would be wrong for a Minister of the Crown to seek in any way to influence the police officers' decision because it is an operational matter. My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington will appreciate as much as I do that Ministers have no jurisdiction in that respect.

Let us assume that the High Court declines to make an order in a civil action. Provided that the owners, by some collective action, can make it plain to trespassers that they, the trespassers, should leave—they can do that either individually or collectively——

Miss Widdecombe indicated dissent.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) is making a face. It can be done by a solicitor, an association — they can set up an association — or it can be done in a variety of other ways. The owners must make it plain to the trespassers that the trespassers must leave. Provided that the police are satisfied that the other criteria set out in section 39 are fulfilled, they may decide to invoke the powers provided in section 39.

Miss Widdecombe: As my hon. Friend has said, although there is a remedy by giving notice to itinerants and having it effected by the police, the fact remains that serving the original is up to individuals. Whether it is an individual landowner — in my constituency, we are talking about individuals, not multiple ownership — or his or her solicitor, the fact remains that it is an individual against 30 itinerant occupants, who are not necessarily at that point under the observation of law-keeping bodies such as the police. They must face such people and serve the original notice before the forces of law and order are brought in. Has my hon. Friend taken on board the effects of intimidation? What remedy does a single landowner have against itinerants?

Mr. Hogg: I have contemplated the difficulties that can arise. My hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone must look at it from the point of view that it is obviously a necessary condition to the powers under section 39 of the Act that the landowner wishes the trespasser to leave. After all, some landowners might not care much one way or the other.

Miss Widdecombe rose——

Mr. Hogg: I shall finish my comments in this respect and then I shall give way.

Some landowners might be content to let trespassers remain on the site. Therefore, it is right in principle and in practice that the powers under section 39, which constitute a criminal offence, should arise only in circumstances in which a landowner wishes a trespasser to leave. That is a necessary precondition.

The next question is this: what obligations are imposed upon a landowner to make apparent to the trespasser the requirement to leave? The answer to that is that it varies in accordance with the facts. There is no need to serve a formal notice. If one does not want to talk to such fellows in the field, one can get a bull horn, put it to one's mouth and say, "Get off my land." That is quite sufficient to require people to leave. For example, there is no need to go up to Mr. Speaker, shake his hand and say, "Mr. Speaker, I want you out of here." It is quite sufficient to stand at the Dispatch Box and say, "Mr. Speaker, I want you to leave." The communication of the notice depends upon the facts. If my hon. Friend's constituents are alarmed about this, I suggest a bull horn, and I am not being frivolous.

Mr. Stanbrook: Let me bring the debate back to the issue in my constituency and point out the difficulties of proceeding by way of civil action. We are talking about one third of Waldens farm—25 acres out of 75—which is occupied in this way. Some 120 landowners are concerned, and by dint of great effort and great expenditure by the local people, including, as my hon. Friend has said, one in particular, there will be a civil action in the High Court to get rid of these people. What happens if the people concerned then move on to the other 50 acres where there are another 600 or 700 owners? Who will ask every one of them to finance a court action? The practical difficulties of civil actions are such that they are quite beyond private individuals to take action and we should not expect that of them. It should be a matter for the Home Office and enforcement of the Public Order Act.

Mr. Hogg: It is not a matter for the Home Office in any circumstances. One must go either through the civil courts, which is not a matter for the Home Office, or through the police, which is not a matter for the Home Office. The Home Office is not directly involved.

My hon. Friend is making a serious point. He is asking why we should use the civil remedy of an injunction. There is an advantage in using an injunction, as my hon. Friend will appreciate, which is that the injunction is permanent in character as it applies to the relevant piece of land, whereas the relief under section 39 is not permanent in character. My hon. Friend is asking what happens if either in civil proceedings the injunction is made, or under section 39 an order is made, and the trespassers leave the piece of land affected either by the order or the injunction and go elsewhere.

That is a fair point, and I am afraid that the position will then be as it now is. Once again, the two remedies will have to be invoked. This is inevitable for this reason. It would be wrong in principle to give anyone the power to move people from private land unless it were obvious and clear that the owners of the land on which the people were squatting, if that is the appropriate word, wanted them to leave.

My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington may say, "Of course the landowners want the hippies to leave." However, we cannot be certain of that. The law cannot presume that. The powers under section 39, or the relief available in a civil suit, must always depend upon the determination and desire of the landowners in question to assert their rights. That is an essential difficulty that flows necessarily from our respect for property.

I have tried to consider whether there might be any way around this by taking indirect action. I have considered the Orpington Urban District Council Act and I suggest that my hon. Friend considers that as well. Bromley borough council has some powers under that Act that might be valuable in this instance. However, one again encounters the problem of the would-be trespassers moving from one site to another. I have also considered whether there is a breach of planning regulations and whether enforcement notices could be taken. The best advice that I have had is that that would not be a useful way forward. The same is true of the Caravan Sites Act 1968, which I have also considered.

Two remedies are available—one is the civil suit for an injunction and damages, and that is going forward. If that fails it may be—that is a matter for them—that the police will decide that they are in a position to invoke section 39.

No one could put the case more clearly than my hon. Friend has done, and he has been extremely ably supported by our hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone. I have not had the privilege of hearing her speak in the Chamber before, and I welcome her to it. Perhaps the civil suit will provide a remedy; I very much hope that it will.

Mr. Stanbrook: A very unsatisfactory remedy.

Mr. Hogg: I understand my hon. Friend's point, but he must also bear in mind that we have a system of law that depends on proprietorial rights and not the exercise of coercive powers in respect of private property, unless it is clear that the owners of that private property want those coercive powers to be exercised. Personally, I believe that that is what the law should be.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at ten minutes past Ten o'clock.

Manufacturing and Competition

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

9.35 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): In the summer of 1984, the Department of Trade and Industry sponsored a study mission to Hong Kong, Japan and the west coast of the United States. The members were a broadly based group representing management, banking, purchasing, trade unions, media and Government interests and their aim was to find out why companies in the countries that they were visiting were often out-performing British companies. All of them returned alarmed at the strength of the competition and challenged by what they had seen and heard.

Towards the end of the visit to Japan, they had an opportunity to talk informally to their hosts. They asked why Japanese companies had thrown open their factories, talked frankly to them about their techniques and shown them the secrets of their success. The answer was devastating. They were told by the Japanese, "Because it would take you 10 years to get where we are now and by that time we shall be even further ahead. And besides, we know you won't do it." I emphasise those last words. The Government have recognised that challenge. It is a challenge that many companies are responding to and it is a continuing challenge to us all in the future because, as those mission members were told, the competition is not standing still. However, that challenge also presents the way to tremendous opportunities and it can and is being met, as I will explain to the House in a moment.

Before outlining the ways in which we are rising to the challenges and opportunities, it is important to understand that the efforts of companies have been greatly assisted by the Government's achievements in improving the whole economic climate in which British business operates. While I would not wish to dwell unduly on the general issues that would normally come under the heading of "getting the climate right", I think that it would be appropriate to record here the progress of the British economy during a period in which we have been facing these major challenges from our overseas competitors.

The economy has just entered its seventh successive year of growth at an average annual growth rate so far of 2·5 to 3 per cent. Since 1980, our economy has grown faster than those of all the other major European Community countries. The outlook, which is good, is for continued growth. In recent years, productivity growth in the manufacturing sector has been the highest of the major industrialised countries. Reflecting that improvement, the rate of increase in unit wage and salary costs has eased. Our unit labour costs have, however, tended to rise more rapidly than those in the United States, Germany and Japan, but the gap has recently been narrowing and over most of last year may have risen as slowly as, or even more slowly than, in Japan and Germany. The United Kingdom's international cost competitiveness improved by 4 per cent. in 1986. Inflation has been brought under control and profitability has grown almost continuously from 1980 onwards. All these positive aspects clearly demonstrate how much has been achieved.

Compared with the first year or two of this decade, the problems facing industrialists have significantly reduced, providing a better climate in which they can meet the challenges and opportunities with growing confidence and renewed vigour. It is not an exaggeration to say that the opportunities for British industrialists, British industry and commerce have never been so good for a long time. If we can maintain the current trends well into the 1990s, talk of a British economic miracle during that period will not be an exaggeration.

All sectors are, of course, important to economic growth, but manufacturing in particular will need to play a dominant role over the coming years. Manufacturing is clearly more intensively traded than services — about four times more — and will continue so for the foreseeable future. Because of manufacturing's higher trade intensity, and because of the current dominance of manufacturers both in the United Kingdom's non-oil trade flows and in world trade, we shall need to look to manufacturing to contribute a major part to the United Kingdom's successful adjustment to the falling oil trade surplus. I am glad to say that it is doing so.

I am pleased to report that there is a good story to tell on the improving performance of our manufacturing sector. The figures on the improvement in performance of this sector show that output has grown by 16 per cent. from its trough in early 1981. It is forecast to grow by 4 per cent. this year, faster than the rest of the economy, and faster than in any year since 1973. Manufacturing productivity is 43 per cent. higher than in late 1980 and 34 per cent. higher than in 1979. Moreover, since 1979 our growth in manufacturing productivity has surpassed that of our major competitiors, including Japan. The trend of our falling share of world trade has stopped and the situation is now much more encouraging. For example, in the three months to April, our exports of manufactures, excluding erratic items, were up 10 per cent. in volume on the corresponding period of 1986, and imports were up 6·5 per cent. So we now have a major opportunity to reconquer domestic markets and increase our penetration of world markets.

I am aware that Her Majesty's Opposition like to make the comparison between 1979 levels of output and those of today, but it would be more helpful to establishing a constructive and analytical debate if they were to recognise occasionally the depth of the international recession, which was the worst in 50 years, and the reasons why our economy went into that recession with fundamental weaknesses compared wth some of our competitors.

Our improving performance has been helped too by the improvements in quality design and reliability that have restored the reputation of many famous British names, of which quality is the centre of our attention today.

Before I turn to today's topic in detail, I shall pause only to record that the performance measure which encompasses all these elements — manufacturing profitability — reached its highest level since 1973 in 1985, and when the figures are available should show a further gain for 1986.

The opportunities and challenges to which I referred earlier are regaining lost markets and obtaining a share of new markets. Those opportunities start with carefully identifying what the market has to offer, lead on to market research studies and then into project planning to meet the needs of potential customers.

No stone must be left unturned in those vital stages, and only when completely satisfied that the market and customer requirement has been identified is it sensible to move to the important design phase, then to production planning, purchasing, production and selling according to the requirements and expectations of likely customers. But the process does not end there — there is after-sales follow-up feedback of customer experience and amendments to the entire manufacturing cycle in relation to that feedback, and then the process starts again In short, these are all the non-price factors that are critical to companies if they are to succeed.

For example, a study in the early 1980s estimated that non-price factors accounted for about 45 per cent. of British export behaviour. They are the vital elements that will contribute to an industrial renaissance. The opportunities are there for all in their respective fields, but only by taking account of these vital non-price factors will companies be successful and be able to build on that success, maintaining existing and creating new jobs and reasserting our reputation, making sure that all those involved in the product or providing the service can genuinely be proud of the label "Made in Britain". The firms and countries that are doing best are those that are offering their customers the best value for money and competitive value for money, and competitive value for money comes from competitive quality at a competitive price.

By quality we are talking about satisfying customers and meeting their needs and expectations so that they come back to buy companies' products again and again. The issue can be encapsulated by describing it as being about selling products that do not come back to customers that do. Customers are becoming increasingly discerning, and as world competition increases the choice open to them is also increasing. They know the real costs of poor materials and unsatisfactory performance, and while increasingly price may be negotiable, quality is not. The leading companies worldwide have recognised this and have benefited accordingly from improved efficiency and reduced waste and not from increased sales.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): Does the Minister accept that in many sectors of manufacturing industry—I worked in manufacturing industry before being elected to this place in 1983 — there was a period when management and supervision were more concerned about the number of products finding their way to the end of the production line than about the quality of the product? That attitude is changing in manufacturing industry, but if management and supervision are not concerned about quality, the work force will take the same view. I accept the Minister's argument that quality is important, but will he accept that improvements are being made and that it is important that attitudes change from the top of management through supervision to the work force?

Mr. Butcher: I am delighted to welcome the hon. Gentleman's presence in the Chamber and his participation in the debate. I agree that in the 1960s and 1970s, an obsession with volume for volume's sake in many badly managed industries became extremely expensive. The rectification of faults halfway down, three quarters down and all the way down the production process cost companies a great deal of money. Post facto quality procedures are no longer the method by which we tackle the problem. I shall deal with the hon. Gentleman's question in greater detail later.

Towards the end of the 1970s, a number of studies highlighted the need for industry to take greater account of non-price factors if it was to succeed. These were factors such as good design, technological innovation, prompt delivery and reliability—in short, quality. An estimate at the time suggested—this goes some way to dealing with the intervention of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) — that mismanagement of quality was costing British companies about £10 billion per annum. These are the costs of failure — costs such as rejects, reworking, scrap, customer complaints and warranty costs leading to loss of customer confidence and orders.

More recent estimates suggest that the costs of quality mismanagement are frequently between 10 per cent. and 15 per cent. of turnover, and can be much higher. Too often these costs remain unidentified or accepted as inevitable, but this need not be so. The British companies that are paying attention to quality are showing by their example that there is a remedy, that something can be done about it, and that paying attention to quality does not cost money. Indeed, it is far more likely to release resources for use elsewhere in business, and increase profitability. Companies such as IBM, which chose to produce the personal computer at Greenock in Scotland because it could get the best job done there, and Philips UK, which won eight of the Philips 1986 quality awards, are but two examples of international companies whose United Kingdom subsidiaries were able to match and beat the performance of other subsidiaries in the same group.

But it is not only multinationals which are doing well from their bases in Britain. British companies such as Marks and Spencer and Rolls-Royce are well known for the quality of their products.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): The announcement today about the sale of the RB211 engine to Qantas in Australia seems to prove the company's ability to repeat the fulfilment of customer requirements at quality level. That is why the company managed to get the repeat order.

Mr. Butcher: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I am sure that the whole House will wish to join him in his congratulation of the company on having built on a very successful product. While, as he rightly reminded us, that success is based on the reputation of Rolls-Royce for quality, the entire aerospace industry is now enjoying a rate of market penetration that is historically of the highest order, and I believe that the British aerospace industry in general has an excellent future.

J. C. Bamford has won a British quality award for outstanding achievements in the quality of product design and for the implementation of new and imaginative quality methods. Last, but certainly not least, Jaguar has made quality the prime selling point in its return to success.

It is not the size of the company that determines whether or not such an approach can succeed, because the same applies to smaller companies. It is a question of attitudes stemming from clear commitments from all employees, starting at the top, to meet customer needs. The Government's role, as with so many other policies in the Department of Trade and Industry, is to recognise best practice and to use, where necessary, third parties to try to disseminate that best practice—as recognised by our customers — across whole tranches of industry and commerce.

The 1982 White Paper "Standards, Quality and International Competitiveness" spelt out Government policy on the role of quality and standards in improving our international competitiveness. It laid the foundation for a range of developments designed to improve the quality of British goods and services, and to help Britain to retain a competitive position in domestic and world markets. A great deal has happened since then. In October last year my Department published "Quality Counts", which sets out what has been done so far to help and raise the quality and reputation of British goods. Copies are available in the Library. "Quality Counts" highlights the central role of quality in improving company competitiveness, and describes the steps the Government have taken to encourage the adoption of a total quality approach throughout industry and commerce. Those steps include the activities of the national quality campaign; to underpin and demonstrate quality achievement, the progress in encouraging the growth of a network of organisations that carry out assessment work, and the formation of the National Accreditation Council; the ways in which the Government have sought to improve their collaboration with industry and standards-making to improve the standards-making process; international developments; the role of Government as a purchaser and regulator of the market; and the contribution that standards and quality can make in promoting new technologies.

I would like now to highlight some of the activities of the quality campaign, in relation particularly to some of the more recent developments. In 1983, the campaign was launched to promote the importance of quality as a means of securing success in the market place, as well as making the running of a company more efficient, and improving profitability by eliminating waste of materials and effort. The campaign seeks to promote the "total" or "companywide" approach to quality management. This involves everyone in an organisation contributing to the improvement process, in ensuring the quality of whatever he or she does. In every job the need is to meet the customer's requirements by getting it "right first time every time".

Under the umbrella of the campaign, the Department of Trade and Industry has produced, often in conjunction with others, a wide range of audio-visual and written material reflecting as far as possible the experience of United Kingdom organisations and individuals, thereby letting others know that quality leads to success. The material is available free of charge to companies and organisations interested in adopting a quality approach.

The quality message has already been spread to a large number of British companies, and has been acted on by many. Following the initial advertising campaign and an extensive series of seminars and conferences throughout the country, the quality campaign is now concentrating on encouraging the quality approach by means of activity programmes with sectors of industry, on a regional basis and with individual companies taking the quality message to their suppliers and subcontractors. Eighteen of these activity programmes have been launched so far, and others are at the planning stage. In all, it is estimated that well over 50,000 companies have been contacted directly by the campaign through this and other work.

However, the significance of the campaign is not just the effort of the Department, but the work of all those organisations and companies that support the campaign's aims and objectives, and the work that it does — the institutes and societies, the CBI and TUC, the trade associations, companies and individuals, all working in the cause of quality.

As an important step towards the "total" approach, the campaign has also been promoting the benefits of effective management systems. The traditional way of manufacturing quality products has been to inspect goods after they are made, and to reject or rectify the defective ones. It is an expensive method, because faulty goods are not detected until time, effort and money have been invested in producing them. As I mentioned earlier, it can frequently cost 10 to 15 per cent. of turnover. A much more effective approach is to introduce a system that effectively plans, implements and monitors the process of manufacturing quality products or providing quality services throughout the product or service cycle, and encourages the entire work force to become totally committed to that process. Such a system must function logically and accurately, and must apply to every activity from marketing, design and the purchase of raw materials and components, through manufacture, to the delivery of the finished product or service.

Effective quality management generates procedures that can be used both to verify quality, and to provide information that will allow supervision, maintenance and improved management of the system. In the end, it reduces the need for inspection. It is essentially a system of prevention rather than cure. It is therefore also cost-effective, and not a financial burden.

The United Kingdom has a national standard for quality systems — BS5750. This standard has gained worldwide acceptance through the International Standards Organisation as the basis of the ISO 9000 series and, in its 1987 form, has identical wording.

As part of the campaign the Government provide assistance to small companies to help them to adopt more effective management systems. Since 1983, our business and technical advisory service on quality has committed over £12 million to enable independent companies, or groups with fewer than 500 employees, to employ consultants to give advice on how to introduce quality management systems. To date, over 3,400 companies have received assistance through the scheme.

As I said, encouraging the use of more effective management systems tuned to meet customer requirements helps companies to operate more efficiently. They can save money at the same time as raising the quality of their products or services.

To assist the marketing of products and services supplied by quality conscious organisations requires an objective means of clearly demonstrating their achievements. Independent impartial assessment can provide such a mechanism. It ensures that the quality management system of a company is in line with modern practice meeting the national quality standard and gives the customer greater confidence in the competence of the company. Assessment of products to a recognised standard in addition to assessment of management systems does, of course, give added assurance of conformity to the required standard. This involves independent testing in accredited laboratories and is frequently used when products have to conform to health and safety requirements.

Many sectors of United Kingdom industry are now developing schemes to enable them to demonstrate their commitment to quality and customer satisfaction. The Government have been helping by providing financial support — matching industries' contribution to the development of the schemes in their initial stages of development. So far we have helped to establish seven new organisations, and my Department is discussing similar initiatives with a number of other bodies intending to add to the network of independent assessment schemes gradually spreading to serve the entire spectrum of industrial activity.

However, the growing demand by industry for independent assessment and testing and the consequent growth in the number of organisations offering these services has required the development of a system to monitor the competence of those organisations so that purchasers can rely on test results and certificates and have confidence that the job has been done properly.

To build up this confidence, the Government launched in 1985 the National Accreditation Council for Certification Bodies, a representative group which advises my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on the granting of accreditation for schemes assessed by the council. To date, five bodies have been accredited and applications from a number of other organisations are currently being processed. We have also established the national measurement accreditation service, which assesses and monitors the competence of test and calibration laboratories. NAMAS has been operating for rather longer than NACCB and to date has accredited over 500 laboratories.

I shall now briefly speak about the importance of good standards and the role of Government. The 1982 White Paper stressed the need for Government to be more closely involved in standards making and the booklet "Quality Counts" explains how this is being achieved. There has been a growing collaboration with the British Standards Institution in its work and in helping to set strategic aims. The key aim is to make British standards more relevant to the needs of industry and commerce, thereby helping to improve industrial competitiveness.

Particularly important is the use made by Government of such standards in regulatory and purchasing activities, and a priority has been identification of areas where strong standards are needed by key industries for their development. The Government also help standards experts to play a full part in international work so that British interests are fully represented.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): Is not one of the main problems about the BSI its snail-like pace? Those of us who have served on its sub-committees know only too well that years can go by before quality standards come out. Is my hon. Friend's Department trying to instil any sense of urgency into the BSI?

Mr. Butcher: My hon. Friend will know that the standards-making process can be a particularly excruciating exercise. Of its nature, it requires consensus by quite a large number of participants. Over the years, I have wrestled with the problem that my hon. Friend has described vividly, and where possible we have, for example, recommended that these groups confine themselves purely to core standards. For example, looking outside the issue my hon. Friend raised, in telecommunications we feel that we should consolidate minimum standards to guarantee the integrity of the network rather than try to write in all sorts of individual features — gold-plated standards as they are called.

My hon. Friend has made a serious point. I know that the BSI is aware that sometimes a delayed standard is one that may never fulfil its purpose. I hope to deal with this in my remarks towards the end of the debate. I shall deal with the domestic and international dimensions of the point that my hon. Friend has raised.

The comments made to our mission in Japan back in 1984 provided a further spur to the challenge facing British companies in world markets, as competition has intensified—a challenge to which industry is responding. Much progress has been made in many sectors and the quality of British goods has benefited accordingly. It is a challenge which will not go away and while much has been achieved more needs to be done. More companies need to take the quality approach to their operations to improve their efficiency and effectiveness in order to satisfy their customers. Whatever their improvements and achievements in quality, they cannot relax. Continuous quality improvement has to be their way of life. Help and advice are available from many sources but in the final analysis it is a matter which companies have to tackle themselves since it is all about the way they organise, operate, and manage their businesses and about the role of every employee.

The customer has to be satisfied. If companies consistently strive to improve their quality and take a "companywide" or "total" approach, they are far more likely to adopt the attitudes and reflexes necessary for customer satisfaction to make a real and sustained success of their operations.

I repeat the title of the brochure—quality does count, and it means the generation of British jobs.

10.7 am

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I came to this Bench 32 minutes ago intent on making an objective, non-controversial and, I hoped, constructive contribution to debate that I regard as of considerable importance to British industry. I even tried, with dedication, to listen to the last 30 minutes as the Minister droned on. However, the first two minutes cannot be allowed to pass without an answer. The Minister spoke of an economic miracle, a ministerial mirage that he has discovered to start this debate. I assume that he is talking about the current short-term trend, the mini pre-election boomlet that we have been through before and which is based on the abandonment of public expenditure controls in the two immediate pre-election Budgets—controls which will no doubt be rediscovered subsequently. The boomlet is based on the devaluation of sterling by 30 per cent. against the deutschmark, the very devaluation policy that the Government denounced as irresponsible in the 1983 election when the Opposition and the TUC pointed out that that was what was necessary to stimulate exports and domestic sales.

Most importantly, the pre-election boomlet is based on a quite cynical consumer boom, a debt-inspired boom from a Prime Minister who spent the previous eight years condemning anyone who ever talked about credit and borrowing as being irresponsible and not running their affairs as a proper housewife or shopkeeper would do. The Minister will not remember—I do not mean that in any disparaging sense, as it is a sign of my on-coming geriatric status — that we have been through it all before. He might be interested to see how well-founded his economic miracle is.

Mr. Butcher rose——

Mr. Williams: No. The hon. Gentleman had 32 minutes to make his point, so he must let me make mine.

The Minister might at least bear in mind the fact that in October 1958 the Macmillan Government removed all controls on hire purchase and we then had the first credit boom of the post-war period. Coincidentally, that happened only 12 months before a general election. Of course, that was a coincidence and it was equally a coincidence that during those 12 months the sale of cars increased by 30 per cent. and the sale of domestic electrical appliances increased by 20 per cent. We went into the "Never had it so good" election of 1959 that resulted in a majority of 100 for Macmillan. All that was based on the credit boom that had been generated a year earlier by the removal of hire purchase controls.

The sad corollary of that is that by some other strange and, I am sure, utterly non-political coincidence, when the balance of payments crisis hit just after the election, six months later in March 1960, Lord Macmillan had to reinstitute all the credit controls. The boomlet and the economic miracle were over.

Mr. Butcher rose——

Mr. Tom Sackville (Bolton, West) rose——

Mr. Williams: Perhaps the hon. Gentlemen should form a queue if you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, think that that would be appropriate. I think that the Minister should be number one and the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) should be number two. Perhaps I should issue little pieces of paper.

Mr. Butcher: I am grateful for the right hon. Gentleman's courtesy in giving way so early in his speech. I am sure that he will agree that we should get our database right before we proceed into the meat of the debate. Would he not agree that if he examined the record of an economist called Euchen in conjunction with that of a Chancellor called Erhardt, he might find that the preconditions that were set up by those two gentlemen for a German economic miracle in the period 1949-54 were similar to what happened in this country between 1982 and 1986? Unlike previous occasions in the British economy, that was not an unsoundly founded recovery; it was real growth. Provided that international conditions do not work against us and we can continue the current trend —I agree that I use the words "current trend"—into the 1990s, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it would not be an exaggeration to say that that is an industrial renaissance?

Mr. Williams: For the first time today, the Minister sounds as though he believes what he is saying, which is rather sad because it means the disillusionment will be greater when it comes. As for his point about a renaissance, I intend to comment on that as my next point arising out of his earlier comments. [Interruption.] I believe that the queue may be showing signs of temper and perhaps I should allow the hon. Member for Bolton, West to make his point.

Mr. Sackville: We have now spent another seven minutes on some sort of rhetoric about differing views on the economy. We shall be interested to hear the right hon. Gentleman's views on this debate, which is about quality in industry.

Mr. Williams: I am sure the hon. Gentleman will be interested in my views because they will be well worth listening to and I intend to make them. However, I must advise the hon. Gentleman that it was his Minister who chose to open up side turnings that had nothing to do with this debate. Perhaps the Minister will confirm that earlier this week I advised him that I intended to come to this debate to make what I hope will be a constructive contribution on the main subject. It is not my fault if the Minister has forgotten that he still has his election notes in his pocket instead of his departmental brief. In fact, it was the Minister who challenged me.

You can see, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that it is hard for someone like me who likes to please people and to make them happy, because on the one hand the Minister says that he wants me to deal with the question of renaissance, but on the other hand his hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West, says that he does not want me to deal with that and, even more, he wishes that I had not dealt with the points that I have already made. Is it not difficult, Sir, to please everyone in such circumstances? With respect to the hon. Member for Bolton, West, this is a circumstance in which seniority must be given its opportunity. I shall therefore pay some attention to the Minister's request.

In his intervention the Minister said that we must get our database correct. However, when one considers the beginning of the Minister's speech it is interesting to note that he chose his database carefully as 1980-81. In Stalin's era in the Soviet Union when someone was disgraced, say Beria, all traces of that person would be eliminated. He would be removed from all reference books. Obviously the visit to Mr. Gorbachev did the Prime Minister some good and she appears to have returned thinking "If the Russians do it, why can't we? However, instead of getting rid of people, we shall get rid of a year." The year 1979-80 does not exist in Conservative history because all Conservative history starts with 1981. Unfortunately—it is a sad fact for the country — the history of this Conservative Administration started in 1979. However, one would not think that when one hears the statistics that are quoted. Despite the Minister's talk about growth, it is a fact that manufacturing growth in this economic miracle is still below its level in 1979 and is still down on the level of the three-day week under the previous Conservative Administration in 1974.

The Minister said that the recession was the worst for 50 years. Indeed, it is, but it is a British recession that has been superimposed on the world recession because the recession was engendered by the opportunity Budget that the present Foreign Secretary announced immediately after the election. We do not need to go into details, because the facts are on record. It was the drive and the spiral down into high interest rates and high sterling generated by that irresponsible Budget that led to the 50 years of unprecedented recession to which the Minister referred.

On the balance of trade, the Minister continually forgets the fact that in his economic miracle we have not only gone into deficit in manufacturing trade for the first time ever but, his successful Government, in achieving that miracle, have turned a £5 billion surplus on manufactured trade into a £6 billion deficit. That does not look much like an economic miracle to me.

Manufacturing investment fell by 41 per cent. during the Conservatives' first year of Government. Therefore, when the Government talk about seven years of continuous growth in manufacturing investment—it is true that there have been seven years of continuous growth in investment—they are now only halfway back up the cliff over which they plunged in 1979. After seven years of Conservative growth, they are still 20 per cent. below the level of manufacturing investment that they inherited in 1979. Therefore, as I have said, the economic miracle is more a ministerial mirage than anything else.

What is surprising is that the Minister can see things that are not there, but apparently he and his Departmant have great difficulty in seeing the things that are there. After the Minister's marginally controversial opening statement that led to my corrective and calm response, he went on to describe a devastating discovery at the Department of Trade and Industry. The Department sent someone to Tokyo in 1984 and that person came back devastated, having found that the Japanese were so far ahead. Why was the Department devastated? The facts were all on record. I have an internal document from the Department of Trade and Industry which goes back to the late 1970s and early 1980s and contains a report that was delivered at an international seminar in Tokyo in 1978, which was sponsored by the Union of Japanese Scientists and Engineers. That report contains a paper that was presented by a Dr. Juran, which deals with the very points with which the Minister has been trying to deal today as if he has made a miraculous new discovery.

As far back as 1980, a Minister of Trade wrote to a Minister of Industry saying that the DTI had carried out a study of eight major companies in this country and had discovered that, although they all recognised that quality was extremely important, there was unanimity among the executives—the term used is "without exception"—that the responsibility lay with management. It stated that company boards were reported to be reluctant to accept the evidence of their large and influential customers about the importance of quality.

The Department was not unaware of that. The only thing that is astonishing is that the Minister was astonished. He was a little late in his astonishment. If only he had read the papers that were lying around gathering dust in his Department instead of being acted on, he would have known way before that wasted visit to Japan. As the Government are cost-conscious, the Minister can probably tell me how much it cost to find out what he already knew if only he had opened the right file in the Department. Reports based on the 1978 seminar in Tokyo were circulating and in 1980 the pressure in the Department was for a strategy for quality, so it is amazing that it took until 1982 to produce one White Paper and until 1986 to produce "Quality Counts". All that one can assume is that the officials have been diligently trying to explain all those things to Ministers, but it takes a little while for the Ministers to comprehend what they are being told.

I now come to the essence of the debate. If it had not been for the Minister's opening comments, there need have been no controversy. I should have thought that it was an area where there could be a consensus approach. It is not a matter of which party is in office—both parties favour higher quality. The Minister rightly quoted the figure of £10 billion. Obviously, he read the same article in Management Today that I read. The article said that, on the experience of companies that have tried it, £5 billion of that could be readily saved by industry. Industry should learn that lesson, but sadly, as internal letters between Ministers reveal, the management is not always responsive, even where there is a vague comprehension of the problem on the part of the Department and the Ministers.

Quality has two or three distinct elements. There is quality in terms of the avoidance of faults. Most of the £10 billion that the Minister and I are talking about arises from appraisal, inspection and the consequential cost of faults. In addition, there is a different aspect of quality, because it is not a static concept. It has to be a dynamic concept if industry is to remain competitive. It is no good making a snapshot attack on the problem of quality. It is no good getting up to date with one's competitors; one must stay up to date with them. Therefore, there is quality in the further sense of the upgrading of products, the continually increasing sophistication of products. One must ensure that one's products are more up-market.

There is a complication. The problem is not entirely within the control of management. By the nature of modern economic society, every manufacturer tends to be another manufacturer's supplier in one form or another. Therefore, the final product that is marketed can never be of a higher quality than its components and sub-assemblies allow it to be. The Japanese learnt that lesson and taught it to us.

We became slipshod in the quality that we demanded and expected. I remember when we talked to Hitachi about it coming into Britain, and with Matsushita and Panasonic about their use of British components. We also talked to the British component suppliers. I am sure that many of the Minister's officials will have taken part in similar discussions. British manufacturers said that the trouble with the Japanese was that they used unrealistic specifications. They set failure rates on components that were so low that they could not be achieved.

When the Department investigated, we found that, in fairness, the Japanese were imposing the same requirements in their own country on their own component suppliers. In some cases, the British moaners were meeting similar specifications in lucrative defence contracts while saying that they could not meet them in normal commercial contracts. Then we wonder why we lost the television market.

Mr. Pike: I am sure that my right hon. Friend will recall that when Hitachi was talking of coming to Britain I was part of a delegation comprising union members, management, local council members, and my predecessor the then Member of Parliament for Burnley, Mr. Dan Jones, which met him in his office on Millbank. We said why Hitachi should not be allowed to come into the United Kingdom. Does my right hon. Friend accept that, whatever the problems were in the industry at the time, Mullard Colour Tubes has survived in this country and is now making a product that is as good as the Japanese product? It employs fewer people, but it has survived and is doing extremely well in my constituency and in Durham.

Mr. Williams: I well remember that occasion and the late Dan Jones making representations as the then Member of Parliament, with his colleagues from his constituency. I remember trying to assure the tube manufacturers that there was life for them after the Japanese.

There is a true story that at the same time as one multinational that produced tubes in this country was putting pressure via its constituents here to stop the Japanese coming in, it was doing a secret deal in a hotel in Tokyo, which it had not told its British trade union or management about. That was to ensure that it would supply the tubes when the Japanese came in. However, that is a diversion from the main issue.

It is important that we do not treat quality as a once-and-for-all operation. It is important that we recognise that it is a continual process of upgrading products and moving up market where one has the higher added value and higher productivity.

The Japanese have an objective of higher quality at lower cost. If one gets higher quality at constant cost, that gives one a marketing chance, but the Japanese have been far more ruthless in the targets that they set themselves. They have said that they want not only quality in product areas where they are attacking world markets, but cost reduction. It does not need a policy decision. It tends to happen. It is a natural consequence, and I am sure that the Minister will agree. He said virtually the same things in a different way in his speech.

A spiral develops once one accepts the need for quality. Once one accepts that quality matters and sells, because there is higher quality, one's productivity goes up because less of the product is being wasted and more gets out into the shops. One's costs are reduced because there is less scrap and so on—the £5 billion saving that has been pinpointed—so one has lower unit costs. Thus one becomes more competitive. That has been the lesson of audio and television market development of the past 10 or 15 years, and advanced products have become available at reducing prices. It is a lesson that British industry must learn, and unfortunately has been slow to learn.

Japan has no innate characteristic that led it to that policy decision. It was a decision of necessity, a conscious decision. As many of us will remember, in the post-war period the reputation of the Japanese was for the production of shoddy copy products—cheap versions of European goods. Japan has no raw materials. To sustain growth in the post-war period the Japanese had to be able to get raw materials, and to do so they had to get foreign currency. Therefore, the Japanese Government made a conscious decision, backed up by industry, that they had to move up market. To get the currency, they had to go where the price was, where the opportunities were, so they made a deliberate strategic decision. There was governmental and industrial consensus, which is typical of the Japanese. Quality is not a job for a quality department. It must be a corporate endeavour. Every individual in a firm must be quality-conscious, and the Japanese hammered that home, just as the Americans had done before them. The Americans, however, perhaps lost sight of that idea when the bottom line took precedence over everything else.

The Japanese had to accept the idea that, to achieve the quality needed to beat the Germans, the British and the Americans in the markets they dominated, they had to involve their work force. We talk of "quality circles" as though they are a great discovery. After the war, Britain sent productivity missions to the United States where the same ideas, although called something else, were being discussed and implemented in companies, but that information was never followed through. The Japanese discovered that, inevitably, as the work force was involved in the pursuit of quality and the elimination of inadequacy in products, it had to be drawn into wider discussions. Often policy matters were involved in eliminating faults. The Japanese developed that consensus approach. It has had industrial relations benefits. It has produced a greater sense of unity within Japanese industry.

It is important to get across to industry the fact that the pursuit of quality is not just a matter of trying to avoid that £10 billion of waste. But, for pity's sake, industry should be motivated enough, if only to get its act together, by the thought of an extra £10 billion profit. There are far more important gains to be made from the pursuit of quality in terms of industrial relations and attitudes if we recognise what follows from the decision to ensure that quality is part of the whole corporate philosophy instead of just the delegated responsibility of a quality control officer and a couple of inspectors.

Britain has fallen behind in quality competition, although some companies have not and have done well. I am sure that all hon. Members were delighted at the order announced today by Rolls-Royce. It is an example of a firm which, by excellence, has managed to break back into the market after going through a difficult phase. There is not just a philosophical problem in industry. For too long there has been too little investment. To achieve quality there must be not only policy decisions but investment to back them up. British industry has concentrated far too often on telling the customer, "You can have the best that we are able to produce with the machinery we have."

Industry cannot understand why it has lost markets to competitors which start, with market research, to find out what customers want and then set about ensuring that they have the equipment and system to supply it at competitive cost. Industry has been reluctant to accept that. That fact emerged from the study of eight companies undertaken by the Department of Trade and Industry in 1979-80 and was echoed by several of the National Economic Development Organisation sector working parties and reports such as Warner, Corfield, ACARD and Finniston in the previous decade or the early part of this decade. Those reports spelt out that message, but, sadly, we still have to talk about it as though we are missionaries, trying to take the message to an industry that should already know it.

Industry representatives said that they were astonished when they returned from Tokyo in 1984. GEC and Thorn Electrics were equally astonished in 1978-79 when they looked for possible joint ventures in Japan at the time Hitachi was setting up in this country. I said then to management and say now to the Minister that, in a way, it is an indictment of British industry that it is astonished to find out what its competitors are doing. If there is one thing about which we can be sure, it is that the Japanese know very well what their competitors are doing. It is astonishing that as long as six years after Thorn and GEC said, "Careful, there are dreadful things happening in Japanese industry with which we are not keeping pace", the Minister and the industries represented on the 1984 mission — I do not know what they were — were still astonished at what they found instead of having learnt the lesson of what happened.

We have lost out on the market because we have not learnt the lessons that have been there for anyone to see. In fairness, the British Institute of Management had been preaching the lessons long before the Minister did. At the end of the 1970s and in the early 1980s, the BIM said that, instead of British over-reliance on specialists inspecting bad quality out, industry needed to design and build good quality in. We are talking about getting the product right with pre-production investment and with correct process planning before it is put on the market.

I endorse what I regard as the serious part of the Minister's speech. I say to new Members, I am sorry but it is in the nature of the House that, if one flies one political kite, three political kites will probably be immediately flown by the other side. The Minister knows what I am like. We have often had exchanges. He should have resisted temptation today. We could have had an amicable discussion on a matter that the whole House thinks is important. There are lessons to be learnt. The tragedy is that one lesson is that no one has been willing to learn the lessons that have been there for a long time.

Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock (Batley and Spen): I closely followed what the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) said. He talked about British moaners. Perhaps he ought to talk to some of his colleagues, especially the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) who, before the general election, toured the north of England and later, in a debate in the House, refused to admit that he had seen new factories being built and massive investment in manufacturing, creating jobs. He pretended that they were not there and that they were a fairy tale. But they were there. The bricks and mortar are there and jobs are being created.

Today we are discussing the importance of quality in manufacturing for international competitiveness. Quite simply, quality is competitiveness. I speak as one who was born in and now represents an area renowned for its fine industrial history and the enthusiasm of its people for value for money as well as quality. I believe that the quality of goods that we produce can and will be the lifeline for British industry. The CBI has told us:

"Quality means selling goods that don't come back, to customers who do."

That is very important.

I should like briefly to consider some aspects of this matter. Why should we expect such quality from goods that we want people to purchase? I suggest that there are probably at least five reasons for that. The first is the rising expectation of consumers. Consumers now travel widely and experience new standards. They are better educated, they know exactly what they are looking for and they are not prepared to put up with anything less. They are better informed by the media. They see products and standards of living on television which perhaps they have not seen before. Even some soap operas, I am told, set standards. We may not always like those standards, but they are there for everyone to see.

Secondly, we hear quite a lot about circles of quality. The Japanese have practised this for many years. Those quality circles differ between companies and countries, but they provide one of the the major benchmarks of competition. In time, products of high quality become associated with particular firms and names. We have seen this over many years. To most people, Swiss chocolate means Nestlé, Mercedes Benz means West Germany, and vice versa. Over a longer period, brand names for high quality reliable products even become subsumed into the language as quasi-nouns. Food mixers are widely known as "kenwoods" and vacuum cleaners as "hoovers". They get those names because of the quality of the original article.

Thirdly, there is growing evidence that growth in the market share comes from sustained quality, and many of our companies have known that for some time now. In a price versus quality argument, quality wins in time. Over a long period, there is no conflict between price and quality, and quality is always the real winner because people buy goods only when they feel that they are getting quality and value for money. We must not try to achieve one without the other.

Fourthly, as the right hon. Member for Swansea, West said, initial quality can mean a saving of costs and of waste. Parts of United Kingdom industry are only now waking up to the fact that it can cost much more to destroy or repair shoddy goods than to make good ones.

My fifth point relates to the high cost of failure, to which the right hon. Gentleman also referred. Failure to produce good quality products or services can lead to financial disaster and, as the tragedy at Bhopal in India showed, lack of quality control can lead to real disaster.

Let us examine the "how" of quality control. How can we go about getting quality into every street? Not surprisingly, the answer is that the Government cannot bring that about. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister and his Department on the excellent literature about quality which has been available for some time. I know that many companies, especially in the north of England, have taken the advice to heart and those which have not used such practices before are doing so now.

Governments can legislate only in a negative fashion. Only firms and businesses can raise the positive standard. I know that this is a large and complex subject, but let me offer a few ideas. I am sure that they are not original, but they are worth a mention. Total quality throughout the manufacturing process, from the selection of raw materials to delivery at the point of sale, is essential. The companies and retail stores that have done extremely well have recognised that for many years and have become well known for their quality. Such a high standard can be achieved only by an attitude of self-inspection on the part of all those involved in manufacturing. Each employee should take an interest in the component that he produces and in the quality of the finished article. If employees do that, they are looking not only to their own futures but to the future of the company and our manufacturing base.

I refer to experiments in the vehicle industry, particularly in Japan. Having visited Japan with a Select Committee last year, I am not sure that everything in the Japanese garden is as rosy as it was. The Japanese face problems because they have put all their effort into their manufacturing base and very little in their infrastructure. Anyone who has tried to get out of Tokyo, at any time of day, knows that only too well. However, the Japanese have shown that an attitude of self-inspection is both cheaper and more reliable; it gives a responsibility to each employee for the finished article. Any Government initiative to raise quality consciousness must have international standards as its basis. It is no good making quality products that fall well below the standards of our industrial competitors. If we do not keep up with international standards, we shall not sell our goods on the market. We cannot look to the home market alone; we must export. We have always been a trading nation and that will be even more true in the future.

The national quality campaign launched by the Government in 1983 is to be welcomed. It has put the word "quality" back at the top of the agenda in large letters. It has now reached over 50,000 firms, many of which are proud of their quality record. Firms can take advantage of lower interest rates and inflation but only if that attitude pervades every corner of every workshop in every town and city of the United Kingdom.

We have many very small companies, particularly in the north of England, which export a variety of goods to all parts of the world. The articles that they export are not always small or easy to pack and send by freight or air freight. From my constituency we export fire engines, which are huge objects, to countries all over the world. They go to airports in Hong Kong and parts of Africa and to oil refineries in Saudi Arabia. They are not the easiest things to send, but the quality that the company has managed to achieve is second to none.

We have many other small companies. Some export nougat to France. We used to import it from the French and we are now sending it back to them. We even send spaghetti to Italy; that really is coals to Newcastle.

I have referred to some notable foreign successes and to some successes at home. We have many more, much too numerous to mention today. As reported in the newspapers today, the largest one-piece carpet ever made is to be despatched from west Yorkshire today. It measures 41 ft by 54 ft and has no seams, and it will cost the Saudi Arabian prince who ordered it £8,500.

Mr. Cash: Cheap at the price.

Mrs. Peacock: It is cheap at the price, as my hon. Friend says. The very small company that made the carpet, which took five people three days to make, has 10 similar orders. The company has been operating for only five or six years. We should congratulate it on its success and hope that many more carpets will go to Saudi Arabia in the future.

We have massive increased investment in manufacturing in the north of England and it is there for everyone to see. Factories are being built and new jobs created and many millions of pounds are being invested. That money would not be invested without the prospect of a quality end product that companies know they will be able to sell not only in the home market but internationally. We must encourage more investment, particularly in the north of England.

A great British success is Jaguar Cars. In 1979, sales of Jaguar cars fell by 50 per cent. They had been falling in previous years and that result was almost the final nail in the company's coffin. In 1980 it took 10,500 people to make 14,105 cars. For every customer that Jaguar lost when its quality was not assured, 21 jobs were put at risk. Then there was a radical rethink of the company's attitudes under its present chairman, John Egan. All employees were told of the crisis of quality and competitiveness. Quality circles—which we have heard of somewhere before — were introduced, and all employees given responsibility for their own part of the process. The philosophy changed from one of inspecting out faults to one of building in quality—the right hon. Member for Swansea, West referred to that—and the results have been little short of fantastic. In 1982, 8,000 employees made 28,041 cars; what a change from 1979. Jaguar now has so many orders that it cannot make cars quickly enough and the prospects for increased employment are thus looking better than ever before.

We should not let such success stories hide the problems that we still face. We have much work still to do on quality and competitiveness. I return to my theme, that British industry can compete only when all our companies are based on quality street.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): First, I apologise for the fact that I shall have to leave the Chamber at some stage for an outside commitment, but I shall return later. I had not intended to speak in the debate, as I expected that a large number of Members would wish to speak on the important subject of quality and competitiveness in British industry. Having worked in manufacturing industry for some 10 years before being elected to the House, I have always been concerned that there are not enough Members on either side of the House who have been involved in management or in the work force of manufacturing industry. Manufacturing industry is vital to the economy of the nation and it should be as well represented on both sides of the House as the legal profession, which internationally produces perhaps less benefit for the nation. That is a personal view. It does not mean that there should be no barristers in the House, which, in my view, should represent a wide cross-section of the nation as a whole.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), who was previously a Minister and ought to be a Minister now, referred to a meeting some years ago when Hitachi was talking of coming into the United Kingdom. I was present when the joint delegation of management and all the other people to whom I referred in my intervention came to my right hon. Friend's office. He began by asking whether they were aware of an agreement signed in a Tokyo hotel the previous day. The top management man from Mullard immediately left to telephone Philips in Eindhoven to find out what had been agreed. I actually found out what the agreement involved today because no more was said on that occasion and the meeting was adjourned.

Quality is of great importance and we must ensure that it is given great prominence in British industry. When I was involved in one industry and visited others in the 1960s and 1970s, people working on the production side were encouraged to believe that the most important factor was the number of articles coming off the production line and going out through the factory gates in lorries or containers. Quality was not the most important factor. That attitude was common to many industries, but it has changed and the change is an important one. Until the miners' strike in 1974 we were able to sell all the goods that our factories could produce, but the situation then began to change and we found ourselves competing in world markets where quality was important. Industry has become increasingly aware of the importance of quality, but the message must come down from top management through middle management and supervision to the work force itself if quality is to be given the attention that is required.

[Mr. Peter Pike]

I have always believed that we must ensure that it is not a question of management versus workers but that all should work together, because if all those involved do not work together there will be no one left working in industry. In this context, communication, whether on quality or any other aspect, is of critical importance. We must ensure continued improvement in communications within manufacturing industry. Much criticism can be aimed at management in this regard, but having been a shop steward I know that there are also failures on the trade union side, whether between shop stewards and members or shop stewards and management. Management has an important role to play in ensuring that the work force knows exactly what quality requirements are essential and there must be constant encouragement to ensure that products meet that standard.

As the Minister has said, it is important not to have rejects which have to be repaired or scrapped, because the further along the production line that occurs, the greater the cost to manufacturing industry. The importance of that aspect must be made clear to the work force. In my industry, an added value bonus scheme was introduced whereby management and workers received a percentage of the value added, which could be affected if products had to go back a stage or be scrapped. I was on the supervision committee of that scheme and it proved a positive benefit to all concerned.

I am glad to see you in the Chair, Madam Deputy Speaker, if that is the correct way to address you.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Yes — please call me Madam.

Mr. Pike: Thank you very much, Madam Deputy Speaker. It is the first time that I have seen you in the Chair and I am glad to welcome you.

Manufacturing industry is important to the economy of the whole nation. Yet the Government seem unconcerned at the fact that we import £8 billion-worth more manufactured goods than we export. Last Friday I took part in the debate on tourism. That is an area of great growth and I do not deride the benefit that it brings in terms of jobs and the economy. I appreciate the benefits to the nation from the service sector. Nevertheless, this nation was founded on manufacturing industry and our future prosperity must depend on that industry. We must therefore return to a position of trading surplus. In that regard, both quality and competitiveness are extremely important.

The rate of growth in manufacturing industry may be higher than it was, as the Minister has said, but, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Seansea, West has said, it depends on the starting point that one takes. I accept that productivity is greater, but output and investment are both lower than in 1979 and those adverse factors must be taken seriously into account.

I have never denied that new technology must be introduced, because if our industry is to compete on world markets, it must compete on equal terms and have the newest possible technologies so that our output can meet world competition. Many industries, however, are concerned about unfair competition, and I shall be writing to the Department about this. I shall not go into detail at this stage as I must respect the confidentiality of the companies concerned. One example, however, concerns a Hungarian competitor selling goods into the United Kingdom, and another concerns Japan. We have to accept competition, but it has to be fair competition. For reasons of confidentiality, I will write to the Minister and detail those two examples rather than discuss them in the House as that may cause embarrassment in that industry.

The Government also fail to take cognisance of energy costs. When I have met industry leaders, both as a Member of Parliament and before that, when I was leader of the borough council — the council always tried to maintain good relations with industry — those leaders always mentioned that energy costs were a problem. In theory, energy costs throughout the EEC are supposed to be above board and the tariffs published. However, that does not necessarily happen in all countries within the EEC. Some multinationals are very aware of the preferential rates that some competitors in Europe are able to get. One way around it is to give long contracts for the supply of energy, whether it be gas or electricity, at a rate well below the published tariff.

I do not want to get involved in the issue of rates because we will have many occasions in the months ahead to discuss that. However, whilst the Government continually mention rates as an area of concern, most industries in my constituency say that energy is of prime concern. The Government have to look at that. Whether it is the responsibility of the Minister's Department, or some other Department, I ask that he look at what is happening in other countries within the EEC. Are our competitors paying a fair energy price? The information that I have from some multinationals is that they are not.

Manufacturing industries have to grow. They have to have the right quality products. The Government, trade unions and management — supervisors and everybody involved in industry — have to be concerned about quality. We have to give every possible assurance and encouragement to ensure that our goods are of the right quality. As the hon. Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) said, consumers are concerned not only about the price of goods but about the quality of goods. The quality must match the price of the goods. If one pays for an expensive meal, one expects a good meal. It is the same when one buys a car, a refrigerator or a freezer. One expects value for money, and that is important.

We also have to encourage innovation in industry, and research and development. The Government should be taking far more positive steps to encourage research and development. We should also be encouraging suggestion schemes in those industries that do not have them already. The workers in some industries that I have visited have told me that they have put suggestions to management, but that no notice has been taken of those suggestions. The industry that I worked in was very good in that respect. We had a good suggestion scheme. One has to accept in industry that not all the good ideas come from management. Very often the worker on the production line can see what is being done wrong, what can save money, what can make a better product or what can avoid damage to a product. Suggestion schemes are extremely important and should be encouraged.

We also have to look at profit within industry. A manufacturer in my constituency—to avoid embarrassment I will not name it—last October put it to me that industry had to grow and make profits. I do not dispute that. That manufacturer also said that it was then for the Government to distribute that wealth, and I do not dispute that either.

We must accept that new technology will mean fewer jobs. That is inevitable. As new technology is introduced, that trend will continue. The Government must discourage employers from using permanent overtime. The unions also have a role to play. I am not referring to overtime to meet short-term sickness, holidays or where an order has to be delivered by a specific date. In many industries at present there is a pattern of regular overtime that is at an unacceptable level. If there are eight hours or more of regular overtime a week, those employers should be encouraged to employ extra workers rather than continue that level of overtime. Many industries consider it cheaper to use overtime than to take on new employees, and that is a very worrying aspect.

I am sure that the Minister is also aware that output in many industries could be increased by 50 per cent. or more if only 10 per cent. more employees were taken on. Many industries within my constituency, if they employed 10 per cent. more employees, could increase their output by as much as 50 per cent. if there were markets at home and abroad. We want to see people back at work.

The great difference between the Opposition and the Government is that we want to see the wealth shared. We want to see that people have an opportunity to work and that those out of work do not suffer a declining standard of living while those who are in work enjoy an improving standard of living. We want a fairer distribution of wealth.

Other countries will not buy our goods if they are not made at the right quality and at the right price. Our own consumers will not buy British goods unless they are at the right quality and the right price. There are occasions when one does try to buy British but it is extremely difficult to find British goods available. Therefore, industries must be asked why they have stopped making those items.

EEC requirements on labelling are of concern. The fact that the British Government cannot require labelling to say "Made in Britain" worries many industries, such as the textile industry in my constituency. Consumers have a right to know whether a product is made in Britain or not. We need to look more carefully at labelling that will show where the main labour was involved. Consumers do not have to buy British, but if consumers want to buy British, they should have the right to take that factor into account when making their purchase.

The Government should do everything possible to resist pressures from the EEC that will make it harder for consumers when they are making their purchases in any shop in this country to be absolutely certain of how much of the work has been done within the United Kingdom. That is a worrying aspect not only for Opposition Members but for Conservative Members. I am not asking for anything unreasonable. All I am saying is that the consumer should have the right to know and that they will be able to take that into account, along with all the other factors such as quality, price and design, when making their purchases.

This is an important debate. Whether we are involved in Government or Opposition, in the trade unions or management, we have to do everything possible to ensure that our industries are making goods of the right quality and at the right price and that we are able to achieve our fair share of the market in the United Kingdom and in the world in years to come. If we do that, this country will get over the problems we have been facing.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to catch your eye so soon after my arrival in the House. I am aware that not all previous hon. Members for Bosworth have been so fortunate. Sir William Edge, elected as Member of Parliament for Bosworth on 31 May 1927, was first successful in catching Mr. Speaker Fitzroy's eye on 12 July 1928, 14 months later.

I noted Mr. Speaker's remarks earlier in the week that hon. Members, for their good health, should wear jackets in the air-conditioned Chamber. I am sorry to hear that Mr. Speaker is not well. However, I must tell the House that, despite following his ruling to the button, not only have I caught his eye but I have caught his cold. I ask hon. Members to bear with me if I appear to be a little under the weather.

I have always considered it to be a great honour to be chosen to stand for Parliament. It is a much greater honour to be elected and it carries with it enormous responsibilities which I take very seriously. I first wish to thank the 34,000 electors in Bosworth who voted for me. I must make it clear to the House that my 17,000 majority, which made my vote almost double that of the party that came second, owed much to the respect, admiration and trust that my predecessor, Sir Adam Butler, generated during his 17 years as Member of Parliament for Bosworth. During my time in the constituency since my selection in December, I have heard not one word said against him. On the doorstep I have heard people say how he helped them, how he looked into their family problems and helped, for example, with war pensions. He has helped so many people in the constituency and he has always been approachable. He has certainly been kind to me.

I pay tribute, too, to his career in the House. He was the Parliamentary Private Secretary to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister when she was Leader of the Opposition. He was a Minister of State at the Department of Trade and Industry, a Minister of State at the Northern Ireland Office and the Minister of State for Defence Procurement. Conservative Members will remember that he won the constituency in 1970 with an 8 per cent. swing, he held it in 1974 against the national swing and improved it in 1979 and in 1983. I hope that all hon. Members will join me in wishing Sir Adam a long and happy career outside the House.

I also pay tribute to my wife, who is sitting in the Gallery. She has already supported me through three campaigns, including two general elections, and I look forward to her support in many more.

[Mr. David Tredinnick]

One of the problems that newly elected Members on both sides of the House will have found in taking over from senior, well known and respected Members as they retire is how to get oneself known. Soon after I was selected as the candidate for Bosworth, I explained on the doorstep to a lady of advanced years and great seniority that I was taking over from Sir Adam, her respected Member of Parliament. She looked me straight in the eye and said, "Well lad, your problem is that nobody knows you from Adam." I would like to think that I have overcome that problem or I would not be speaking here today.

I am fortunate to represent one of the most historic constituencies in England. It was there, at the Battle of Bosworth in 1485, that the Wars of the Roses ended with Richard III being defeated by Henry Tudor, soon to be crowned Henry VII. I must say in passing that my heart goes out to hon. Members who represent constituencies with names that mean nothing to the local people and presumably mean something only to the mandarins of the Boundary Commission.

Apart from the famous battlefield, much favoured by tourists, my constituency covers 126 square miles or, if one prefers, 80,000 acres. It is situated at the very centre of England and has countryside as beautiful as one could wish to see. However, the commercial heart of the countryside is the town of Hinckley together with Earl Shilton, Barwell, Burbage and Anstey. A total of 46 per cent. of the residents employed in my constituency are employed in manufacturing, hence the reason for my great interest in wishing to catch your eye today, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

In the constituency approximately 16,000 are employed in the hosiery and knitwear industry. They are employed by one of the 90 hosiery and knitwear companies that we are fortunate to have. The motion refers to the importance of quality. I must tell the House that the quality of hosiery and knitwear made in my constituency is second to none. It is as good as that made anywhere in the world. We have a hard working, skilled labour force, forward-thinking managements and a record of good industrial relations. I suggest to hon. Members who live in the north and north-west that if they are driving up the M1 on a Friday they could do much worse than stop in Bosworth and buy some of the hosiery and knitwear available there. It will cost them much less than anything bought in Oxford street or Knightsbridge and they will get the same quality or better. I recommend that to hon. Members.

Quality is not the only virtue required for a manufacturing company to compete internationally. I propose to look at another factor and, I hope, demonstrate the profound impact that it has had on international competitiveness, at least for the hosiery and knitwear industries. That factor is the effect of the exchange rates and the value of sterling against European currencies.

I suggest that the easing of the value of sterling against major European currencies last year has been of great benefit to textile and clothing exporters. I do not want to send hon. Members to sleep by bombarding them with statistics but I must refer to figures for clothing exports to the EEC which have just been published by the British Textile Confederation. They show that in the first quarter of 1987, compared with the first quarter of 1986, those exports to West Germany were up by 43 per cent., to France by 45 per cent., to Belgium by 56 per cent. and to the Netherlands by almost 60 per cent. Those are significant figures.

As I said, those figures have been published, but what has not been published hitherto is the impact that the large increase in clothing exports to the EEC has had on our trading performance with the EEC in the first four months of this year.

I am delighted to be able to inform the House that the unpublished figures that I have received from the British Textile Confederation show a dramatic improvement. Compared with the first four months of 1986, in the first four months of 1987 our trade deficit with all European Community countries was reduced; for textiles by 10·3 per cent. and for clothing by 24·4 per cent. The combined textile and clothing deficit was reduced by nearly 15 per cent. That is good news for my constituents, the hosiery and knitwear industry and the country.

Unfortunately, there is bad news too. There is the general problem of low-cost imports from the far east. They threaten the viability of British companies. I refer to imports from countries in which labour is paid a pittance and the hours are long. In some cases, workers get only half a Sunday off each month.

I draw the attention of the House to a specific serious problem affecting my constituency; that is, the phenomenal increase in imports of cheap underwear from China. The matter is of great concern to me. In my constituency, 12 companies that make briefs and pants could be threatened. I ask hon. Members to bear with me as I give them a few figures that I think are important. Every year, approximately 136 million pairs are sold in the United Kingdom, of which, last year, 89 million were imported. In 1985, we imported from China about 2·5 million pairs. The figures that have now been compiled show that, in the first quarter of this year, we imported 8·5 million pairs from China. This year, we expect to import from China 34 million pairs in all. That is a staggering increase on a base figure of 89 million. Last year, the French and the Germans bore the brunt of imports from China. They pleaded with the EC for regional restrictions, and they were granted.

Were I not bound by the convention that my maiden speech should not be controversial, I would say that I wholeheartedly support the Knitting Industries Federation in its demand for urgent action for Britain.

I draw the attention of the House to another important influence on the ability to compete internationally. It goes hand in hand with quality. It is by no means restricted to the hosiery and knitwear industry. I refer to design. For six years, I worked in marketing in the computer industry and learnt to recognise the importance of design. Increasingly, in my constituency, companies are investing more in design and are reaping the benefits of that investment, particularly in computerised design in the hosiery and knitwear industry.

There is no better illustration of the force of good quality and design than another company in another industry in which many of my constituents work. I refer to Jaguar Cars at Coventry, which has already been mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock). Like many hosiery and knitwear manufacturers in my constituency, Jaguar has found the magic marketing mix that brings success in international markets.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): It falls to me to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) and to congratulate him on an excellent maiden speech that he delivered with a lightness of touch and with an interest that we came to associate with his predecessor. I congratulate him not only on his excellent majority but on the quality of his first performance on the Government Back Bench. We look forward to many further opportunities of hearing from him in future.

At the heart of the debate is international competition. It has frequently been said that the quality of our goods lies at the heart of our industrial performance. Indeed, one of the curious characteristics of the current Japanese miracle is the fact that, for many decades, Japan was not regarded as a country that produced high-quality goods. It is fairly said that it was in the post-war period when it discovered the importance of a reduction in taxation—and it was the Economic Minister who introduced the notion of reduced taxation as a means of stimulating the economy — that it looked to America for its new industrial criteria. One of the other things that Japan discovered and developed was the need to improve the quality of its goods. Having been a country that traditionally produced goods of inferior quality, which was also a characteristic of other countries in south-east Asia and the Pacific basin, it learned its basic quality techniques from the United States and from men such as W. E. Deming and J. M. Duran.

The ability to be innovative and imitative ensured that Japan produced a combination of quality with volume and, at the same time, a reduced taxation policy, an innovation and an ability to produce an incentive-based economy. Much of its current success is due to a combination of such factors together with its ability to combine an exemplary relationship between management and work force that is being copied throughout the rest of the world.

The history of this country affords us a lesson. We must look back to the mid-19th century and consider how places such as Ironbridge, which is near my constituency, has become one of the leading places in Britain, indeed in the world, in power generation, the generation of turbines. We are aware of the quality of Evostick, Evode products and the world-famous Lotus shoe industry. They were all based upon quality. Back in the 18th century, when Richard Brinsley Sheridan was the hon. Member for Stafford, the quality of Stafford footwear led the world. Quality has always been at at the heart of industrial performance in my constituency. It has also been at the heart of industrial performance of Britain, and our ability to export during the 18th, 19th and 20th centuries depended upon the quality of goods that we produced.

In economic debates, it has been the characteristic of the Leader of the Opposition's speeches to stress the volume of production and the need to sustain it. The irrelevance of the theme that he developed has become increasingly apparent against the background of the need to produce goods and manufactures of the highest quality. In the modern world, there is absolutely no point in producing a system of manufacture that is geared exclusively to manufacture. From the only two speeches from the Opposition today, I noticed an insistence on the importance of output. Without quality, output is simply not good enough. For example, one must consider the number of people who have a Japanese watch, a Japanese car or a Japanese radio or an item from Korea or Taiwan.

People choose those goods because of a combination of factors including price, design, marketing and, above all, quality. We have sought to simulate that quality since the Conservative Government came to power. I pay tribute to the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for the way in which he has conducted that policy. It is essential to persuade people to go for quality if we are to compete in the modern world. Much of the credit for putting the emphasis on changing attitudes among management and work force should go to that Minister.

I referred earlier to the success of Rolls-Royce and the £150 million contract announced today. I understand that as much as £650 million might be involved. That contract is directly the result of high-quality production by a great British, privatised company. Through new contracts with Qantas it will be able to sustain jobs in Britain. It is not just a question of selling for the sake of selling because selling is vital to the economic performance of the country and to sustaining jobs.

We have heard much of Jaguar and Sir John Egan's efforts. That is another privatised company which imposes contractual requirements upon customers and subcontractors to ensure that the quality of goods is as high as the customer requires. There is no point in imagining that simply producing goods and, as we did in the car industry for decades, insisting on volume production is enough. It is not enough and might even be disastrous. We must sustain the quality of goods.

The Consumer Protection Act, which has just been passed, production liability and the harmonisation of European laws are of great importance as I know from serving on the Select Committee on European legislation. Working groups and Ministers discussing these matters in Europe have led to a proper emphasis on maintaining a free and fair market and that has much to do with the quality of legislation in the European Community and in this House. The combined effect will be to produce quality goods to enable us to compete effectively with the United States and south-east Asia.

Rejects and repairs have been mentioned. It is estimated that 10 per cent. of our gross domestic product can be put down to lack of quality and to the failure to produce goods of the type and quality that people want. If goods are constantly returned and industry has a repair and renewal problem, confidence will be lost and people will not buy the goods.

Accounting systems are also important. I understand that Ford and many other companies are ensuring quality not only by the quality of the product but by the quality of their accounting system. When such companies enter arrangements with subcontractors a condition of the contract concerns the quality of the accounting system to ensure proper cash flow. The quality of the goods is therefore matched only by the quality of the administration. We must dovetail all the ingredients to ensure that we produce quality goods.

Quality is essentially pro-competitive and anti-monopoly. One of the great problems in the past in terms of industrial performance and the development of monopolies—whether state or private—was that quality suffered. Thriving small enterprises which are highly energised and directed to the market produce the quality required. I think of places such as Covent Garden and of other small business enterprises being set up throughout the country. They prove that high performance, high quality products are what people want to buy in a thriving, prosperous and competitive world.

The Government are bent on the eradication of Socialism. They are a radical Government and they will achieve that objective. An intrinsic part of our policy is to get rid of the latter-day nationalisation which led to the lack of British quality in the 20 years after the second world war. I lived in Sheffield for nearly 20 years and witnessed the decline of the steel industry. Now that industry is in profit for the first time for over 10 years. One of the reasons is that it is now a highly competitive industry aiming at quality. That is how we shall be able to sell our products abroad as we did in the mid-nineteenth century.

The elimination of low-quality drab Socialism should be one of our aims over the next five to 10 years. One of the aspects of that, in terms of industrial performance, is to put emphasis on high quality manufacturing industry. High quality sells products, when products are sold a great economy is created, and a great economy leads to high employment.

Mr. Tom Sackville (Bolton, West): I should like to welcome you, Madam Deputy Speaker, to the Chair. I should also like to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) on an excellent maiden speech, in which he appealed eloquently for the interests of the industries in his constituency. I declare an interest in that he and I arrived on the same day, in the same house, at the same educational establishment near Slough 25 years ago. We sat next to each other then and it is good to be again sitting next to each other. My hon. Friend had many of the qualities of a successful politician at the age of 12. Today he sounded as if he had been here for years, and we expect great things from him.

Recently I was talking to a person who has worked for a long time in Japan for a British company. We discussed what should be done about the trade imbalance, the growing ability of the Japanese to sell goods to us and to other industrialised countries and our inability to sell to them. I suggested that we should allow the Japanese currency to appreciate yet further so that the competitiveness of Japanese exports would be further eroded. My companion said that the Japanese themselves expect to be able to weather that, to watch the yen appreciate further and to continue to sell to us because of the quality of their goods. The only way that we can combat that serious possibility is to produce similar or higher quality goods. We have not done enough to achieve that.

It is good that we should be debating today an important non-political subject. We spend most of our time in this House debating points that do not really contain great substance, as they are simply political issues. However, today's subject is absolutely vital to our economic future. It cuts across all political boundaries and it is excellent that it should do that. I am glad to be taking part in the debate.

Clearly, quality is essential. Quality does not simply mean product quality. It involves quality in after-sales service, quality among the dealerships, quality in a relationship between the manufacturer and the distributors and quality of service. Of course, quality also involves the relationships between the customer and the manufacturer, especially in relation to what is often called "flexibility of response". When a customer asks a manufacturer to make some modification or come up with a new product, the speed and success of the manufacturer's response is how that manufacturer is judged in the market place. Only now, rather late in the day, are British manufacturers appreciating that.

Over 20 years, Madam Deputy Speaker, we have suffered an accelerated decline in world opinion. The world has believed that British goods are not of high quality. Whether they were or not, the world received the impression that British quality had suffered. That impression snowballed and peaked a very few years ago when all British companies were tarred by the same brush and compared with those companies which had failed in quality, had produced shoddy goods, failed to deliver or failed to service the customer properly.

I used to travel around Latin America selling British export finance services. The problem then was to find the British goods that people wanted to buy. The word had gone round that the goods were not delivered on time. It is all very well trying to sell export finance, but it was difficult to find manufacturers who had found markets in that area. We were often told then — this is another aspect of quality — that British companies did not even go to the area or attempt to sell there. The Japanese and the Koreans had picked up whole markets which we had 100 years ago when we had strong links with many Latin American countries, but which we have progressively lost. I hope that people will consider that aspect and review the whole question of marketing abroad and setting up decent representations in foreign countries to ensure that we get the goods to the markets.

There is good news now. I talk to industrialists in my constituency all the time and I have been told that they are now selling into markets in which they would not have had a chance a few years ago. I learned the other day of a company that was successfully selling into France. I was told that 10 years ago that company would not have approached French markets because the French would have said, "No, we do not buy British goods." That attitude has completely changed in a number of different industries, and that is excellent news.

We must examine briefly why that has happened. The shock of the recession from the late 1970s to the early 1980s made many companies look very carefully at why they were no longer competitive. People began to look at price — a very important factor — and at quality and quality of service. Another very important aspect is the total change in the industrial relations scene. If there are constant industrial relations problems in an industry, with strikes and rancour between management and the labour force, that firm will never get round to asking the unions to consider quality as a prerequisite, because other contentious matters will take precedence. The turnround in the industrial relations scene is a major reason why quality has been improved. To introduce a contentious note, it is sad to hear that the Labour party, if it was in government, would repeal the greater part of the industrial relations legislation. Many problems in industry would then return. We cannot begin to talk about quality if there is an ever-present chance of a strike.

Another very important factor in the improvement of quality is the privatisation of many vital industries and the future privatisation of others. It is common ground that many nationalised industries have had disappointing results in terms of competitiveness and quality over the years. Those companies which have been successful are, by and large, those which have tried to emulate the private sector and seek techniques by which it is possible to deliver.

We have already heard the example of British Steel, which has become a very high quality and competitive industry in the past few years. It has done that because it has taken on many of the features of private companies. I appeal to the Government to bring forward the privatisation of British Steel as soon as possible. Nothing but good for the work force, customers and this country can come from such privatisation. It would be very disappointing to see British Steel slip back into the demoralised and chaotic state it was in a few years ago.

I want to congratulate the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—I am sorry that he is not in the Chamber now—on what he has done on those points. He has taken a very intelligent and constructive attitude in his role in the Department over the years and he has started many initiatives on those vital subjects. Of course there is a limit to what Government can do in terms of convincing industry about quality, but the fact that the Government have provided the wherewithal in terms of ideas and training aids is encouraging.

I have seen an enormous change in the industries that I visit in my constituency. I hope that that change will continue. I see an atmosphere in which people are proud of what is being achieved in terms of quality and the new markets that result. I want to encourage the Government to carry on their campaigns and initiatives, and I am sure that we will reap the benefits of those in years to come.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): I welcome you, Madam Deputy Speaker, to your first Friday as occupant of the Chair. On behalf of myself and others in the House, I wish you long service in this House, with your customary charm, skill and wit. I had the pleasure of introducing my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) into politics in 1979 in my constituency, if he remembers that. I was very glad to hear his robust and strong maiden speech to the House today and I wish him every success in his years in this House and his contributions to our debate and service of this House.

Today's debate is of particular relevance to the security industry. I am glad to advise the British Security Industry Association and serve it in the capacity as chairman of two of its inspectorates. Security is about protection and providing the customer with products or services in which he can place his complete trust. It is an international business continually having to reassess itself in the wake of highly sophisticated technological advances where product development is inextricably linked with quality standards.

I am well aware of the importance of quality, not only in manufacturing, but in company service and attitude. Since its formation in 1967, the British Security Industry Association has sought to provide leadership, guidance and quality standards through self-regulation. Its major objective is, and must remain, to create an environment which combines competitive and innovative flair with proven standards of reliability.

Since 1971, the association has worked in conjunction with the British Standards Institution, initially focusing on BS4737, which was designed to improve quality control within the alarm industry. Faced with today's increasingly complex market, the industry has realised that there is a need for a far more comprehensive standard by which to operate. Thus, attention has now turned to the recently revised BS5750.

Collectively, the security industry has seen the beneficial effects of such a standard upon those sectors that have already adopted it, such as white goods and machine tools. It is not often that a standard, and a British one at that, has been designed to have such a revolutionary effect upon an industry. What is more, it forms the basis of an international standard—ISO 9000—which is to be introduced later this year. There is no doubt that it will have a considerable effect on global trading in future.

With a turnover of about £630 million—by no means is all of that associated with exports—and with many companies selling equipment and services overseas, the security industry recognises that the achievement of such a standard is an inherent part of gaining an international reputation.

It should be recognised that BS5750 is a model for a quality assurance management system. It is more concerned with the establishment of a systematic way of working within a company than with the product or service end. In essence, it operates on the premise that to prevent is better than to cure. It is well known that first-class products and excellent service emanate from good, efficient management. The standard is divided into three parts according to individual company needs. First, there is specification for design, manufacture and installation. Secondly, there is specification for manufacture and installation. Thirdly, there is specification for final inspection and testing.

The standard has been created to be flexible in its operation and it is easily achievable by small companies as well as large. A company with fewer than 500 employees may be eligible for grants, consultancy advice in reviewing internal quality control and the production of the quality manual that is needed as the first stage in the institute's assessment procedure. The manual is fundamental to the institution's review of a business, for it forms the basis for the criteria on which a company's eligibility is judged.

Before registration, the institution's inspectors examine company practice to ensure that the business is being run in the way that is defined in the quality manual. Once certification has been granted, the institution will continue to visit the company several times a year to ensure that standards are maintained or even upgraded. Continuous assessment in confidence takes place for the customer and for the company. Over 4,000 United Kingdom industrial organisations are already registered by the institution, and the number continues to grow. Although any company may register individually for the standard, civil trade bodies have already recognised the competitive edge that BS5750 gives to their industry, both in the United Kingdom and, perhaps more importantly, in the international market place.

A sector scheme has been established to allow sufficient flexibility within the application of BS5750. The British Security Industry Association's sector scheme is currently being established, and in line with other schemes is targeted specifically at the particular requirements of the industry. A working party is currently producing a quality assessment schedule for the security systems industry—companies responsible for designing, installing and servicing intruder alarms, closed circuit television, access control and other electronic security installations. Members of the working party comprise the British Standards Institution, the British Security Industry Association, the police, crime prevention officers, banks, building societies and the insurance world—essentially, those directly concerned with quality standards in the security industry.

The recently launched security systems inspectorate, of which I am the honorary chairman, was devised by the industry as a means of maintaining quality control throughout the sector. The adoption of British standard 5750 as a criterion for joining the inspectorate was a natural development of the association's responsibility both to its own members and to the customer. By October, the schedule will have been set out, and security companies will be able to register under the sector scheme. I know of two firms that have already registered independently. Both Chubb Alarms and Shorrock Security Systems have found the benefits to be enormous.

British standard 5750 has resulted in a streamlined management approach, cutting out bureaucracy and ensuring that staff are properly trained and supervised. Overall, it results in a radical review and remodelling of management systems, which greatly improves any company's ability to respond to its market place. It improves service to customers, and—equally important—increases company profitability by raising levels of efficiency throughout, from administration, purchasing and production through to installation and after-sale service.

What British standard 5750 is really trying to achieve is total quality management, something that is efficiently practised throughout the Japanese industry, as some of my hon. Friends have said. If we are to maintain and increase our competitiveness in the face of such opposition, it is imperative that British industry adopts total quality management practices. That may require cultural change, and it certainly takes time to implement fully within an organisation.

Some of Britain's best-known companies — for example, British Telecom and Jaguar — have already claimed tremendous benefits from the introduction of the standard. Now, under the leadership of the British Security Industry Association, the security industry in this country is following suit. On a global basis, the standard is held in high regard, and it now forms part of ISO 9000. It will be a benchmark for international trading, and a fundamental part of a company's success. The Japanese, the Americans and many others across the continents have sought the help of the British Standards Institution in reassessing their own management control systems through the application of BS 5750.

This debate is about the relationship between quality in manufacturing and a product's ability to win in the market place. BS 5750 provides the United Kingdom industry with an opportunity to move forward to demonstrate the quality of British products, and to motivate employees, from the top downwards, to stand among the best in the world. I am glad to be associated with this progress, and particularly with the initiative through which one perhaps less well-known part of the industry, the British security industry, is working towards competitiveness across international sale market places.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak. I welcome you to your new post. I am sure that your effort and service, about which I know from my experience on the national executive committee of the Labour party and within the trade union movement, will be amplified in your new position.

I welcome and commend the speech of the hon. Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick). Coming from a Member who has been here three weeks, I do not know whether that carries the weight of the congratulations of other colleagues, but I enjoyed his contribution.

I have been struck by the obvious political difference between the two sides of the House, which is reflected in the north-south divide. Everyone has his own experience of that divide and in the general election campaign Labour candidates made great play of it. The divide strikes Labour Members forcibly as they watch the performance of Conservative Members. They and their views are in a completely different world from that experienced by Labour Members. They are in the dreamland of Conservative policy since 1979, which has produced apparently untold benefits for them, their constituents and their constituencies.

I am sorry to say that the world in which we live in my constituency of Nottingham, North and other areas bears no relationship to that dreamland. I wish that it were not so. One of the great lessons that Conservative Members should learn, perhaps from the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen), the former Leader of the House, is the humility to exercise their responsibility in Government on behalf of the whole nation rather than just those parts of the nation that they represent.

In my constituency 8,000 people are without work, and the vast majority of them have lost employment since 1979. Have they suddenly been afflicted with idleness? Have people on the unemployment register in Nottingham, North suddenly become idle scroungers, who do not care to work? The opposite is true. Many of these people are desperate for work. Many of them have been unemployed for a good number of years and are desperate for assistance from the Government so that they can find their way back to work and make a contribution not just for society but for themselves and their families.

Essentially, that assistance must come from the pump-priming efforts of Government, but the Government's efforts have been far from adequate. I am a trade union research officer in the General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union, newly christened the GMB. I have had the dubious privilege of seeing cross my desk redundancy after redundancy, which has affected the members of one particular union only. There can be no question that this alleged revitalisation of manufacturing industry and improved competitiveness fails the real social test of people working and being productive, as they have been in my area, in ever larger numbers.

I have some statistics, which fortunately arrived this morning, which I shall quote briefly. They come from the Nottinghamshire county council and give a broad-brush approach to the position in Nottinghamshire.

On the latest available figures, manufacturing industry in Nottingham had a gross output of £4,083·8 million, which is just under 2 per cent. of the national output. The total of gross value added was £1,274·6 million. The total wages and salaries that were paid by manufacturing industry were £736·6 million. That is a substantial input into the local economy and, obviously, into the national economy. However, the key sectors in Nottingham for manufacturing have, without fail, been hit and, in my contention, have been hit by the Government's policies.

In the textile industry, Meridian, Courtaulds and Viyella are among the list of victims, which I could relate for as long as hon. Members have the time to listen. The textile industry in the east Midlands, and especially in Nottingham, has suffered greatly. The footwear and clothing industries have suffered badly also. However, higher in that league—I am again referring to statistics that have been produced by Nottinghamshire county council—the engineering sector has been hit especially badly. Hon. Members who know Nottingham will be aware of that city's proud history in engineering. In 1979, for example, Raleigh Cycles employed 8,000 people, but fewer than 1,800 are now employed in that great industry.

We also have a defence industry in Nottingham. The royal ordnance factory at Chilwell was once a great employer in Nottingham. Unfortunately, it has closed. The royal ordnance factory in Nottingham itself, which is in Queen's meadow, has now been privatised and the work force there is rightly worried about its future. In my constituency, Thorn EMI opened a plant four or five years ago to produce nerve-gas detectors for the Ministry of Defence, but that plant also is now closed.

Those jobs were not fly-by-night jobs or hamburger and candyfloss jobs. They were highly skilled and highly developed jobs that were performed by highly trained individuals who are now without work. Quite frankly, those people are also without very much hope of getting back into work. I suspect that talk of the competitive element or the vast boost that there has allegedly been to manufacturing industry would wear a little thin if the Minister were to put such a point of view to my constituents. I invite the Minister to come to my constituency and to make those points.

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that one of the factors, and it is germane to this debate, involved in those redundancies and closures—I do not for a moment deny them or the social and personal problems that they produce—is that the quality of work coming out of some of those companies has not been good enough to compete in international markets?

Mr. Allen: I regard that as a great insult to the trained craftsmen and skilled workers who, for generations in Nottingham, have produced high-quality goods. I suspect that the answer lies more in the lap of the Government and with the fiscal and economic policies which they have produced and which have led to higher interest rates and to uncompetitive rates for the pound. Those people in Nottingham have worked all their lives and have not suddenly lost the skill in their hands and brains. They are perfectly capable of producing high-quality goods. There is nothing inherently or genetically wrong with the working people of Nottingham or elsewhere that means that they cannot produce high-quality goods whereas other countries can. The people in Nottingham can do so, given the right climate and the right support.

Mr. Wolfson: I referred to the right management and design and the hon. Gentleman immediately assumed that I was being critical of craftsmen. Perhaps I was being critical of other parts of a business.

Mr. Allen: That may be so. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will elaborate on that later.

There are other examples in my constituency of highly skilled and competitive industries that have suffered in the recent past. The obvious one is the coal mining industry. We no longer have a pit. On the borders of my constituency, we have lost two collieries during the lifetime of the Government. Men who have worked all their lives, proud people who have given a lifetime of service to the coal mining industry, are thrown on to the market. Their prospects of further work are not increased greatly by the investment in the coal industry, much of which will not require skilled labour, but will go into high-tech coal-cutting and coal-processing machinery.

The other area on the frontiers of technology is the Plessey telecommmunications operation. There have been massive redundancies and cuts during the past few years.

A comment was made about the problems in industry that would be created by the repeal of legislation currently inhibiting the rights of working people to organise. The problems in industry have little relation to trade unions and, indeed, working people. Those problems are very much the product of under-investment and perhaps the poor management to which reference was made. Lack of investment, profit-taking and asset-stripping are afflicting my constituency in Nottingham, North. I am surprised that Conservative Members representing the southern half of the United Kingdom speak with such complacency——

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): I do not.

Mr. Allen: I congratulate the few Conservative Members who represent constituencies other than those in the southern half of the north-south divide and I hope that they will represent the interests of a broader spectrum of people than those purely in their constituency. We need every voice to speak up against the Government about introducing a humane economic policy.

Let us never forget that economic policy is there to serve the people rather than to be their master, but within the southern part of our nation 1 million people are currently unemployed. In itself, that should be enough to make Conservative Members kick and scream against the Government's current economic policies, let alone the unemployment, which is way above that recorded in the 1930s.

It is a sobering fact that the image of mass unemployment in the 1930s that is seared into the brain of working people and the trade union movement fades into insignificance when we look at unemployment figures today. The complacency that we see among Conservative Members may exclude their consideration of that awesome image and statistic.

There has to be more to improving our manufacturing base than the current economic policies pursued by the Government, added to the fiddling of the unemployment figures over the past few years. The only way forward and out of the crisis is to invest in resources and training.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Whose money?

Mr. Allen: Let local government spend its own money. Let it spend its capital receipts as it sees fit——

Mr. Taylor: It is not local government's money.

Mr. Allen: Would the hon. Gentleman like to intervene? Otherwise, perhaps he will keep quiet while I am trying to speak.

Mr. Taylor: By convention, I am not meant to intervene.

Mr. Allen: Local government capital receipts are in the trust of local government. It should be allowed to spend that money in the best interests of local people. It knows best how to assist the local population. If local government were allowed to do that, it would be one major contribution to restoring manufacturing industry and the competitiveness of our working people.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): I, too, add my voice in welcoming you, Madam Deputy Speaker, to your new position. I congratulate you and feel sure that we will be in good hands under your control.

I was impressed by the style and delivery of the speech of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) who made his maiden speech only a short time ago. I was glad to see him make this speech more or less without notes because there is a disturbing tendency for hon. Members to read their speeches word for word from typescript. I am sorry that I gained the impression that my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) was doing just that, reading from what appeared to be a brochure from a trade association. Fascinating and enticing though it was, reading from a trade association brochure is not what this place is all about. I am sure that my hon. Friend will not do that on other occasions, because normally his speeches are of extremely high quality.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister for his relentless hard work in recent years on this subject. At the risk of annoying his colleagues, I can think of no one in the Department of Trade and Industry who has worked harder than him. It is a grinding task.

This leads me to the attractive conclusion, which I hope is not complacent, that the Department of Trade and Industry is now much better organised to help industry in a host of ways which are uncharacteristic of the actions of civil servants only a few years ago. I pay tribute to the civil servants and officials in the Department of Trade and Industry for their entrepreneurial approach, which has caused different management attitudes. Management has realised that civil servants are not backward in considering important notions of business development but often know much more about the subjects than they do.

I pay tribute to the maiden speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick), which was disturbingly superb. His delivery gave the impression that he had been here for many years. I am sure that we shall enjoy hearing many other speeches from him on these and other important themes.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North paid tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth and referred to unemployment. He revealed in an interesting way how the Labour party cannot get out of the difficulty in which it found itself during the last election campaign of harking back to the old ideas of the past. I share the hon. Gentleman's acute anxiety about high unemployment and what we should do about it. I have been well known in previous Parliaments for discussing those matters and objecting to Government policies which appeared to lead to high unemployment.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North will concede, I think, that Socialist-run Spain has one of the worst unemployment levels in Europe. Spanish Ministers are going around at ministerial meetings tearing their hair out worrying about unemployment and what to do about it. It is absurd to say, as the hon. Gentleman did with great complacency, that it is not the fault of the trade unions or trade unionists but that it all depends on the Government and management. We all know that we have let the country down in the past couple of decades. We have produced a complacent country and assumed that the world owed us a living, that it was not our job to learn the languages of potential clients, but that they would learn English and we would shout loudly to get our orders, and that everyone else was producing suspect goods whereas Britain was the only country producing quality goods.

There have been several decades of complacency in Government, trade unions and management. Enormous mistakes have been made by management with terrible old-fashioned attitudes—for example, arriving later than the workers at the factories. We are used to the whole syndrome. To say that only two or three sectors are at fault and that one is pristine and perfect is as crazy as my saying that everything was wrong in the trade unions and that management was wonderful. That is not the case. This country has embarked, for good or ill, on what I hope will be a great national co-operative effort to overcome this disease of the past. I am afraid that means that some of my colleagues will have to accept the fact that we need less class conflict in politics and more co-operation.

The reappearance of my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) is beautifully timed. He said that the Government and the Conservative party were committed to the elimination of Socialism. It is not our job to say that, although I am as enthusiastic about the concept as my hon. Friend. It is for the nation and the electorate to decide. We cannot say that our mission in history is to eliminate Socialism; that is a function of the will of the people. We hope that they will reach the same conclusion as us. They will do that only if we produce attractive

Our national share of the vote did not increase last time; it fell slightly. The workings of the electoral system gave us another big majority in the House, but we know that many people do not agree with our policies. We must persuade them. We cannot simply bash them on the head and insist that they accept our policies, telling them that the Labour party is in a mess and that the alliance is wholly split so there is no other choice. We must persuade people of the merits of our policies.

Mr. Allen: I agree that persuasion is all-important. I do not know whether I am due for abolition in the near or the distant future. However, the question depends on our definition of Socialism. I suspect that the definition currently used by the Prime Minister and the Conservative party includes state education and the National Health Service. If that is so, there is great cause for concern.

Mr. Dykes: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not explore those themes. All I would say is that I am committed to the development and to the flourishing of our state education. Indeed, in my constituency the state schools are so good that they are better than most private schools that I know; long may that continue.

We need a different approach—an approach that is reflected not only in the attitudes of other European countries but in those of the far east. For this to be possible, we must surrender something which we regard as a precious gift and which the media love—although, of course its representatives are not here today because it is a Friday—and that is ferocious and savage conflict in politics. It has become heretical to agree with the Opposition, just as they must not dare to say that Conservative Members have made a good suggestion.

On my first visit to Japan two years ago to discuss quality control and so on, I naively asked a Government spokesman, "How many times have you changed this policy since 1947?" He said, "Why bother to change it? It is a perfectly good policy." If we had more compromise in our approach to complex problems in which there is no easy black and white, red and blue and yellow solution, we would begin to make progress. We cannot achieve industrial regeneration and revival with prejudices and false nostrums. We have to get at the truth, and if we are to do that we must surrender some of our time-honoured political prejudices at the margin for the sake of a better result for the whole population. We need more investment in new assets—mainly in the private sector, which has much larger investment potential, but also in the public sector.

My hon. Friend the Minister justifiably painted a rosy picture of our recovery since 1981. However, we all know the uses to which statistics can be put, and I smiled at the Minister's timing. It is true that things are much better, but the Government are inclined always to stay with percentage improvement figures. They say that our output as a percentage of our gross national product has increased faster than that of any other European country since the base date of 1981. It is nevertheless a sobering fact that in absolute and therefore in relative terms the production of our key sectors is still well behind that of equivalent economies in the OECD. That is a matter for serious concern. The Italians, applying the il sorpasso doctrine in certain key sectors, are now producing twice as much steel as Britain. These facts are ignored in the British press, particularly in papers such as the Daily Express and The Sun. We have to bear in mind the immediate small sector considerations as well.

I well remember a meeting with Jaguar recently. Tribute has been paid to that company in the debate in terms of its recovery, quality control, and so on. There has been a great transformation, but it was sad to hear the managing director's answer when asked how many vehicles were actually being produced. It is a tiny proportion of the German output of luxury cars. Again, why cannot a small Rolls-Royce be produced? The demand would doubtless be great, but management is very complacent. I do not mean that as an unfair attack. I am describing a state of circumstances rather than an example of sinful behaviour. Companies in this country perhaps do not consider such possibilities as much as their overseas competitors. There are myriad examples.

I am concerned, too, about certain areas of the retailing industry, particularly in electronics. Here I declare an interest as a director of a large retail group. For some reason, in contrast with manufacturing industry, some areas of retailing in this country are very successful. In many ways they are more successful than the United States, which has a considerable reputation. One thinks of the great efforts and achievements of the food retailing sector and the famous names there. One thinks, too, of the prowess, tradition and power of the John Lewis group and the achievements of Marks and Spencer and groups such as my own dealing in electronic consumer durables. In recent years, for the first time, retail groups have become heavy investors in new equipment and assets. In some areas they have overtaken manufacturing industry in this respect.

My hon. Friend the Minister referred to the revival in production and output since 1981, but there are still nauseating problems arising from what I would describe as the doctrine of the reluctant supplier. Retailers are on their knees begging suppliers of important goods and services, but mainly manufactured goods, to deliver the required quantities. My group recently gave a British company what must be the largest single order for television sets. I shall not go into the details now, but all this is on public record. The British company supplied large sets almost as good—in my view, just as good—as Japanese or Korean sets. That was a good example, but on other occasions the number of sets that can be supplied is woefully inadequate and the waiting times much longer than for Japanese sets. That is why the Japanese and Koreans are coming in to supply electronic consumer durables in this country.

The Government's policy of welcoming import substitution is an important factor in the aggregate industrial regeneration of this country, but why is management still so complacent? I sympathise with the problems faced by an impatient work force wanting to get on with things but often prevented from doing so. Those attitudes are changing, but the problems will be resolved only with full co-operation and mutual respect, with the Government acting as a catalyst, rather than by the corrosive injection of conflict still evident in our political and socio-political system. If we can overcome that problem and emulate the compromise approach of other countries, we shall get much further.

Mr. Allen: I am curious to know what part in the new consensus the hon. Gentleman envisages for the young unemployed on youth training schemes, some of whom are now to be conscripted to schemes on pain of losing their unemployment benefit, the 8,000 unemployed in my constituency of Nottingham, North and the 4 million unemployed in the rest of the country.

Mr. Dykes: I do not say that we should slavishly copy other countries or that the solution is always over the horizon, but presumably we must search for the successful solution that the Japanese have found to that grievous problem. They have built up their economy, becoming heavy investors in new assets and high technology, with low unemployment and some temporary protectiveness towards industries at the germination stage. That is the basic answer, but the question more logically should be directed to my hon. Friend the Minister. I am sure that in due course he will reply on that.

While the reluctant supplier disease is still with us, opportunities now are much more attractive and greater because the far eastern producers are beginning to have their own problems of rising labour costs, adverse currency movements and perhaps even greater social pressures than they had in the past. We all talk about the wages in certain far eastern countries being lower than those in Japan, but that will not be for very long. The opportunity in this country is even greater for us to do tremendous things if we do not ignore volume and just go for quality, as one or two of my hon. Friends suggested. We should combine both quality and volume. The quality enhancement produces the volume increase potential.

The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) has left the Chamber. He said that he had to depart, so we understand that. In his concluding remarks, with which I do not agree, he referred to the need for trade marks and brand names. While I would agree with him that the "Made in Britain" designation is important and that many consumers both here and elsewhere may want to have that on their goods, I do not think it should be compulsory.

I agree with the various judgments of the European Court and other EEC agencies that the danger of that kind of compulsion is that it is a restraint on trade within the Community. France did have a compulsory trade mark system, but I am not sure of the latest state of play in other EEC countries. The European Court is right to pronounce against that and to encourage merely the voluntary registration and usage on equipment of national trade marks or brand names, if people desire—I am thinking mainly of trade marks. If people want to put trade marks on their equipment, that is fair enough, but national compulsion is quite wrong.

With my antecedents and interest, I am naturally attracted to the idea of a European Economic Community trademark, but again I am not sure that even that should be compulsory. We live in an increasingly independent world, where consumers increasingly know that various products are put together in different countries under one label and that labels are less meaningful now. My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford referred to consumer protection legislation. Labels are not necessary, provided that consumers have the right in a shop or store to ask where a product is made, or is mainly made, because international assembly and delivery means that products are often not made in just one country. I hope that there will be increasing Europe-wide agreement on that and in due course world agreement, but that will take much longer.

Consumers must be presented with the highest quality. That is now improving, partly thanks to Government policy, but not wholly so. Managements now have less complacent attitudes, and I hope those attitudes are also fixed on quality control. The situation will improve provided that we get the aggregate management of the economy right and provided that this ceases to be an under-investing country. Although the figures have improved slightly in recent years, they are still woefully inadequate—I am thinking mainly of the private sector, but also the public sector, which is also a very important investor in new assets. If we solve those problems over the next few years, we will not need to talk in superficial political terms but begin genuinely to represent the interests of our nation.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): It was rather sad to listen to the opening speech of the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams). He really was making bricks without straw. He was fighting the last election—a lost election—again. Do I perhaps do him an injustice? Was the Front Bench spokesman of a party that claims to be the party that represents manufacturing industry creating a facade to conceal the fact that throughout his speech there were only two of his colleagues listening to him? That shows the genuine interest of the Labour party on the subject. If I may say so, my old friend can make better speeches than that. He was unfairly critical of my hon. Friend the Minister. I suggest that, when he reads Hansard, he might feel that he could have made a speech much more in line with his normal excellent speeches.

The right hon. Member for Swansea, West talked about Japan. He said that Japan had succeeded in going up market with better quality and lower prices. However, he omitted the vital fact that there were no Luddite trade unions in Japan. That was our great handicap for more than three decades after the war. Fortunately, that handicap has now been reduced.

I am sorry that I had to miss about 40 minutes of the debate to deal with a constituency matter, but I came back to listen to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) saying that Conservative Members know nothing of the real facts of the north-south divide and that we are mainly for the south. He was not in the Chamber to listen to my hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) who comes from further north than Nottingham. She made a speech extolling what is happening in her constituency instead of whining about everything being wrong. The voice of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North was that of authentic, unreconstructed trade unionism and the public showed what it thought about that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) made a clear and good speech. I am sad that my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) found it necessary to criticise him in his absence. It is not the sort of thing that one does. He had an opportunity to criticise while the speech was being made if it was necessary to do so.

I believe that the time for compromise policies and politics is long past. We suffered that for 30 years and look at the mess we had. Firm policies have got us out of that mess and, clearly, the majority of people accept that we need strong sensible policies.

During the speech of my hon. Friend the Minister I intervened to speak about standards. The British Standards Institution has a good reputation. I had to deal with it as a manufacturer and, subsequently, as a Minister. I served on a couple of its sub-committees on one occasion. I asked my hon. Friend the Minister whether there was anything that could be done to speed up the process of decision-making. He said, fairly, that much of the work of the BSI depends upon consensus. I suggest that consensus reached in six months is probably just as good as consensus reached in two years. The trouble with many people who man BSI committees is that they are professional committee sitters and they have no real sense of urgency. I should like to make a concrete suggestion to my hon. Friend the Minister that he call in the leadership of BSI and ask it to set a time at which a new or revised standard should energe from the machine. That would concentrate the minds of those who are sitting on the committees. A target date is extremely important because that is another angle on quality. We need quality of decision and quality of effectiveness and we are not getting that from the BSI.

I spent some 20 years in manufacturing industry, based mainly in the north and Scotland, and I know the real problems. I watched the installation of new machinery. It was rubbish of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North to talk about under-investment, because hundreds of millions of pounds have been spent on new investment and, in many cases, the attitude of the unions has negated much of the potential benefit of the new equipment, machinery and so on.

Mr. Allen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I will give way shortly.

One of the other problems involved in the installation of new equipment is that in so many cases it produces a reduction in the labour force. I remember going to the Austin Rover factory and seeing a man in a room sitting pressing a button every 20 seconds. I said, "That is a marvellous new machine." They said, "Yes, the job that one man is doing was done by 18 people before that machine was put in." We must recognise that, of necessity, the installation of new equipment will remove people's jobs. They need retraining or new jobs.

I do not accept the other point made by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North about hamburger jobs. A lot of good work is available in service industries, so it should not be despised in such a way.

Mr. Allen: Is it not a fact that, in many cases, the failure of private industry to invest properly over a long period led to the state — the hon. Gentleman, me and the taxpayer—having to bail out such companies, certainly in the immediate post-war period, so that they could be revitalised? Is it not also the case that such industries, many of which are being sold off by the Government, are now handing back to individuals the investment that the taxpayer put into them? I do not know whether such individuals are of a different generation from those who got us into the mess in the first place. Perhaps private investment is not the be-all and end-all, as the hon. Gentleman said.

Very often, hamburger jobs are low-paid and involve long hours. They are jobs from which the Government have removed the protection of wages councils. Does the hon. Gentleman say that that is the way forward for the 4 million unemployed?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: The hon. Gentleman will find that most unemployed people would rather have that sort of job than stay on the dole. The attitude of the unions that he represents is keeping far too many people on the dole by preventing them from taking useful jobs. I do not propose to change my mind on the matter.

I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's earlier point. He spoke of the post-war years. He may have forgotten that in the post-war years there was no investment. Of course, many industries had run down. The real trouble is that the Labour Governments, excluding the Attlee Government, were incapable of taking decisions. They allowed more and more overmanning and messing-up of our industries. We had to examine the problems in the coal, iron and steel industries and in the railways until a firm grip was taken on them. The steel industry is now virtually in profit.

Mr. Alan Williams: I do not know why the hon. Gentleman is going down that path. Does he understand that there have been only two peaks of manufacturing investment in the post-war period? The first was in 1970, at the end of the Wilson Labour Administration, and again in 1979, at the end of a period of Labour Administration. Far from having a period of under-achievement in investment in such industries, if only the hon. Gentleman's Government had sustained the level of investment that they inherited in 1979, we would now have an industry that invested £10,000 million more than it has. The best year of investment still only equals the level of 1961, a quarter of a century ago. The hon. Gentleman should not lecture hon. Members on investment.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I had not used the word "underachievement". My abiding memory of the last Labour Government was 20 per cent. inflation, which the right hon. Gentleman will know meant an average of over 12 per cent. throughout the entire life of the Government of which he was a member.

Mr. Williams rose——

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: If the right hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I shall not give way again. I am sure that other hon. Members wish to speak.

Mr. Williams: Is it not the normal practice of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if an hon. Member goes out of his way to attack an hon. Member, to give way again if the hon. Member wishes to answer?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): It is a convention of the House.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I gave way when I attacked the right hon. Gentleman. When I give a statistic, I am not attacking him. The right hon. Gentleman is getting a bit touchy, which is out of keeping with his normal equable self.

I have watched the installation of new machinery. In many cases, it leads to a reduction in the work force. I have listened to people denigrate the need to keep to delivery dates. I have heard people say, "We'll deliver the merchandise when we are ready." They totally forget that it might be required by a set date and that by the time they deliver the ship will have left the docks. The merchandise will be useless and the repeat order will never come because overseas customers have been let down. The quality of service is as important as any other quality.

We must remember that the customer is king. If we do not produce merchandise of a quality and at a price which is acceptable to the customer it will pile up and remain on the shelves. That in itself will produce unemployment.

We are fortunate in that many of our great companies will not accept merchandise of a quality below that which their customers will accept. The customer decides what is needed.

I remember talking about quality, or lack of it, almost a decade ago, when many people asked, "What is the point of working overtime because so much money is taken away in taxation?" It was difficult to refute that argument. One of the causes was the change from wage freeze to wage inflation and perhaps the feeling that production might be more important than quality. Some companies recognised that the cost of putting in the quality control would add considerably to the cost of the merchandise and they were not certain whether the market would bear that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen spoke about Jaguar. That is a fine example of a company which has been almost completely transformed. Once it produced an unreliable vehicle with an appalling after-sales service, but now it produces an excellent product with a very good after-sales service. As my hon. Friend said, people are queueing up everywhere to purchase that car.

We can see in the progress of production and quality the outward beneficial effects of Government financial policy on the industries which have been taken out of the bureaucratic public sector and put into genuine public ownership. Employees have shares of their own company and receive dividends. They respond that much better to the need for greater and better production—greater in volume, better in quality.

Lower direct taxation is a definite encouragement to people to work harder. They receive more money and can keep more of it in their pockets because the standard rate of tax has come down. Those who say that they do not want tax reductions but more public expenditure are arrogant. Their view is certainly not shared by those who work hard to earn their money.

Mr. Allen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: I have already been very generous to the hon. Gentleman. He will perhaps forgive me. I have already given way to him four times and he has interrupted every speaker from the Conservative Benches. I hope that he will forgive me. I am not being discourteous. I want to finish my speech as I do not like making long speeches.

Those people who accept that point of view ought to realise that they have no right to speak for others. If they do not want to take that extra money, they can give it to charity. However, they have no right to deprive others of the benefits that the Government's financial policy are producing.

The quality of the civil servants in the Department of Trade and Industry is extremely high. They have done a very good job in producing basic background material for those in industry who want to improve the quality of their merchandise and cater for the wishes of an increasingly sophisticated consuming public. I pay tribute to the Minister's staff in the Department of Trade and Industry and to the staff of other Government Departments who co-operate in trying to take us forward in that way. That is the correct way forward and for that reason the debate has been very useful.

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate on the importance of quality in manufacturing and international competitiveness.

This debate has clearly ranged widely over that subject and other factors affecting the economy. This is an area in which the Department of Trade and Industry, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) has just said, has played a very full and effective role as a stimulator for good practice and a clearing house for information about that good practice.

I also want to pay tribute to the Minister's specific contribution in giving leadership to that activity which shows the role that the Government can and should play in supporting initiatives that industry must take, but where Government support is needed to make progress. I also welcome the fact that, despite the thinnest of thin Houses on Labour Benches, this has been a debate in which, as well as controversy, there has been a considerable measure of agreement on some of the fundamentals involved in achieving higher quality.

It has been clear from this morning's debate that by quality we mean a whole range of non-price factors including good design, technological innovation, reliability, delivery on time and the quality of after-sales service.

If British industry is to continue increasing its competitive position, as it has been doing with signal success over the past four years, the need continually to improve quality is clear. If any business wants its customers to return, it must ensure that its products and services are not criticised. In so many instances in the past it has been the quality of imported goods, not price, that has attracted British buyers. There is the example of motor cars from Germany, Japan, France and Italy, but especially from Germany and Japan. The quality and reliability of the product put British manufacturers at a disadvantage until they started to put matters right.

With audio-visual equipment, for example, the important factors are reliability of quality and the ability to deliver both in quantity and quality. The reliability of products, especially those manufactured in Japan, has had a devastating effect on our industry. That could have been avoided, and steps are being taken that demonstrate real improvement.

Another example is to be found in household white goods such as washing machines and smaller items such as irons, toasters and other kitchen equipment. In the past, German and Italian products have made heavy inroads into the British market. So often the quality of British goods was lacking, while the quality of German and Italian products was higher. The producers of furniture for kitchens and bathrooms from Scandinavia, Germany and Italy made large inroads into markets supplied by British goods, and there was no good reason why British manufacturers should not have been competitive in quality. As so many have said today, quality requires an input from management, designers and the work force. It is a job for all three within an economic environment that effectively the Government have set over the past eight years. We are seeing the pay-off in the way in which British industry is now working so much more effectively. I do not dismiss, however, many of the problems that have been raised by Opposition Members. On the other hand, I cannot accept the doom-and-gloom view that suggests that British manufacturing industry is not in many instances making supremely effective strides towards occupying a far more effective position.

If the number of faulty products gets out of balance, jobs are exported. There lies a key factor in the overcoming of unemployment and the maintenance of a strong balance of payments.

The quest for quality binds together a number of priority tasks for British business and the Government over the next four years, and specifically in the immediate future. I shall list some of the priority tasks. First, secondary education must be reformed so that schools turn out youngsters who are better equipped than in the past, with basic capabilities for the world at work. So important are the attitudes that are instilled in school towards quality of work. The satisfaction of a job well done, the experience of successful activity, the feeling that a game has been well played and the achievement of a good report all help a young person to fit into the world at work and contribute, when his time comes, to ensuring that the quality of the product in which he is involved is high and that it is saleable both at home and abroad.

The second priority is the establishing of closer links between higher education and business. We must ensure that universities and polytechnics produce more science and engineering graduates. More people must be encouraged to take jobs in the wealth-creating sector, especially in manufacturing.

A reputation for quality, which industry can often demonstrate, has a real attraction for graduates. Some of the most able have been discouraged from entering industry on graduation—this is one of their views, and one of many—because of "bushfire" problems. In the days when management was dealing almost continuously with industrial relations problems, many able graduates did not want to be involved. They wanted more readily to get into an industry in which they could concentrate on improving productivity, design and marketing, making the industry more effective as a world beater and not always having to deal with industrial relations problems. I recognise that such problems were the result of faults on both sides, but they were also partly due to the lack of the legislative framework which the Government have now put into place, and which I believe now contributes to a calmer atmosphere.

Mr. Pike: I do not wish to pursue the industrial relations aspect, but I think that the hon. Gentleman has hit on an important point—the reluctance of people with ability to be attracted into management in industry. People should be considering jobs in industry as well as jobs in the City, because industry is vitally important to the country's future. People have been particularly reluctant to go into industry recently, and I hope that the trend improves.

Mr. Wolfson: I am delighted to have the hon. Gentleman's support for my remarks. I agree entirely about the necessity for more people to take jobs in industry. The calmer atmosphere in industry may encourage more people to become involved in an industrial career, rather than choosing the City or the professions.

The third priority for Government and business to work on together is the improvement of skill training so that the present shortages and rising costs can be overcome. It must be accepted that training is vital throughout the working life of people operating on the shop floor, in supervision and among management. No one can accept that the good practice that they learn at one stage in their career will necessarily be suitable later.

The fourth priority is to encourage more investment in research and development, and the increased application of advanced manufacturing technology. I hope that the Minister will have something to say on that vital issue. I know that the Government are actively dealing with it, but there is some disquiet as to whether enough push and support is being given.

The final priority is to persuade Whitehall and the town halls, the Health Service and others in the public sector to think British and to cut down on unnecessary imports, while promoting the competitiveness of British industry.

Those priorities are bound together under the flag of improving quality. The need to drive incessantly for quality improvement involves the whole work force in any company. Every member of that work force has a deeply rooted interest in the objective of quality, and—as we have seen in the House—it is not a matter for political argument or special interest debate. Shareholders, managers, supervisors, work force and customers—all of them involved with the prosperity of a company—have a deep involvement and interest in ensuring that the quality of that company's product is improved. Individuals working in the company have a major interest, for their own security and job satisfaction.

Other hon. Members have mentioned the importance of quality circles and suggestion schemes which involve the work force in giving advice and taking decisions about the way in which the job is run. Job satisfaction and commitment to quality are increased when members of the work force feel that they have a stake in the company's achievement, and that their views are properly listened to by management. It also gives them an opportunity for further personal development and increases their scope for fulfilment in the work that they are doing.

I shall mention here an example of one company, which I chose because it highlights some of the points that I have made again and again. It is one of the case studies in the Department of Trade and Industry booklet "The Case for Quality", which disseminates good practice among many companies. I refer to Greendale Electronics. Dr. Roy Followell, one of the team at Bradford university carrying out Government research into quality control methods in industry, has said:

> "Greendale Electronics has achieved a great deal in a short time by the successful application of statistical methods of quality control."

What were some of the main factors involved in this company? First, the managing director had a clear objective, based on his experience in international and British business, to drive for high quality. That main drive was towards educating and motivating the work force. It has not been easy, but, after two years, his view is that he has infused a highly satisfactory relationship throughout the work force, because he was used to an egalitarian, collaborative relationship from shop floor to the board room. That is crucial for the effective development of high qualty standards in industry.

Better run meetings at which successes and failures were properly discussed is another example of that, as it produces a constant flow of information which is then linked by the company to bonus and productivity schemes and share options. Self-discipline is encouraged. For example, a scheme of self-certification for illness was introduced and immediately brought a marked reduction in absenteeism.

Being able to trace performance back to individuals as well as to materials and machines has proved to be an essential part of quality assurance. Originally, it encountered resistance, but ultimately those involved in that activity came to understand its importance to the company as a whole and therefore to their future prosperity and benefit. I hope that the House feels that it is not unreasonable to utilise such an example, as it demonstrates how fundamental those points are to achieving high quality in British industry.

My final priority, that of getting Whitehall, the Health Service, local government and everyone in the public sector to think British, leads me to what I want to say about partnership sourcing—and I am not referring to dating agencies. Partnership sourcing means the involvement of the user with the supplier to raise standards. Examples of this have been given by other hon. Members. United Kingdom sourcing can be of benefit to everyone. It makes Britain more competitive in overseas markets. It ensures a more competitive and effective position for British companies serving the British market.

Government, the CBI and the National Economic Development Office all recognise the vital importance of improving business performance in terms of obtaining a larger share of the home market, and increased British sourcing helps to bring this about. It means adopting constructive purchasing policies and cultivating good, two-way relations with suppliers and potential suppliers of the products of services and other business needs. Of course, that increases the availability of alternative suppliers to British business.

Finally, I should like to talk about two aspects of partnership sourcing. I have already referred to the first, which is thinking British. That means being prepared to look among other products for one that is made in the United Kingdom and to buy it if it equals or beats those other products on price and non-price factors. That is a better approach than any "buy British regardless" philosophy and is accepted as correct by the Government and the CBI.

The second point about partnership sourcing is positive purchasing, which takes the philosophy a stage further. It means conducting purchasing procedures within a company to increase the abilities of that company's suppliers. That can be done by encouraging them to participate in regular dialogue about longer-term needs and future likely orders, involving them in setting the specifications and the use of approved standards, which have been mentioned by many other speakers. Far from giving special preference to those companies, positive purchasing seeks to make businesses genuinely more competitive. As we know, most examples of it so far are from the large companies. Marks and Spencer plc was the market leader in that area but other companies are increasingly doing the same. It is important to encourage medium-sized companies to do the same thing and to take a leaf out of larger companies' books.

Public purchasing policy is crucial. I hope that the Minister will confirm the Government's continuing commitment to use British sources when the Government are involved in public purchasing, provided that those British sources are competitive on quality and price with overseas sources.

I value the opportunity to take part in the debate and am grateful for the indulgence of the House in doing so.

1.12 pm

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): I want to apologise first to the Minister for not hearing all of his opening remarks. I apologise also to many of the hon. Members who have spoken because I have been dashing in and out doing various business.

I am absolutely delighted that we are having such a debate today because it gets to the heart of our future as a manufacturing country, to our industrial relations and to the type of society in which we live.

If I may digress for a few moments before addressing the issue of quality and competitiveness, if we are to put this discussion into its proper context, we must understand the decline that has taken place in our manufacturing industries over many years. The trouble in this country is that we all became extremely complacent because at one time we were the workshop of the world. We led the way and were the first great capitalist manufacturing country. Our competitors had to catch up with us. We had always done things in a certain way. Those running and owning industry, as well as those engaged in it, felt that we had found the best methods and that little change was needed.

I regret, for example the passing of our great motor cycle industry. We have only the dregs left and that is an absolute scandal. Our motor cycles were the best in the world. If we are discussing quality, I must point out that our workers produced the best manufactured goods in the world. There is no question about that and I hope that I can say so without any contradiction.

Last night some hon. Members may have seen an extremely interesting programme about the P and O line. For much of my life I worked on the shop floor in the shipbuilding industry. The old ships have all gone. Modern ships, despite their quality, are not in the same class. They are not ships, as we understand it. The old ships had real quality. The beautiful first-class lounges, the first-class accommodation, the restaurants and all the other things on those ships had real quality. I was one of those carrying out such work in my early days.

The Chamber has high quality woodwork. Would such a Chamber be built today? No, because it would be argued that it would not be competitive and that one could not build such things because nobody wants them any more. The job might be done under certain circumstances if people decided that it did not matter how much it cost because they wanted real quality.

Does not quality sometimes come up against the nature of the competitiveness of our society? Can one have the real quality goods, and at the same time the present competitive society? Do not profit and competitiveness stand in the way of real quality at different times? I am not suggesting that we should not have the best quality in our present competitive society, but there will be a problem in future.

Will competition, profit-making and cutting corners to make more profit be the future of our society, or will we create genuine quality of life? Is not that important? William Morris had the dream of a society with quality of life, where the building worker went home at night feeling that what he had produced was a great work of art. Do building workers go home now feeling that they have created a work of art?

In my constituency, I was a joiner at the Royal Oak pub and I put up all the oak panelling in the pub. Then the modernists came along. They did not like the oak panelling, so they tore it out and put in plastic. With it, to make more money, came the machines to produce the music, so that no longer can people have a nice quiet drink in a nice pub. Their ears are blasted off. They cannot talk to each other. It is an atmosphere of modernisation. Is that quality of life?

We are destroying the quality of life because of the nature of the society in which we live and because profit and competition, the capitalist mode of society, are destroying everything that is decent and right. That is what I am concerned about. When we talk about quality, let us talk not only about the quality of the product but about the quality of life that we produce for our people.

The hon. Member for Sevenoaks, (Mr. Wolfson) talked about the need for skill training. I know about that. I spent five years as an apprentice. It would have been seven, but the war came along and my apprenticeship ended. I found myself in the Royal Air Force, in which I spent four years. I want skill training, but it is interesting that some of the big companies with their own training schools got rid of them because they were not profitable enough. We are sometimes diverted from the realities of society when we talk about quality and international competitiveness.

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West) rose——

Mr. Heffer: If the hon. Gentleman does not mind, I shall not give way. Perhaps he would like to answer my points in his speech.

As for international competitiveness, we were complacent because we had been the workshop of the world. It was obvious that the Germans, the Japanese, the Americans and everyone else would not only catch up with us but pass us. They did so, but we continued in the old way.

We often hear people attack workers, saying that if only the workers had not gone on strike and if only the industrial relations system was such that workers were tied up—just as they are with the present industrial relations machinery—all would be well. But much of management did not change when it ought to have changed. Management let time pass and said, "It has always been done like that, the money has always come in like that, so do not do anything about it." I challenge Conservative Members who put that argument. When real changes in industrial techniques were put to the trade unions after serious discussion, so long as they were not imposed on them, nine times out of 10 agreement was reached, changes were made and there was little industrial disruption. Industrial disruption occurred when working people had conditions imposed on them without proper debate and discussion. Let us return to talking about real equality.

I believe in good design, but what is it? I have explained what I think about the design of modern pubs. It is unbearable, yet I am sure the people say that it is good design, that it is profitable, so we should have it. As for good design in cars, our cars were not accepted abroad, not because the quality was bad but because of press reports about them. I am sorry if hon. Members think that the quality was bad. If they think that, they have fallen for what the press said, not that there are many members of the press in the Strangers' Gallery at the moment. Those who wrote for the motor car columns were responsible. Every time a new product was produced, it was knocked. That point was picked up by our competitors who said that British cars were not worth a light.

British motor cars, especially Rovers, were some of the greatest cars ever produced. They are still among the best cars. It is a scandal that our cars were knocked by a press that was and is irresponsible towards the industry. Workers are knocked all the time as though they are responsible for every dispute and as though every dispute is unjustified. People have not understood that workers in other countries are told by their employers that they must not take industrial action because, if they do, they will be uncompetitive with workers in other countries. That happens in the United States where people want to put up barriers between themselves and the rest of society. The unions and others say, rightly, "We cannot have competition on the basis of others coming in and taking our jobs."

I believe that the matter goes to the very heart of our society. I do not believe all the nonsense that is talked about British Telecom doing so much better now that it has stopped being a publicly owned company and has been sold off to all sorts of shareholders. If people are so pleased with BT, why did I read in this morning's press that there are more complaints about BT's services and prices than ever before? I am sure that we shall find that that happens with gas and all the other industries that are to be sold off, too.

Sooner or later, we have to choose. We have to decide what sort of society we intend to build and live in. Are we going to have a society with genuine equality of life in which people have the chance to better their quality of life collectively or a society in which people do that individually at the expense of everybody else? Is that what we want?

I want a society in which we all gain. I judge a society according to the rung of the ladder which those at the bottom have reached, their quality of life, their security, their future and their hopes. If we are to build a society of genuine equality which is not obsessed with the concept of internal and international competition, we must change our basic philosophy. We must get rid of the philosophy of this Government. We must use public money in the interests of the public and recreate publicly owned industries—this time on the basis not of bureaucratic structures but of the democratic involvement of the work force and democratic management.

That is what I believe and that is all that I have to say. I may not have been dealing with every aspect of quality control in the factory. However, while some of the Conservative Members who have taken part in the debate have been bankers or directors, working at levels which I shall never know, I came to this place from the shop floor. Apart from my years in the Royal Air Force, I spent my time working on the shop floor, in the ship repair yards and on the big construction sites. The great argument throughout was real quality versus profit. How did the time and motion study people help quality in industry? They did not. They undermined quality but helped to create competitiveness and profitability. If we are serious about building a new society and a new world, it is high time that we got rid of the profit-making system and built one worthy of us all.

Mr. Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): It is a privilege to follow the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), to whom we always listen attentively. What worries me is the way in which he muddled slightly the quality of life with the lack of competitiveness. We cannot improve the quality of life for the people of this country if we do not compete in the world, at least on level terms.

The hon. Gentleman talked about his role in industry. Let us compare the state of British Steel today with what was happening 10 years ago. Today we have quality. British steel is in worldwide demand and we must try to increase our quota from the European Community. That was not so 10 years ago and it was not so with Jaguar seven or eight years ago. Eight years ago I was a member of the European Parliament, and I tried to persuade that institution that it would be right and proper to have a quality British car in the car pool. Six months later, Jaguar was out because it did not compete with the quality of German and other cars in the car pool. Those who deserted British motor cars in the 1960s and 1970s in favour of overseas products did so not because they were traitors or had been misled by the media but because we had a reputation for failing to produce quality vehicles.

Where does that situation stem from? Looking back to the 1940s, there was a natural attitude at the end of a war when we were exhausted. The hon. Member for Walton spent five years in the Royal Air Force. I spent my time in the Army, and I remember coming home in 1945 almost feeling that the world owed us a living. Throughout the 1940s and 1950s, due to the pent-up demand created by the war, it was possible to coast along producing goods which would sell whether they were any good or not.

In 1946, I bought the first civilian model Volkswagen. I paid £160 for it and drove it back to this country. People in this country had never seen anything like it, but when management had the opportunity to produce those cars in this country they turned their backs on the idea. There have been faults on both sides, but that was entirely the fault of management.

In the 1950s and 1960s, there was a combination of bad management and disruption in industry, leading to the appalling situation in the early 1970s. We all have memories of the "One out, all out" attitude, the cries of "Are you with us, comrades?" and mass meetings in the fields. Any attempt to impose proper quality control in the motor industry and to bring people to book if they did not observe it provoked that reaction. Shamefully, up to last year 56 per cent. of cars bought in this country were from overseas.

Reference has been made today to the old slogan, "Better buy British", but we must be clear where the emphasis lies. It must be a better buy because it is British rather than suggesting that one had better buy the product just because it is British. That must be emphasised not only in this debate but throughout industry. We cannot stand aside from the theme of competitiveness. In the 1960s and 1970s, wherever we looked in the world — not just Japan, Germany and France, but Taiwan and Korea which were already coming up — we saw our manufacturing base being eroded because those countries were producing goods not just at the right price but of the right quality.

What fascinates me and gives me great hope for the future is that in the 1980s a new attitude is emerging in our industry. I am glad to see that my hon. Friend the Minister responsible for sport has joined us at this point as yesterday I chanced to have lunch with the director of Dunlop—one of our major companies. He told me that for the first time in years Dunlop goods were increasingly being produced in this country because we are competing in both quality and price with Taiwan, Singapore, Japan and Germany. That is the message that we must take on board. If we continue on that path, we shall indeed achieve a better quality of life. Why has the quality of life in Germany improved so dramatically in the past 30 years? It is not that they have forgotten how to produce quality goods — they have done that increasingly; they have always produced quality goods—but that they produce competitive goods. The more the value of the deutsch-mark goes up, the more competitive they have become.

For the first time in 50 years we are seeing that slogan of "Better buy British" coming through strongly. We should all be proud of that because it indicates, for the first time since the last war, a genuine partnership between management and labour, working to produce goods for the benefit of their own families, their own companies and the country as a whole.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the Minister have the leave of the House to speak again?

Mr. Butcher: I am grateful for an opportunity to make a few further comments on a number of the important issues that have been raised in what has been an informative and searching debate. I listened carefully to some formidable contributions, including a maiden speech about which I will speak in a moment.

When the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) examines the record in Hansard I hope he will agree that in my opening remarks I made it very clear that the devastating comment made to our delegation that went to Japan—devastating because of its candour—implied that the British were not capable of doing the business and not capable of catching up with their obsession with quality. When he examines the record I hope he will find that we are not in disagreement, that we have the same objectives, and that the quality message is not an ephemeral or recent obsession of the Government or the previous Administration. It is something that we are reaffirming, enhancing and expanding, and it has been based on the knowledge of a few central truths about quality that have been with us for quite a while.

It is for that reason—building on that information—that the Government have targeted an objective of getting the quality message across to 100,000 companies. We are about halfway there now. If we reach that target, we should have an example of quality management present in virtually every sector—in large or small companies—in most towns and cities. We hope that that will have a multiplier effect in changing the culture on the shop floor.

My hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) summarised the debate skilfully. She concluded that an obsession with quality means an improvement in the job situation — it safeguards existing jobs and reimports jobs back into the United Kingdom that we may have exported in the past through a lack of concern about quality.

The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) made a fine speech. If he does not mind my saying so, it was a speech of the old-fashioned Labour party—a speech made by someone who had great experience on the shop floor. I suspect that he will talk to the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) about his new club, which is apparently dedicated to solidarity to the origins of the Labour party. I agree with him and with the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) that quality is not something that can be imposed by management. It is something that happens in partnership with participants from all sections of the work force. By its very nature, it can work only if participation is full-blown and committed.

I am pleased to report that prominent trade unionists are involved in our national campaign. In companies around the country true partnerships are being set up, across what used to be the great divide, to get the quality message over.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) made an excellent maiden speech. He vigorously defended the interests of the hosiery and knitwear industry and he illustrated the point I made in my opening remarks that — and I choose my words cautiously—if we can keep the current trend going into the 1990s we will be able to describe what happened as a British industrial renaissance.

My caution extends to recalling that there are international factors that a domestic Government can often do very little about. However, on the premise that the current trends continue, we have a real and major opportunity for a fight back in the international markets and the reconquering of certain sectors of our domestic market. I suspect that my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth will be a vigorous defender of his constituents' interests, particularly those who work in the hosiery and knitwear industry.

A similar point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) who used this opportunity to praise, rightly, the efforts of Rolls-Royce, which has confirmed yet again through the massive export order that it has announced in the past 24 hours that quality means jobs.

My hon. Friend the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) asked us to bring forward the privatisation of British Steel and made a number of other points. I would like to thank him for the kind remarks he made before he had to leave to look after the interests of his constituents. My hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) made a number of pertinent comments about the British security industry whose performance on quality objectives has improved.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) made an interesting speech. I should say immediately, in response to his request, that I have visited Nottingham a number of times. One of the visits incorporated the opening of an excellent exhibition in the Nottingham chamber of commerce, which vividly showed me that there is much dynamism in the local economy, that Nottingham business men are forward-thinking and that they are building new industries and using new technologies to preserve the prospects of their existing industries. I share with the hon. Gentleman what I presume is an objective of all hon. Members, which is to see that the prosperity that is now starting to accelerate in our country is shared in all parts of our country. I believe that we have a real prospect of that happening.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) pointed out that quality is about team work. He identified some of the trends that could lead us to be optimistic about the future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) hit on a sore point. There have been times in the past when I have asked why we cannot guillotine the standards-making process in order to clear a few minds and introduce a greater sense of urgency into the excruciating process. The BSI committees are setting strategies for their sectors of interest and that includes targets. The use of standards is voluntary and it is important that consensus is maintained, so that the standards that emerge are recognised and used by industry. I listened carefully to my hon. Friend's comments and I will examine them in greater detail when I return to the Department on Monday. It may be that one or two of the items he raised can be considered on future agendas with our partners at the BSI.

I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) that the automated manufacturing techniques programmes are successful. There is a supplier industry emerging in the delivery of AMT technology to the shop floor. It is a new industry and one in which we can take our existing skills forward to build a brand-new industry. My hon. Friend will know of the large amount of work we have done on skills shortages and I know that in the past he has welcomed the development of the new partnership between the higher education sector and the private sector. I am sure, having read my skills shortage report, that he will agree that it is starting to lever a significant spend from the private sector. A total of £43 million-worth of public money went into engineering and technology, levering £24 million of additional spending from the private demanders of the skills for the higher education sector.

The hon. Member for Walton made a vintage speech. We enjoyed listening to his reasons. They come from his convictions and his roots, and we respect them. But I ask him to consider the fact we are talking about the integration of the concepts of quality and competitiveness. One comes from the other, one depends on the other, and one leads to another. In this part of the 1980s, one must compete to sustain the quality of life that he would ask us to achieve.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, West (Mr. Spicer) reasserted our national objective of improving the quality of British goods and services.

Before I conclude my remarks—hon. Members wish to return to their constituencies or launch into the next debate—I shall make a major point on the matter that was raised by my hon. Friend about the entrepreneurial approach of DTI and its officers. As I said earlier, the quality message can apply to all types of companies and organisations; for example, those engaged in manufacturing and services, and even public administration. There is no reason why the lessons learnt and the experiences gained in one part of the economy cannot be used in another. The principles are the same, although the methods of implementation can and often do vary.

I take this opportunity to highlight some of the quality activities within my Department, as evidence of our commitment to the quality drive. One of my Departments divisions, quality design and education, which is responsible for the campaign, has been exploring ways in which it can apply the principles of more effective quality management to its work. It is the first time that such principles, which in the past tended to be focused on manufacturing, have been applied to a central policy division of the Department. As part of its programme of improving the efficiency and effectiveness of its response to its customers—for example, industry and commerce, the general public and other Government Departments —and improving its internal operational performance, it has been reviewing management procedures and communications, looking at ways of reducing the quantity of paperwork, providing better training, and reviewing ways of improving support services such as typing. In addition, two quality circles have been set up. Although it is only a short time since the approach was introduced, operational benefits are coming through.

[Mr. Butcher]

Referring briefly to other parts of the Department and examples of quality activities, all the Department's research establishments have now been accredited by the national measurement accreditation service which, as I mentioned earlier, assesses and monitors the competence of test calibration laboratories. NAMAS, in turn, has adopted quality procedures and, as a method of involving employees, has also set up quality circles. The National Physical Laboratory is in the process of adopting standardised management systems. Most recently, the companies registration officers have adopted the principles of quality management. In addition, my Department has provided the necessary funding for a two-year consultancy to help ourselves and other Government Departments to examine in detail what more can and should be done. As Minister responsible for management resources in the DTI, I support that work.

My Department will now identify further areas for the introduction of such procedures within the administrative work in the Department, with the aim of improving the efficiency and effectiveness of sections that have regular contact with members of the public and users of DTI services. I think you will agree, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that it is right that my officials and the DTI should be involved in such procedures and that we should do as we say others should do. I am delighted to have had this opportunity to announce that that is precisely what will happen.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Hays Wharf

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Alan Howarth.]

1.49 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I am grateful for the opportunity to bring to the attention of the House the development of a small but significant part of London — Hays wharf. I am glad to see the Under-Secretary of State in her place and I welcome her to her new office. I know that she is interested in the subject and I am pleased that the traffic problems did not make her punctual arrival too much of a tight squeak.

In my first Adjournment debate in 1983, when I was first elected to Parliament, I talked about planning along the riverside of our capital city. I referred in particular to planning for the south bank of the river from Waterloo to Surrey docks, in the centre of which is Hays wharf. The Minister will be aware of that debate. Her predecessor dealt with the issues in a good and long debate. I was joined by my parliamentary colleague and neighbour, the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman), who cannot be here today. I apologise on behalf of my other parliamentary colleagues and neighbours who cannot be here. They are aware of the debate and I shall refer to their views. Southwark is represented by all three major political parties which, unusually, are broadly in agreement on this issue.

Hays wharf lies between London bridge and Tower bridge, between the river and Tooley street. In the last century that area was the subject of the great fire of Tooley street. The part adjacent to London bridge is now developed to a substantial extent in the area of the old St. Olave's house and what is now called London Bridge City. The whole of the site is owned by the same company—St. Martins Property Corporation Ltd.—developers for the Kuwait Investment Office, an arm of the Kuwaiti Government and royal family, so it is not in public ownership. This debate concerns the current planning applications and how they should be dealt with.

In January 1982 the Secretary of State for the Environment granted planning permission, on appeal, for the redevelopment of part of the Hays wharf site including 750 sq ft of office space, 50,000 sq ft of shopping space and 35,000 sq ft of residential floor space. He refused to grant planning permission for proposals involving 1,320,000 sq ft of office space and considered the height of the proposed 30-storey building excessive and its relation to surrounding buildings unsatisfactory.

Since 1981 we have been in an unusual position because this part of my constituency comes under the London Docklands Development Corporation and is not governed by the normal planning processes under which a local authority makes the decision. The LDDC is the planning development control authority and is governed by the 1980 Act which set up the LDDC and its planning powers.

In 1983 the LDDC submitted development proposals for the Hays wharf area to the Secretary of State for approval under the provisions of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. Phase one included over 1 million sq ft of office space and phase two over 1·2 million sq ft of offices, housing, shops and open space. The local council and the GLC objected to the proposals because they believed the process to be undemocratic and inappropriate for that development and decision.

Secondly, they said that the uses did not meet the needs of the local community. Thirdly, they said that it involved an excessive office element. Fourthly, they said that it did not comply with the criteria on design set out by the Secretary of State in his letter of January 1982 and that, in any event, it was not an appropriate development, given that the council was about to draft a local plan.

A public inquiry was requested by the two local councils concerned. In the event, in July — the same month that a debate was held on the matter in this House — the Secretary of State approved the proposals for redevelopment submitted by the LDDC under a special development order. Planning permission was granted for the whole site. Five applications including detailed proposals for phase one — which effectively has now been developed — and outline proposals for phase two were then submitted by St. Martins Property Corporation Ltd. in September 1983 and permission was granted in January 1984.

Phase one is now effectively complete. In technical terms, three applications now lie on the table for the major part of phase two. A park is being developed and the work on that has begun near to Tower bridge on the south side. There are also three separate planning applications. In essence, I want to deal with the central application and the Minister will have anticipated that.

The major element of the new proposal that has gone to the LDDC is a detailed planning application for more than 1·2 million sq ft of offices, 306 parking spaces with a basement car park, a riverside walk, alterations to the local highways and the formation of a side and low level walkway on the site bounded by two small local roads, Morgan's lane and Weavers lane. A local council estate, the Bethel estate, would be demolished — in fact it has just gone — and listed buildings would also have to go. The floor space does not differ from that which was approved. I want to make it clear that in planning terms I am not basing my argument today on the component parts of the application. My view is that we already have too much office space in that part of my borough and we need other things. However, I am aware that that is by no means the crucial argument and issue before the Government or the LDDC.

The issue now is the physical layout, massing and appearance of the proposal. That is very different from before and includes land previously allocated for residential use. The proposal is probably unique in the history of planning applications in Britain. I believe that if it were granted, it would be for the largest volume of building in London.

When my late and much lamented colleague David Penhaligon was in the House, he inquired and was told that it was quite proper to produce a plan for the House. I have asked for and been given a copy of the proposed plan. It would be helpful if I showed the House the nature of the design because it is monstrously large. As we look at the plan, on the Minister's right we can see Tower bridge. On the left there are buildings which have now been completed along the riverside. In the centre is the plan of the proposed building. That building is intended to be in the style of this building. However, its total tower height is as high as the tower housing Big Ben. Its whole mass is many times bigger than this building. It is also the same height as St. Paul's cathedral. Therefore, on the south bank we would have a massive modern building that was made to look like this building. I guess, if it was built, that some visitors would think that it was this building because it would look more like the Palace of Westminster but be bigger. The very nature of the building and the cheek of its design as well as the sheer volume and other objections all raise serious and national issues. I will leave this plan on the Bench before me for a moment and show another drawing to the House — which the Minister may have seen — which is useful in terms of comparison.

There is a drawing which shows the projected building against the river with Tower bridge in the background and another that shows its height relative to Tower bridge and St. Paul's cathedral. It is a massive, monstrous building. Since the LDDC sent out the application for consultation it has not received an overwhelming number of statements of support. Indeed, no statements of support have been received. There have been several specific objections, however, as well as a few neutral comments from those who do not think that the proposal affects them.

I shall describe the building and then take up some of the criticisms that have been made by those who have expressed objections. An American architect has produced the design for, in all likelihood, one American client, which is probably a bank. The design is described as being "related to traditional English architecture".

It certainly is. That is the nature of the design. It is described as being "loosely based on an enlarged Houses of Parliament".

There are two large blocks arranged in the form of a U that are open towards the river with a private courtyard. There will not be a thoroughfare or roadway. The description continues:

> "The blocks range in height from 6 and 8 tall storeys facing the river to 11 storeys further back, with two 17 storey towers (330ft high) in the middle."

Such a building would dwarf the area, where it is not as if it is one that does not have other buildings and sites of significance. The two most obvious are Tower bridge and the Tower of London. The officers of Southwark council concluded that the proposed building would have a devastating effect on the historic and cherished local scene by its impact on the river front, on Tooley street, on the urban grain and historic fabric of the area, on the Tower of London and on Tower bridge. I am sure that the Minister will appreciate the council's conclusion that the proposed building would also fail to satisfy the design criteria established by the Secretary of State in his decision in 1982 and in the outline permission granted by the LDDC in January 1984.

The general public will be excluded from the large area occupied by one building and will lose the enjoyment of the river. An attempt has been made to provide a riverside walk, but the open space and the streets around the site will be of low amenity value because all the surrounding public areas will be dominated by the overwhelming presence of an enormous building. Anyone who sits in the park or walks along the river walkway or road will have a huge building towering above him. Depending on where he is, the individual will be in the shadow of the building for most of the time.

The council concluded that any future changes in technology or the location of the banking sector could result in a redundant building not easily adapted for other uses. If a building is constructed to one specific client's design and the client's needs move on, one is left with a building that may have no continuing use. We are talking about something that could be the largest palatial off-white elephant that London will have seen. If we have difficulty letting other blocks in London such as Centre Point, there will be even more difficulty with the proposed building, especially if the bottom falls out of the big bang and the banking sector in the years to come.

Lastly, the original planning consent, which included the specific floor area to the exclusion of height and, therefore, volume, was given in ignorance of the current demand for increased floor-to-floor heights and its consequent effect on bulk. The result of trading practices is that the height between floors is much greater than the original proposals. Although there are relatively few tiers of windows, they are all several floors in depth in terms of the floor height at the Palace of Westminster.

That is the nature of the application. It went before Southwark council for consultation and unusually—this illustrates the importance of the issue—the planning committee arrived at all-party, unanimous agreement. Southwark is a Labour-run borough and my alliance colleagues are the opposition. The Conservative group is the third party. There was a recorded vote of 11 to nil.

It was decided that the LDDC be informed that if the council were the local planning authority for the determination of the three applications, permission would have been refused in all cases, and that in the light of the substantial departure of the application from the special development order submissions of 1983 and outline permission of 1984, the council requested that the Secretary of State call in the proposals of phase 2 for public inquiry, and that then steps be taken to alert the public to this. It was moved by the Chair and duly seconded that the council opposed outright the proposals contained in the Hays wharf phase 2 development proposal.

The floor space is the same, but the volume other than the floor space has increased dramatically because of the increased height. Originally, there were to be several small structures; now there are effectively two, but made to be constructed as one. The LDDC submission to the Secretary of State in 1983 stated that the height should correspond to the height of existing buildings and to the grandeur of the riverside, and should involve an intensive development but of medium height, the majority of buildings being seven storeys high, with a maximum height of 15 storeys. Those proposals have clearly not been adhered to. The height of the two towers exceeds by over 40 metres the maximum height specified in the outline permission of 1984, and the proposals on which the Secretary of State previously based his decision.

The proposals involve the demolition of two listed buildings, in particular 3 Vine lane, which the outline planning permission originally required to be retained. I understand that the design was changed in the latter part of 1986. The present proposals were received on 7 April of this year and, according to the present timetable, should go before the LDDC committee in the autumn. The LDDC asked in April for more information from St. Martin's, which is expected but has not been received.

The responses to consultation have been unanimously critical. The Minister will appreciate the significance of the bodies that have responded so far. The Docklands Consultative Committee, which is a committee of the local boroughs, says:

"The height and bulk of the building signal an insensitive over-development of the site. The external design . . . can only realistically be described as an 'architectural whimsy' which is unfortunately contemptuous of everything around it."

The borough of Tower Hamlets and the City of London Corporation, which are opposite the development, oppose it. The corporation says:

"The height and bulk of the towers would be over-dominant and unduly bulky and out of scale with the general development on the South Bank. Although the design of the buildings would be traditional in concept . . . their scale would be deceptive, almost grotesque."

The Royal Fine Art Commission has been asked for its views, and has said clearly that it is very unhappy. The commission is

"profoundly uneasy about the building's bulk, scale and lack of a convincing style. The bulk of the building is too large for the site and impossible to relate to adjoining buildings . . . It will overwhelm the existing buildings along Tooley Street. The commission believes that the planning consent which included a specific floor area, to the exclusion of height and therefore volume, was given in ignorance of the current demand for increased floor-to-floor heights and the consequent effect on bulk. The planning status should therefore be re-examined. In its symmetrical and palatial form, the present project disregards the existing street pattern and urban grain, and imposes its own overbearing presence. To double the scale of the buildings"— this may be one of the most significant phrases of all—

"is fraught with danger. There is the grotesque possibility that the new development may make the Tower of London—" which has been there for centuries—

"across the river, look like a garden folly."

So massive will the building be that the Tower of London will look like one of those mini villages that can be seen in holiday resorts and other tourist centres.

"The Commission is convinced that the relationship between the new development and the Tower of London in terms of both scale and axes has not been adequately considered. The project lacks authenticity and genuine style. The Commission acknowledges the architect's interesting attempt at symbolising the power and glory of commerce . . . but finds the effect cosmetic, where it ought to be intrinsic; and an imitation of the past where it ought to be a re-interpretation and a transformation which expresses our time."

When it was finally asked to look at the revised scheme, it said:

"The Commission does not believe these changes to be sufficiently fundamental to alter its view."

English Heritage, the guardian of our built heritage, said:

"The proposed large office blocks do not comply with the Secretary of State's requirement that development 'must be subordinate and complementary to the Tower and Tower bridge'. The two proposed towers would be excessively dominant and intrusive in the riverside setting."

English Heritage said about the demolition of 115 to 121 Tooley street:

"the design currently proposed does not yet seem to me to be satisfactory and I do not consider that consent should be granted for the drawings which show these designs."

About the demolition of the Anning and Chadwick warehouse it said:

"the retention of the listed building deserves more consideration in the light of the Circular than it appears so far to have received."

Perhaps most anomalous of all comes an objection, perfectly proper constitutionally, from within the Department of the Environment itself. Its Royal Palaces Secretariat, when asked for its view on behalf of the Tower of London, said:

"We wish to register strong objections to the main block of buildings comprising part 17, part 11 and part 6 floors. In particular, the towers rising to 99 metres are greatly in excess of what was agreed by the Secretary of State on 6 July 1983 when the tallest block at that time proposed was to be no more than 57 metres high.

In the Department's view the height and bulk of the proposed buildings, if permitted, would seriously affect the setting of the Tower of London. The scale of storey heights with two actual storeys contained within each apparent giant storey height and the vast scale of the detail of the separate parts of the facade contribute to the main problems of height and bulk so that as a whole, and in detail, the effect on the Tower of London will be adverse.

The main impact on the Tower of London would be felt from Tower Bridge, where the fine panoramic view to the west would be dominated by the new blocks on the left. This would by comparison dwarf the Tower of London on the right. From the Wharf footpath the new blocks would be very dominant. Being about half the distance from the Tower they would appear roughly twice the height relative to the Guy's Hospital tower . . .

The new towers would also impinge on the seclusion within the Tower of London. It is noted that from at least two positions they would be seen to rise above the roof or embattlement level and have a seriously adverse effect on the sense of being surrounded by medieval and historic buildings."

If people in or visiting the Tower will no longer be able to appreciate properly one of our prime national medieval treasures, there must be something wrong.

My political neighbours share my concern. They have not looked at all the documents that I have accumulated this week, but I have spoken to both of them and they both have reservations about the detail of the development. There are all sorts of reasons why I hope that the Minister will realise that this building should not go ahead. For example, there is a risk of an enormous wind tunnel through the centre of the blocks and out into the areas around. The line of sight from the observatory in Greenwich across to St. Paul's cathedral will be interfered with. It does not agree with the only statutory plan for the area, the Greater London development plan. It will have an adverse effect on the neighbouring communities and the chances of their proposed development.

The whole matter raises further the question whether it is appropriate for anybody, let alone for private commercial gain, to be allowed to erect a building that looks like this one. It is unacceptable for somebody to make a pastiche on this building. We are hesitant about the portcullis being used on souvenirs for sale outside the building. The biggest souvenir would be a building like this one, but out of the control of the House.

Lastly, I believe that if the ultimate owners of the site, the Kuwaiti Government and royal family, were to be aware of how sensitive this site is, they would not be at all happy at people acting at several arms' lengths on their behalf intervening on London's skyline with this design in such a way.

I had a difficult choice. I had to decide whether to ask for the decision to be taken by the LDDC, the planning authority, or to ask the Minister and her colleagues to consider whether it would be appropriate for the scheme to be called in and for the Government to hold a public inquiry and then make the decision. I have come to the view that it is so important a site and so grotesque a plan that in London's interests, and in the national interest, we must have a call-in by the Secretary of State and a public inquiry and that, at the end of the day, the scheme must be rejected. I hope that today's debate will have alerted the country to the danger and disadvantage to London if the scheme goes ahead.

2.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Marion Roe): First, I should like to thank the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) for his kind comments and his welcome for my appointment.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey on securing time for a debate on development at Hays wharf. I note that the last occasion this subject was debated on the Floor of the House was about four years ago. The hon. Gentleman has put forward his points with his customary clarity. I have listened with care to his speech, but those points to which, on a re-reading of the debate, I have inadvertently failed to respond, I shall deal with in a follow-up letter.

Before I refer to the background and the particulars of the Hays wharf development, I must make it clear that I am necessarily constrained in what I may say about its second phase. The hon. Gentleman appreciates why I cannot comment on the merits of planning applications that are now before the development control authority lest I prejudice my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's consideration of any appeals or call-ins that might come before him in due course. Equally, I cannot comment on possible schemes that might themselves become applications.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the significance of the site and briefly outlined the background to the developments attached to it. There is no doubt that Hays wharf—now better known as London Bridge City—is a very large and important site. It is strategically important because of its proximity to the City of London, and environmentally because of its riverside location opposite London's most frequented tourist spot, the Tower of London. Phase I—on the part of the river frontage nearer London bridge—is now all but completed and is proving to be a remarkable success story.

There is a long history attached to the redevelopment of Hays wharf since it ceased to be operational in the late 1960s, but progress was slow. I do not wish to dwell on the planning background because it was covered in the debate four years ago. Nevertheless, it may be worth reminding ourselves that a number of applications for the site went to a public inquiry in January 1982, soon after the London Docklands Development Corporation was established. As a result of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's decisions, the developers worked with the LDDC to produce revised redevelopment proposals.

The LDDC subsequently submitted proposals to my right hon. Friend for redevelopment of the area under section 148 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. After carrying out the procedures fully in accordance with the provisions of the Act, my right hon. Friend approved the proposals in outline subject, inter alia, to the approval by the LDDC of the siting, design and external appearance of the buildings and other matters set out in the Town and Country Planning (London Docklands Urban Development Area) Special Development Order 1981.

The LDDC approved the detailed application for phase I of London Bridge City in early 1984. Work on phase I, which runs eastward from London bridge, began in 1984 and its 120,000 sq m of mixed office, retail, residential and leisure accommodation is now substantially complete and let. When occupied, it will provide nearly 5,000 jobs.

[Mrs. Marion Roe]

Outline permission for phase II to extend the development of London Bridge City to Tower bridge is extant by virtue of the consent given by my right hon. Friend in 1983. That development would provide 151,000 sq m of mixed use accommodation and nearly 6,000 jobs.

New applications were submitted to the LDDC in April this year for outline consent to alternative proposals for phase II. Furthermore, the major part of the site is the subject of a full application seeking both outline and detailed consent. The LDDC is considering those applications, and, for reasons that I have already given, I must take special care over what I say.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the call-in procedures under section 35 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 and asked about the criteria against which decisions are made. Most call-ins, that is, planning applications that my right hon. Friend has decided that he should determine rather than the local planning authority, relate to applications for development that the local planning authority is minded to approve and that, in the authority's view, constitute a departure from the development plan. In London that generally means departures from the provisions of the Greater London development plan. Other cases may arise because the development proposal in the application is unusually large, important or controversial.

As announced by my right hon. Friend on 5 May, his general policy is that planning decisions should be left to the local authority in accordance with the general approach set out in the Department's circular 2 of 1981. He intervenes only where there are compelling grounds for doing so, and in general where the planning issues raised are of more than local importance. Such cases may include, for example, those which in his opinion could have wide effects, beyond their immediate locality, which give rise to substantial regional or national controversy, which may conflict with national policy on important matters, and those where the interests of national security or of foreign Governments may be involved.

In the first instance, all objections to and representations about proposed development should be made to the local planning authority where responsibility for considering applications lies. Clearly, there are means of drawing my right hon. Friend's attention to controversial proposals. The hon. Gentleman has used one such means today by initiating the debate. For reasons that I have already given, I cannot comment on the current proposal at Hays wharf, but I can assure him that my Department will keep a close eye on the situation.

I am always surprised at people who appear to resent the success of new developments on derelict land, such as in Docklands, for which there is no viable use in their traditional form. Of course, we all have different views about what should be put in the place of the old use and, of course, we regret the inevitable disturbance that necessarily arises for local interests when wholesale redevelopment is essential.

We must also protect and enhance those elements that are worthy of retention. That has been achieved in the first phase of London Bridge City by a careful blend of old warehouses and strikingly new buildings giving a balanced embankment scene rich with interest, and by the opening up of the river front for public access.

The whole development will open up to the public an important stretch of riverside opposite the Tower. It will create a new and lively social and commercial centre for the south bank. I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman will deny that economic and environmental regeneration is a sine qua non for the welfare of those who live and work in Bermondsey. As to the design of the development, as with any development, views are necessarily subjective.

Despite the sheer scale of redevelopment involved—nearly 24 acres of inner urban land—London Bridge City is a microcosm of what is going on elsewhere in London, yet, from that vantage point, the visitor will see development all around. Immediately downstream of Tower bridge the visitor will see new development on the 93,000 sq m site at Butlers wharf. Beyond, and especially on the north bank of the River Thames, there are extensive, and major developments in the heart of Docklands. Development, in progress and proposed, covers almost every conceivable purpose on a scale virtually impossible to achieve elsewhere, from transport—STOLport and the docklands light railway—housing for sale and for rent, office and commercial premises, hypermarkets, recreational facilities, sports stadium, tourist attractions and hotels. For most of this development the LDDC has acted as a catalyst.

The corporation has so far reclaimed more than 322 hectares of derelict land. Seven thousand new homes have been built, or are under construction, on land in its ownership and £2·2 billion worth of private investment commitments have been secured. This has been achieved at a total cost to the public sector of £315 million. The corporation has entirely transformed the western part of its area in just six years.

Further to the east, but still within the LDDC area, lie the Royal docks, which form the largest single inner-city regeneration opportunity in Western Europe. If superimposed on a map of central London, they would stretch from the Tower to Marble Arch and from Euston to Waterloo. The corporation is currently developing a range of exciting proposals for this area with the private sector.

Across the river to the square mile, new developments rise as the City establishes its modern role, not simply as the commercial centre of Europe but as one of the three trading centres of the world. Not all the buildings are to everyone's taste. Some, such as the Lloyd's building, are controversial. But they demonstrate resoundingly the hallmark of confidence in the commercial future of the nation on which the prosperity of all its people depends.

The Government's confidence in the concept of development corporations is reinforced by our intention to establish new corporations elsewhere. Their purpose is to get things done urgently. Wherever regeneration is vital—not just in the UDC areas—we must ensure that it is not stifled through the over-zealous application of planning controls. The livelihood and well-being of those who live there depend on imagination and investment. At the same time, we must endeavour to protect and enhance those amenities, including our heritage, which people—both residents and visitors—value. This twin approach—conserving the best, enhancing the rest—has been imaginatively consummated in the first phase of London Bridge City. The challenge is to replicate the success elsewhere.

I have not dealt with detail because of legal constraints. For the same reason, I have had to avoid commenting on the phase II site and the merits of the applications. I hope that I have dealt with some of the points and emphasised the importance of new development and investment not only in this part of London but throughout the country.

2.28 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to reply to the Minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Mr. Simon Hughes.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I am grateful to the Minister for her reply. I know of the constraints of her temporary position.

Her reply showed that the law allows the Secretary of State and her other ministerial colleagues to consider whether this matter meets certain criteria. Clearly, it appears from all those who submitted proposals and objections that this is more than an application of local significance, and that it has a national importance. The Minister has helpfully revealed that, if those criteria and others are fulfilled, the applications can be considered by her Department. That is why I brought it to her attention. I think that, when the criteria are examined, people will understand that it is perfectly proper for this matter to come before the Government for consultation, inquiry and decision.

That is the right course. This is probably one of the most rationally significant applications in the centre of London for decades and that is why it merits Government intervention, although the Government are rightly reluctant to intervene on most occasions. Whatever our views about the development of docklands, the Government have to look at a scheme of such great impact——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House now adjourn.—[Mr. Alan Howarth.]

Mr. Hughes: In considering inner cities there are always two fundamentals. We have to meet the needs of the community and provide for work, relaxation and homes, but we must also provide a city in which people can comfortably live and whose design reflects our best traditions. Design and design criteria predominate in this matter and I hope that I shall persuade the Government to accept the view that this amazing application does not fulfill the necessary design criteria for this site at all. I am sure that the Government will want to make the right decision and they now have the chance to do so.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENERGY

Mining Subsidence

1. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Energy what progress is being made by British Coal regarding mining subsidence compensation claims.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Michael Spicer): Since 1984, when British Coal revised its procedures, there has been a significant reduction in the time taken to process the majority of claims, and the number of claims outstanding has fallen by 22 per cent.

Mr. Haynes: May I suggest that the Minister has a look at the cases that British Coal is messing about with? British Coal is walking all over the people who have made claims. It is crushing them like insects. Reviews are in progress and it is now being said that there is no more time. The local hospital is now being messed about with. I warn the Minister that if he does not do something, I will be walking all over him.

Mr. Spicer: That sounds an uncomfortable experience. Of course, I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's involvement in a number of cases, particularly as I have just received a letter from him on the subject. I shall certainly take it up with British Coal.

Let me say more generally that as I was a candidate in the colliery town of Easington for 10 years in the 1960s and early 1970s, I am very much aware of the anxiety and distress caused by subsidence. I certainly intend that we should produce as soon as possible our response to the Waddilove report, which deals with those matters. In the meantime, I am pleased to tell the hon. Gentleman that action has been taken to speed up the claims procedure in anticipation of that response.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Far from walking all over my hon. Friend the Minister, let me take this opportunity of welcoming him warmly to his position on the Front Bench. I am sure that he will bring great distinction to his office.

There is a very real problem over compensation. Is my hon. Friend aware that, in a constituency such as mine, many people are very upset because they find that British Coal is effectively judge and jury in its own cause? It is always British Coal that determines whether subsidence has taken place, which I find very unsatisfactory. Will my hon. Friend bring that problem to bear in his review as quickly as possible?

Mr. Spicer: That will certainly be one of the outstanding matters that must be examined. It is the subject of a number of cases now before us which I am taking up with British Coal.

Mr. Rogers: Is the Minister aware that, during the coal strike, Mr. MacGregor met a group of Members of Parliament and said, in answer to a specific question from me, that the charges for subsidence would be held against the collieries that had created it, and would not be a charge upon other collieries or the industry as a whole? I ask the question because of the peculiar geological circumstances extant in the Nottinghamshire coalfield as compared with, say, south Wales. I do not see why the south Wales colliery should bear the subsidence costs of collieries such as Nottinghamshire. Is the Minister aware of that suggestion, or is it just another of MacGregor's lies? He told enough during the strike.

Mr. Spicer: I shall leave aside the hon. Gentleman's last remark. The whole question of funding and, indeed, allocation is one of the matters that we are having to decide in our response to the Waddilove report.

Electricity Industry

2. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the future of the electricity supply industry.

7. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give an estimate as to the timetable for the proposed privatistion of electricity supply.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Cecil Parkinson): The Government are working to secure a very successful future for the electricity supply industry in the private sector. We are urgently tackling the important issues involved, and consulting widely, and will bring forward proposals as soon as this work is complete.

Mr. Lloyd: The Secretary of State believes that this question is about privatisation. The privatisation of the industry is very important, but the security andefficiency of electricity supplies are at stake. Those factors are of paramount importance to Labour Members. What guarantee will the Secretary of State give that a privatised electricity supply industry will still look to the British sector for its supplies of switchgear, turbines, generators and all the other important equipment, particularly as the Government have already failed to invest adequately in research and development in the industry?

Mr. Parkinson: We cannot force the CEGB to buy British. It chooses to do so because British goods are competitive, because British equipment is good and because it has a long tradition of working closely with the supply industry. If the industry is privatised, there is no reason why that should change, provided that British suppliers continue to perform as well as they do now. I do not believe that the change of ownership need give rise to a change of policy, unless the suppliers fail to perform.

Mr. Baldry: Does not the British Gas experience demonstrate that privatisation is good for the consumer, that it is good for manufacturing industry—in that jobs have been created because manufacturers now pay a lower price for their energy—and that it is also good for the weaker members of the community, such as pensioners, who also now pay less for their energy? Is not the British Gas experience good for the taxpayer, who no longer bears the burdens that face nationalised industries? The sooner the electricity supply industry is privatised the better it will be both for the consumer and the taxpayer.

Mr. Parkinson: It was widely predicted that the only way that British Gas would increase its profits was by shoving up prices, but following the first financial results and the pricing formula that we imposed on British Gas it has reduced its prices by 4·5 per cent. That was because the price of its basic supplies had been reduced, but the benefit of those cost reductions was passed on to the customer, which Opposition Members predicted would never happen.

Mr. Benn: Is the Secretary of State aware that since the privatisation of British Telecom there has been a sharp deterioration in the service, a sharp deterioration in the record of repairs, an increase in profits and an increase in charges——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is concerned with the future of the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Benn: Mr. Speaker, I am drawing a comparison with a privatised industry that has already moved into the private sector where none of the Secretary of State's claims turned out to be correct. Will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that this will not occur when a privately owned monopoly in British electricity is brought into being by a Government who claim to believe in competition?

Mr. Parkinson: I am afraid that I shall have to disappoint the right hon. Gentleman. He is making an unjustified assumption. We recognise the need to introduce competition into the electricity supply industry. That is why we are studying the matter with great care. The right hon. Gentleman would be most unwise to assume that there is only one way to privatise an industry.

Mr. Rost: I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend to the Front Bench and wish him every success in a very challenging job. Will he assure the House that privatisation will not be along the lines of British Gas, but that a formula will be devised that will provide genuine competition and give a fair opportunity to private producers?

Mr. Parkinson: In approaching the subject of electricity privatisation there are many interests to be balanced: the work force, the customers and the public—the taxpayers—as the owners. It is because we are trying to find a way to introduce competition and at the same time to be fair to all those interests that the matter is receiving deep and detailed attention. We are not rushing towards making decisions that have not been thought out.

Mr. Wallace: Given the Government's enthusiasm for privatising the electricity supply system and nuclear power, particularly the PWR, why do they not put their convictions to the test and see whether they could raise on the market the private capital to build the Sizewell plant?

Mr. Parkinson: That is a typically muddled alliance approach to the problem. Until we have settled a structure for the industry and decided on the basis for privatisation such questions are pointless.

Mr. Speller: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on assuming his onerous office, but when considering the future of the electricity supply industry will he consider the potential input of energies that are alternatives to the normal coal or nuclear sources, particularly the amount of value that could be obtained from the many wind generators throughout the British Isles?

Mr. Parkinson: I am tempted to make the obvious joke, but I will not. The matter of renewables and power that is generated from wind is under close study. The House will have noticed that we have commissioned a pilot project to consider power that is generated by the sea and tides. We think that this is an important sector and it will receive careful attention.

Mr. Orme: Is the Secretary of State aware that the question of nuclear power and privatisation will be exceedingly important, particularly the accountability for nuclear power stations? Will parliamentary accountability be removed under any future legislation?

Mr. Parkinson: I cannot imagine any circumstances in which the regulations under which the nuclear industry operates could be weakened or in any way lightened. We recognise the very serious point that the right hon. Gentleman is making, but there is another point. Chernobyl was a wholly state-owned station and Three Mile Island was wholly privately owned; ownership does not decide safety. What decides safety is the safety regime that is instituted and the rigid enforcement of it, which we are determined to do.

Energy Efficiency

3. Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he plans to hold energy efficiency conferences.

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Peter Morrison): I am currently reviewing my Department's plans as to how best I can promote energy efficiency.

Mr. Forth: I welcome my hon. Friend's remarks, but does he agree that the motive for adopting the energy efficiency programmes lies in the savings that can be made, which enlightened management should be able to understand by now? Does my hon. Friend share my suspicions that too many conferences often obscure issues rather than help people to come to rather more obvious conclusions about the benefits of energy efficiency?

Mr. Morrison: I agree with my hon. Friend that savings, profits, the labour force and the customer best promote energy efficiency. At the same time, as I said in my original answer, the Department has had a startling success in the past in making those points and we are looking at how we might make them again in the future.

Mr. Chapman: Does my hon. Friend agree that the design of new buildings, as well as the satisfactory insulation of existing ones, is crucial in encouraging energy efficiency? May I have his assurance that his Department is in regular contact with the Royal Institute of British Architects to promote energy efficiency in new buildings?

Mr. Peter Morrison: I agree with my hon. Friend and, as he will hear in answer to the next question, the design of new buildings is of key importance. If at that stage energy efficiency is taken into account, it avoids many subsequent problems.

London Docklands

4. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Energy what steps are being taken to promote energy efficiency in the development of London's docklands.

Mr. Peter Morrison: London's docklands offer a unique opportunity for demonstrating that buildings can be designed and managed in an energy efficient way.

My Department is liaising with the London Docklands Development Corporation and other interested organisations in order to promote the efficient use of energy in London's docklands.

Mr. Bowden: I am encouraged by my hon. Friend's answer, but when considering energy efficiency in design and the appropriate improvement in building design, will he give some indication of the scale of financial savings and quantify some of the savings that may be achieved, for instance, in docklands by these new improvements in building design?

Mr. Morrison: It is estimated that about £3 billion a year can be saved in the heating and lighting of buildings in the country as a whole. It appears that, on the plans to date of office development, some £20 million a year could be saved in the London docklands.

Mr. Rogers: Although we would all applaud these savings, can the Minister give the House the assurance that no public money will be given to property developers in the docklands, and especially no grants to heat those £200,000 flats, and so on?

Mr. Morrison: Yes, Sir.

North Sea Oil and Gas

5. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current level of production of North sea oil and gas.

Mr. Peter Morrison: North sea oil production in May was 2·6 million barrels per day, the same level as last year. United Kindom gas production has increased over the past few years and in May production was 3·2 billion cu ft per day.

Mr. Douglas: Would the Minister care to comment on how much the 130 million tonnes of oil production exceeds our requirement? Will he take a little look at the future and especially at balancing the needs of the British and especially the Scottish economies to secure employment with the oil and gas reserves available in the North sea? There is considerable well-founded speculation that the Brown Book figures underestimate oil and gas reserves by about 50 per cent. Would the Minister care to comment on that, because these issues are of particular importance to Scotland?

Mr. Morrison: Having looked back, I know that the hon. Gentleman has followed the industry and production on the United Kingdom continental shelf very closely. If I infer correctly from his question, he is asking for a depletion policy. I hope the hon. Gentleman agrees that, on current prices, that policy is more academic than practical.

Mr. Kennedy: What steps, if any, does the Minister's Department propose to take, or to encourage the Treasury to take following the feed-through effect of the welcome, if somewhat overdue, tax changes in this year's Budget? By the time those tax changes work through there is liable to be a gap or sag in the available contracts into 1988 for all the United Kingdom oil industry fabrication yards. Can further steps be taken by either the Department of Energy or the Treasury to ameliorate the effects next year, which will be a very rough year?

Mr. Morrison: As the hon. Gentleman will appreciate, my Offshore Supplies Office is closely in touch with the companies to which he referred. I think that we have a good and close working relationship with them. I have made it clear that I shall keep closely in touch on their behalf with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Rowlands: Does the Minister still believe his predecessor's prediction that we will be self-sufficient in oil until the year 2000?

Mr. Morrison: If the hon. Gentleman had had the misfortune to listen to me in Glasgow two weeks ago at precisely the same hour on the same day, answering the same questions——

Mr. Rowlands: Answer the question.

Mr. Morrison: I shall answer the question. I explained then to an audience and an interviewer that to make predictions of that sort, even if one were an oil economist of the highest level, would be dangerous.

British Coal Enterprise Ltd.

6. Mr. Page asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the latest figure on how many jobs have been created by British Coal Enterprise.

8. Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the latest progress of British Coal Enterprise.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Up to the end of June British Coal Enterprise had helped create 18,506 new job opportunities in 1,399 individual projects. The company's investment of £31·5 million has attracted additional finance from other sources of almost £200 million.

Mr. Page: I welcome my hon. Friend to this portfolio and wish him every success. The figure that he cited of over 18,000 job opportunities is a considerable increase on the last figure quoted to me. It shows that the Government not only care about unemployment but, more important, are doing something about it. In view of that success, does my hon. Friend have any plans to increase this scheme? Are there any targets for which he will aim under that scheme?

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend is quite right. The scheme has shown great potential for the creation of jobs in coal mining areas. In answer to the second part of his question, I understand that British Coal Enterprise Ltd. hopes for an increase this year to an annual rate of 15,000 new job opportunities.

Mr. Ashton: Is it not the case that job opportunities are often different from jobs? is the Minister aware that the figures that British Coal put out were very vague—like the Minister's own figures? Will he give us a breakdown of the figures, constituency by constituency, so that we may establish which are real new jobs and which are duplicated jobs which have merely been shifted from British Coal to private contractors?

Mr. Spicer: I cannot understand why members of the Labour party carp in this way and it has been going on for several months now. The scheme provides great new prospects for jobs in coal mining areas. Why not accept it for what it is? Would the Labour party withdraw the scheme?

Mr. Ashby: Is my hon. Friend aware that many new and very good jobs have been created through British Coal Enterprise in areas of mining decline such as my constituency? Could BCE direct its attention to sites which are becoming disused and which need much work done on them if they are to be brought back into industrial use —sites for factories and so on? BCE could do so much in that area. Could it not take a more vigorous approach to such disused sites?

Mr. Spicer: That is obviously a matter for BCE, but I shall draw my hon. Friend's interesting idea to its attention.

Mr. Barron: How many of the 18,000 jobs have been filled by the 80,000 mineworkers made redundant since the end of the strike?

Mr. Spicer: That figure is not available.

Offshore Supplies Industry

9. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make a statement on the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards support of export initiatives in the offshore supplies industry.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I can assure my hon. Friend that I will be doing all that I can to promote and support the export initiatives in the offshore supplies industry.

Mr. Evennett: Does my hon. Friend agree that a secure home base is essential for exporting? Will he assure me, and the rest of the House, that his Department does all that it can to encourage the exporting industry?

Mr. Morrison: On the latter point, I can certainly assure my hon. Friend that that is the case. The offshore supplies industry has been through a difficult time, but in spite of that it received £2·2 billion worth of orders last year. The domestic market is still extremely strong, and that is the basis on which to build the export market.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: While the Minister is supporting the offshore supplies industry, will he ensure that the various organisations in the north-east of Scotland, with the experience and knowledge that they can bring to the industry, are given an interest in this matter?

Mr. Morrison: I can certainly assure the hon. Lady that everyone—in the north-east of Scotland or elsewhere in the United Kingdom—will be given a proper hearing. However, at the end of the day, it will be for the oil companies concerned to decide, on sound commercial grounds, how to invest and from whom to buy the equipment that they need.

Dr. Michael Clark: Is my hon. Friend aware that ample rumours and a large amount of circumstantial evidence are circulating to suggest that foreign companies that supply offshore services and supplies to this country are being heavily subsidised by their Governments? Will my hon. Friend do all that he can to support British companies which want to export to other oil-producing areas so that we may have a balance of international trade?

Mr. Morrison: I assure my hon. Friend that as far as possible I shall ensure that there is fair trading between countries. However, I should point out that at present 82 per cent. of North sea orders come from United Kingdom-based companies.

Mr. Ernie Ross: What is the Minister doing to ensure that we have a strong home base so that we can take advantage of export initiatives, and what is his Department doing to ensure that skills that are lying unused can be channelled into export initiatives?

Mr. Morrison: As I have just said, 82 per cent. of current orders for the North sea are from domestically based companies. That is a very high figure and has risen from 40 per cent. over the past years. The Offshore Supplies Office is doing all that it can to ensure that British-based companies have a fair share of North sea orders.

Sizewell B Power Station

10. Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy what progress has been made in placing orders for the Sizewell B nuclear power station.

Mr. Parkinson: Orders for the Sizewell B nuclear power station are a matter for the Central Electricity Generating Board. I am advised by the board that as at 1 July contracts had been let to a value approaching £650 million.

Sir Trevor Skeet: I welcome my right hon. Friend to his appointment at the Department of Energy, but I hope that he will show a great deal of enthusiasm for the nuclear industry, which is vital to the United Kingdom. Will he give us some figures for the employment that it has provided in various parts of the United Kingdom, thanks to the policy that the Government have pursued and that the nuclear industry has been able to pursue on its own?

Mr. Parkinson: As my hon. Friend knows, about 20 per cent. of our electricity is supplied by nuclear power stations, and Sizewell B alone should produce an average of 10,000 jobs for the next seven years, reaching 15,000 when the contract is at its peak. It offers the prospect of many very well paid jobs and long-term security of electricity supply.

Mr. Wilson: Does the Minister accept that in drawing an analogy with Chernobyl he scarcely does service to the standards and safety record of the British nuclear power industry? Does he accept that in my constituency there is deep apprehension about the prospect of privatisation of nuclear power stations? Does he agree that it is bad enough to sell off the family silver, but criminally irresponsible to start flogging off the family plutonium?

Mr. Parkinson: The hon. Gentleman cannot have been listening carefully to what I said to the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme). Safety is determined, not by whether a nuclear power station is publicly or privately owned, but by the safety code and the strength with which it is enforced. Britain has a fine record, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that.

Mr. Jack: Will my right hon. Friend do all that he can to ensure that British Nuclear Fuels can take full advantage of the Sizewell project to compete for pressurised water fuel orders?

Mr. Parkinson: British Nuclear Fuels is a very successful company, and 80 per cent. of its business is done overseas. That represented nearly £500 million last year. It is an important export earner. It does a good job and it provides important jobs in Copeland, which the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), who was the Opposition spokesman on the environment during the previous Parliament, recognised and supported.

Mr. Jack Thompson: What proportion of the £650 million is committed to British contractors as against Westinghouse or other American contractors?

Mr. Parkinson: The overwhelming proportion of the expenditure is with British companies——

Mr. Thompson: How much?

Mr. Parkinson: I cannot give the exact figure, but it is well in excess of £620 million of the £650 million. One order for £17 million has gone to Southern Ireland for some steel fabrication, but, apart from that, orders have been placed overwhelmingly with British companies.

Coal Industry

11. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the increase in labour productivity in the coal mining industry since March 1984.

24. Mr. Ward asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are British Coal's latest figures for output per man shift.

Mr. Michael Spicer: For the week ending 20 June, average deep-mined revenue output per man shift was 3·74 tonnes, an impressive increase of about 54 per cent. on the average of 2·43 tonnes for 1983-84.

Mr. Hamilton: Is it not a pity that we did not have similar productivity figures in the coal industry in the past? If we had, there would be more jobs in coal today and miners would be even better paid. Is it not a shame that the Labour party supported every restricted practice that the Scargillite dinosaurs in the National Union of Mineworkers wanted to perpetuate? Has my hon. Friend had any representations from Labour Members on extending flexibility in working practices, for example, by supporting the six-day week?

Mr. Spicer: It is true that in the last days of the Labour Administration productivity was falling, and it is also true that the industry now has an impressive record. It results as much from new investment in the industry as from the closure of uneconomic pits. That investment has been £5·5 billion during the lifetime of this Government, and is currently £2 million per working day.

Mr. Ward: Those figures are impressive, but is it not a fact that they compare unfavourably with some of our foreign competitors? Is not the lesson the need for more investment, more productivity and, above all, support for the introduction of a six-day week?

Mr. Spicer: It is true that many countries produce coal more effectively. Some coal-exporting countries produce coal at over twice our productivity rate. It is also true that it is absolutely essential that we continue to introduce new practices to make the industry more efficient.

Mr. Allen McKay: Does the Minister realise that output per man shift can be achieved by reducing manpower? Does he agree that the magnificent figures that we have achieved—there is no doubt that they are magnificent—are due to a reduction in manpower, and that, therefore, there is an increase in OMS? Following his reply to the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Ward), irrespective of whether coal is cheaper abroad, what effect will privatisation of the electricity industry have on the coalmining industry?

Mr. Spicer: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's first question is yes. The answer to his second question is that it is the Government's intention and objective that British Coal should be so efficient and competitive that there will be no question of its not being able to take on foreign competition.

Mr. Ashton: Is the Minister aware that the proposed six-day week will affect not only miners? Many thousands of people who live in mining villages and mining areas, often in rural areas, will be badly affected by noise, dirt and dust, lorries and Sunday night processions to the pit. Those matters also have to be taken into account, because six-day working does not affect just miners.

Mr. Spicer: Let me be quite clear about this. The six-day working week will mean that equipment, not men, will be working harder. Men will work the same or fewer days in the year, as is the case at the moment. A more efficient procedure for working mines is proposed and this will benefit those mines and the areas around them.

Mr. Andy Stewart: In welcoming my hon. Friend to the Front Bench, may I say that he will be welcome in my constituency when he is ready to make his first visit to a colliery. When he makes such a visit, will he explain to the people who work in the industry that six-day working means not necessarily longer working time but a higher financial return to the miners who produce the coal?

Mr. Spicer: I look forward at some stage to taking up my hon. Friend's invitation. It will not be my first time down a pit, as I was a candidate in a colliery constituency for 10 years and during that time I visited pits on many occasions. Certainly he is right in saying that a six-day working week will make the pits more effective, and it does not mean that men will be asked to work more during any one year than they are at the moment.

Mr. Eadie: The Minister must realise that while we welcome increased coal production it has to be matched by increased demand. A consequence of increased coal production must not be more pit closures. Does the Minister believe that it is fair competition for coal to be imported from Colombia, where it is mined by nine-year-old children? Does he think that coal imported from South Africa is fair competition? Does he agree that the message to the miners must be increased coal production and increased demand, but fair competition?

Mr. Spicer: I would put it slightly differently from the hon. Gentleman. Increased coal production has to be sold. Coal has to be sold as an economic product. I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows that the vast majority of coal imports to this country are special coking coals. It is precisely because British Coal understands that that the Margam pit is being proposed. If it works properly, Margam will provide coking coal that will be an import substitute.

12. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will seek a meeting with the chairman of British Coal to discuss industrial relations matters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Parkinson: I have had an initial meeting with Sir Robert Haslam and intend to meet him regularly to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

Mr. Strang: Does the Secretary of State accept that Opposition Members want to see better relations between British Coal and the NUM, but that one of the continued obstacles to progress is the victimisation of hundreds of miners and their families more than two years after the strike? Is he aware that some of the miners took the advice of his predecessor, went before an industrial tribunal and won their case, but are still suffering victimisation from British Coal?

Mr. Skinner: Come on, you have got your job back.

Mr. Parkinson: And the hon. Gentleman has never had one. Employment is a matter for the directors of British Coal. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (M. Strang) is aware that every case was re-examined after the appointment of Sir Robert Haslam. Representations on behalf of the men by their unions, managers and other parties were considered, and, at the end of the day, the board decided that more than 300 could not be re-employed. That is a matter for the board. However, I am satisfied that careful consideration was given to each case.

THE ARTS

Royal Shakespeare Company

45. Mr. Blair asked the Minister for the Arts whether he plans to meet the Arts Council to discuss the level of future funding for the Royal Shakespeare Company.

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Richard Luce): I met the chairman on 1 July and the Royal Shakespeare Company featured in our discussion.

Mr. Blair: Given that the Royal Shakespeare Company now finds itself in critical difficulties and that the Arts Council has suffered a cut in real terms in the funding that the Government have made available, what plans does the Minister have to extricate the Royal Shakespeare Company from its difficulties, or does he intend to abdicate responsibility for this great cultural institution?

Mr. Luce: There is no doubt about the standard of excellence of the Royal Shakespeare Company. It acquired a deficit of £1 million largely because it had a bad year last year at the Barbican theatre. The Arts Council is negotiating with the RSC about its future funding. There is one point that I should make. The Royal Opera House has reached a three-year funding agreement with the Arts Council, which should give it longer term stability. That could be a good basis upon which the Arts Council and the Royal Shakespeare Company could reach an understanding.

Mr. Jessel: Should we not build on our strengths? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Royal Shakespeare Company is a great national asset which attracts to our shores visitors whose spending generates employment and income in other areas, such as hotels and shops? Does not the RSC deserve our full-hearted support?

Mr. Luce: I agree with my hon. Friend about the important contribution that the Royal Shakespeare Company makes, not least in its tours around the country enabling people who do not usually see Shakespeare performed by the RSC to do so. We give a grant through the Arts Council of £5·2 million. As I said, the RSC acquired a deficit last year arising mainly from losses at the Barbican theatre, and that is a matter for negotiation between the RSC and the Arts Council.

Mr. Fisher: Does the Minister recall that the Government gave the Royal Shakespeare Company financial stability on the recommendations of their own report, the Priestley report, three years ago? The Government having failed to live up to that undertaking, the RSC is more than £500,000 short of the level that was agreed. Do the Government not understand that it is not only a cultural crime to underfund and wash their hands of the RSC, but that it makes no economic sense? Not only did the RSC play to 1·6 million people last year, but it paid back to the Treasury in VAT and national insurance contributions far more than the £5 million that it received in investment from the Arts Council.

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman reminds me of a Dickens character called Mark Tapley who said that it was predicting the worst that kept him so cheerful. That seems to be in line with the hon. Gentleman's character.

Following the Priestley report, going back to 1983-84, the deficit was written off by the Government of the day and the RSC's baseline was increased along the lines of the Priestley recommendation. One thing that was not agreed by the then Minister for the Arts—I think that he was right — was to index-link the RSC at the expense of other clients and companies. That would have been wrong.

Mr. Cormack: Will my right hon. Friend give an assurance that he will not preside over the disintegration of one of our gratest national companies?

Mr. Luce: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's assessment of the company, and I give such an assurance.

Arts Council

46. Ms. Ruddock asked the Minister for the Arts when he last met the Arts Council to discuss the future development of the Arts Council's work in education.

Mr. Luce: I discuss the council's work regularly with its chairman.

Ms. Ruddock: Does the Minister agree that, to build on the excellent arts education in schools, students must be in a position to go on to arts colleges and dance and drama schools? My constituents are currently being denied places in such institutions, despite having appropriate skills and educational standards, because the Government refuse to make such grants mandatory and students cannot afford the fees. Will the Minister, as a matter of urgency, meet the Secretary of State for Education and Science to ensure that the Government invest in that vital area of arts education?

Mr. Luce: I am in fairly continual touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. Of course, the matter is principally one for him. I take the view that the introduction of the GCSE examination is an important basis upon which arts, in the museums and heritage world and in the performing arts, should be drawn in more closely with teachers' work. It is a fact that the Arts Council gives about £320,000 within its education unit to try to get teachers and pupils more interested in arts and heritage. That is the right contribution to make.

Acceptances in Lieu of Tax

47. Mr. Simon Coombs asked the Minister for the Arts if he has any further plans for changing the rules for the acceptance in lieu of tax schemes.

Mr. Luce: There are no immediate plans for changing the present system for accepting items in liew of tax, although procedures continue to be kept under review.

Mr. Coombs: How does my right hon. Friend or somebody else decide to which gallery a work of art that is accepted in lieu of tax is to go? Will he look carefully to see whether the number of galleries and institutions to which such works can be sent can be extended so that all the regions can have a fair share of that kind of product?

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend has made in important point. It is important that our national treasures, from wherever they come, should be accessible and available to people all over the country. It is, of course, for executors to express family wishes. Very often, a family will express a clear request that a particular object of art should go to a particular location. On other occasions they make an express wish, and it is up to me to decide. I agree with the principle that my hon. Friend has expressed.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the present explosion in prices of works of art, which bear little or no relation to the retail prices index, has meant that there is a greater temptation to sell now and that there are fewer funds with which to meet such high prices? Do we not require a fresh examination of the whole basis of retaining works of art in this country?

Mr. Luce: I accept the right hon. Gentleman's analysis that the prices of pictures and objects of art are going up fast. There is no doubt about that. On balance, our procedures for the preservation of important objects of art in this country and the terms of our acceptance in lieu are working fairly well. As far as acceptance in lieu is concerned, we have a reserve fund of £10 million, upon which we can draw, in addition to a budget of £2 million in my programme for helping in that area. We have not yet used that full budget.

Photographers Gallery

49. Mr. Boyes asked the Minister for the Arts when he last visited the Photographers Gallery.

Mr. Luce: I visited the Photographers Gallery on 23 March for the presentation of the Photographers Trust Fund prizes and bursaries.

Mr. Boyes: On behalf of all hon. Members who have an interest in photography, I hope that the Minister will accept that we are extremely grateful that he has made at least two visits to the Photographers Gallery. My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) has also visited the gallery. I am absolutely sure that the Minister has been impressed by what he saw in the Leicester Square gallery. Will he give an assurance that he will give a bursary of some sort to a young photographer to work perhaps in the House of Commons or somewhere else? Such action would encourage photography, which, as everyone knows, is a medium in which all people may indulge at low cost.

Mr. Luce: I know of the hon. Gentleman's intense interest in phtography, so much so that he encouraged me to join in the House of Commons competition.

However, having seen my photographs developed, I am reserving my right whether or not to enter the competition. I accept that photography is of interest to a great many people, and the Arts Council, the regional arts associations and the MSC between them provide something like £1·3 million to help photographers in this country. I hope that the hon. Gentleman welcomes that.

Mr. Baldry: If bursaries are given to photographers, surely that is exactly the type of area where private industry and enterprise can make a greater contribution. What we want as an encore are more speeches similar to the one that my right hon. Friend made last week regarding funding for the arts. What work is being done in my right hon. Friend's Department to consider how photographers in West Germany, Japan and the United States are supported by private enterprise and, indeed, how the arts in general are supported in that manner in those countries?

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The more that bursaries can be funded from the private sector, the better. It is happening all the time. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks about my speech. I only wish that the Opposition would acknowledge that the general election has taken place and the people have expressed their views. The arts world must go along with that, and I am sure that it will benefit from the fact that the private sector can offer a great deal of help in the raising of extra funds. The private sector has a great deal to do.

Leicestershire

50. Mr. Janner asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will make it his policy to increase the level of funding for the arts in Leicestershire.

Mr. Luce: Funding for the arts in Leicestershire is a matter for the Arts Council and the Regional Arts Association. I am pleased to say that the Arts Council has been able to make a substantial increase in its grant to East Midlands Arts for activities in the region.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware of the magnificent work done by both the Haymarket and Phoenix theatres in Leicester and of the hard time that they have because they do not know from one year to the next how much funding they will receive or from where it will come? Is it not part of the Government's duty to ensure that magnificent organisations, such as these theatres, do not merely survive, but know how they will do so?

Mr. Luce: I know that for many years the hon. and learned Gentleman has taken a close interest in these two theatres. I would have hoped that he would welcome the fact—if he did not perhaps already know it—that the East Midlands Arts Association has now allocated £664,000 to the Leicester Haymarket theatre. I would have thought that that would make a major contribution to the health of the theatre. Now that the Phoenix theatre has begun to fulfil some of the conditions that it was asked to fulfil, the East Midlands Arts Association has started to restore funding. I am glad that the county council has contributed £35,000.

CIVIL SERVICE

Top Management Programme

95. Mr. Butler asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will make a statement on the operation of the top management programme.

The Minister of State, Privy Council Office (Mr. Richard Luce): Yes, Sir. The top management programme was established in February 1985 for very senior staff from the public and private sectors. The civil servants involved are generally grade 3. The tenth programme is currently taking place. The programme has been very well received by participants and the organisations which send them.

Mr. Butler: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his reappointment, but may I ask him to ensure that the top management programme places a great deal of emphasis on interchange with the private sector so that civil servants can learn the lesson of Lord Young and how to solve problems rather than always concentrate on the obstacles?

Mr. Luce: The private sector participates in top management conferences and, of course, pays for them. I believe that the fact that the private sector is working side by side with civil servants during those conferences does both sides a great deal of good.

Mr. Janner: Is it correct that no member of any ethnic minority group has taken part in the top management programme? Has a monitoring exercise of any sort been applied to that programme in accordance with the code of the Commission for Racial Equality?

Mr. Luce: Offhand, I cannot tell the hon. and learned Gentleman whether members of ethnic groups have taken part in this management programme, but I can easily find the answer for him. The hon. and learned Gentleman is aware that we attach a great deal of importance to ensuring that there is equal opportunity and that people are promoted into the service on merit. We have undertaken monitoring to see whether we can further the cause of equality of opportunity. However, promotion and entry into the service must be on the basis of merit.

Civil Servants (Initiative)

97. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Minister for the Civil Service what steps he is taking to reward initiative on the part of civil servants.

Mr. Luce: As part of our programme for improving efficiency in the Civil Service we are taking a number of steps to encourage qualities that can help staff perform more effectively in their jobs.

I would, in particular, refer my hon. Friend to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 23 April on our plans for strengthening the link between pay and performance. Those will supplement the schemes already in existence under which, for example, rewards may be paid to staff for suggestions and technical inventions.

Mr. Jones: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that answer and I should like to encourage him in that direction. There are a variety of different schemes that can be appropriately pursued with cash awards. Does my right hon. Friend agree that payment for initiative is as legitimate in the Civil Service as it is in commerce and industry?

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is well aware that we are moving more and more towards performance-related pay within the service. A number of important decisions have been taken on that in recent months. In addition, there is a staff suggestion scheme, awards for the inventors of technical inventions and group incentive schemes. I believe that all that is moving in the right direction.

Mr. Beith: On the question of rewards and initiatives in the Civil Service, is it not important to protect the impartiality and integrity of the service? How will that objective be served by combining in one post, against the recommendations of the Treasury and Civil Service Committee, the posts of Cabinet Secretary and head of the Home Civil Service?

Mr. Luce: I have no doubt about the impartiality and loyalty of the present Secretary to the Cabinet. In answer to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service a few months ago—I think it was in the autumn of last year — the Government made plain their reasons for accepting, on certain understandings and conditions, the combining of those two jobs.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: On the question of initiatives, incentives, rewards and performance-related pay in the Civil Service, will my right hon. Friend reassure me that a higher proportion of engineers and scientists are finding their way into the higher management grades of the Civil Service?

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend puts his finger on an extremely important point. Certainly it is our objective to ensure that that happens. It is also our objective to recruit more people from science and engineering, because the Civil Service is short of such people. It is for that reason that we are introducing a flexible pay scheme that is designed to help the recruitment and training of those people.

Mr. Skinner: I wonder how those initiatives and bonuses will be paid to civil servants. Let us consider, for instance, somebody who works behind the counter at the Department of Health and Social Security, or in the unemployment benefit office. Would that person get more money based on more people being thrown on the dole by this Government, or would that person get more money by reducing the dole queues? Would National Health Service civil servants get an added bonus by closing down hospitals? How would incentives and bonuses be calculated?

Mr. Luce: They would be calculated on the basis of the merit of the civil servants' work and the objectives that they must fulfil. It would be interesting to see what would happen if the hon. Gentleman were to be paid on the basis of merit. However, as far as the Civil Service is concerned, those payments will be based on whether civil servants fulfil their jobs effectively and well. Those who perform their jobs best will be given discretionary awards of one kind or another.

Civil Servants (Training)

98. Mr. Rowe asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will make a statement on the quality and quantity of training for civil servants.

Mr. Luce: Yes, Sir. On quality, our new programmes for senior staff and our plans for young people demonstrate that the Government are committed to high-quality training and development which improves operational performance. Quantity depends on need and relevance. In 1985-86 the Civil Service ran 35,000 training courses and provided 1·5 million training days, an average of three days' training for each civil servant.

Mr. Rowe: Is that not yet another example of the way in which the Government are taking the lead? Will my right hon. Friend turn his mind to considering the ways in which he could persuade industry and commerce, which are far behind our competitors in the quality and quantity of training provided to follow the Government's lead and, possibly, to share some of the resources?

Mr. Luce: I agree with my hon. Friend. One important part of our broad range of training schemes is that we are trying to convey to the Civil Service the importance of carrying managerial responsibility, and we are more and more delegating responsibility through the financial management initiative. Our training schemes are designed to assist in that. Certainly the link with the private sector is of extreme importance.

Mr. Winnick: Are civil servants to be trained to decide which British residents arriving back from America or which American visitors coming to this country have a copy of Wright's book? As the book will be openly on sale in the United States within 24 hours, does the Minister agree that an interesting situation will arise when people can bring that book, openly and legally, into Britain?

Mr. Luce: We have more important things to discuss in relation to training.

Mr. Thurnham: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the strike by civil servants in Bolton over the introduction of YTS trainees? Will he consider ways in which the Civil Service could introduce more YTS trainees, as has the private sector?

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend is right. The YTS is as important for the Civil Service as for anywhere else. Today, only 300 people are involved with the YTS in the Civil Service. However, the Department of Employment is taking a lead in extending the scheme. I am glad that there is an understanding between the Civil Service management and the unions on this matter.

Sub Judice Rule

3.31 pm

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"Government policy in the light of the imminent publication in the United States of the 'Spycatcher' book by Mr. Peter Wright."

The matter is specific because the book is already on its way to American bookstalls and, indeed, because of the time factor, may already be there. It is only hours before it is here.

The matter is important because the Government have spent a great deal of taxpayers' money—if I may coin a phrase — in the courts of Australia, the Republic of Ireland and those within this jurisdiction, although, curiously, not in the courts of America. The capacity of the Government and their legal advisers to suffer judicial black eyes seems virtually inexhaustible.

The matter is urgent because the present Lord Chancellor, before his translation, like a bishop, to higher things, said that he was eagerly looking forward to explaining the Government's policy once the fetter of the sub judice rule was removed. The book, which has been the subject of so much litigation — I have nothing against work creation, even for lawyers, either by the Manpower Services Commission or by any other body —will be on our shores in a matter of hours. Whether or not the Government are right in the latest twist of litigation, the time has surely come to justify the value, or acknowledge the futility, of it all.

The House, traditionally, since at least the time of King Charles, has been the holder of the nation's purse strings. It is sufficiently important that the time has come when we should have the opportunity of saying, "Enough is enough" and when the world of "Alice in Wonderland", where the whole world, except a Briton who does not leave these shores or buy a copy from a traveller from America, can read the book in question is clarified. The time has come to justify this futile, farcical performance.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"Government policy in the light of the imminent publication in the United States of the 'Spycatcher' book by Mr. Peter Wright."

I have listened with care to what the right hon. and learned Gentleman said, but I regret that I do not consider the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to raise a point of order that relates to the sub judice rule as it affects our proceedings. You will know that yesterday, following the decision of The Sunday Times to print extracts of the Peter Wright memoirs, the Attorney-General announced that he intended to bring an action against The Sunday Times for criminal contempt.

The House will recognise that the Government's handling of the affair has allowed moneybags Mr. Murdoch to move in with a big wallet to turn an issue of principle, an issue of official secrecy and open government, into a Fleet street scoop——

Mr. Speaker: Order. What is the point of order? If the hon. Gentleman is successful and in order, he may be able to raise this subject on the summer Adjournment motion.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: This morning I tabled four questions, three of which related to discussions and communications between The Sunday Times and the Government last week. I did that in the knowledge that Mr. David O'Callaghan of Turner Kenneth Brown, Solicitors for The Observer, telephoned Mr. David Hogg, the Deputy Treasury Solicitor, on Friday and told him that The Sunday Times had purchased the serialisation rights——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not, under the guise of a point of order, make a contribution which may well be in order at a later stage, but not now. I can deal with the sub judice rule if the hon. Gentleman will give me that opportunity.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Mr. Speaker, I——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not prepared to give the hon. Gentleman the opportunity to make a speech which he could make later.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I have also tabled a written question to the Secretary of State for answer this Wednesday. I have asked whether the Government intend to issue an amendment to the general import licence, so as to render——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not raise matters of that kind. If he is concerned about questions that have not been accepted by the Table Office, he can ask for them to be referred to me.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am dealing with one thing at a time. The hon. Gentleman can ask the Table Office to bring his questions to my attention. It is not in order for the hon. Gentleman to raise this matter on the Floor of the House in this way. Does he want to know about the sub judice rule?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Mr. Speaker, I tabled questions before the application was made to the courts. I put it to you that my questions are critical, because they deal with public concerns and anxieties. Is your ruling, or any ruling that you may make, likely to affect my right as a Member of the House to table questions to which the public want to know the answers?

Mr. Speaker: I can deal with that. As the House knows, I have consistently ruled that there can be no question of proceedings in the Australian courts being treated as falling within the ambit of the sub judice rule of this House. The same would apply to any proceedings in the United States courts, although I have no knowledge of any such proceedings.

With regard to the publication of Mr. Wright's book in this country, I have to rule that that subject cannot be raised in the House at this juncture. There are four relevant groups of cases pending in the United Kingdom courts.

and all are inter-related. In particular, the appeal of the Attorney-General against the High Court judgment in the case of the Attorney-General v. The Independent, the London Evening Standard and the London Daily News is now being heard in the Court of Appeal. That case raises exactly the same issues as will apply in The Sunday Times case. In those circumstances, the House will not expect me to exercise my discretion by allowing reference to be made to any of those specific cases in the House, or in questions or motions.

3.38 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): You said earlier, Mr. Speaker, that it might be in order to raise certain matters arising from the submission of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) for an emergency debate on the summer Adjournment motion, which is the next topic for business. That is, in a sense, an Adjournment debate. As you cited the cases about the sub judice rule, may I remind you of the plea that you made in another place when you were re-elected, when you said that you had made claim

"by humble petition to Her Majesty, to all ancient and undoubted rights and privileges," their relating to the House of Commons.

I have consulted "Erskine May", which states:

"any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence."

I am putting it to you, Mr. Speaker, very gravely, that from what has come out, whether we read it in an American bookshop, The Sunday Times or The Independent, we now know that senior officials of MI5, in association with Jim Angleton of the CIA, tried to destroy an elected Prime Minister of this country during the 1970s. We also know that when such a charge is made in the United States, Congress brings it out into the open, whereas a British Government use legal devices to suppress the prosecution of a criminal offence brought to public attention by a public servant.

With great respect, Mr. Speaker, no one wants to discuss the vendetta between the Government and the author of this book, but I submit that if you were to rule that in the debate on the Adjournment we could not discuss what has now come into the public domain, the House would be subordinate to what the Attorney-General wishes to do in his legal capacity. I seriously ask you to allow the House to discuss a matter which not only prima facie led to the obstruction of a previous Government, of which I was a member, but which, if it is not discussed now, would make a mockery of us compared with the American Congress, which is bringing covert action of this kind into the public domain because it is manifestly in the public interest.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Attorney-General has informed us that the further appeal in Australia is to be heard on 27 July. As you know, that is after we begin the summer recess. That means that the case will continue in Australia and be concluded, yet the House of Commons will be unable to comment in any way whatever.

I wish to take up the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), because if MI5 officials were involved in destabilisation, in trying to destroy an elected Government and in smearing the Prime Minister of the day, such allegations should be debated by the House. These allegations may not be true and may simply be part of Mr. Wright's imagination, but if they are correct, it could well be that some of the officials in MI5 who took part in such subversive and criminal activities are still in MI5.

If Parliament is told that it cannot discuss the matter, we shall go into recess for three months and the case will be heard during that time. That means that while the country and the press will no doubt have an opportunity to discuss the matter, Parliament will be silent on the fundamental issue of parliamentary democracy. If we cannot even debate serious allegations from a former senior official of MI5 that the Government of the day were subject to destabilisation, that makes a mockery of our parliamentary democracy and our parliamentary system. I therefore ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether we can have a statement from the Attorney-General at the first opportunity, and certainly before the House goes into recess.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps hon. Members now appreciate my request for a shorter recess. I fully understand the principle on which you say that if something is sub judice we should not discuss it, but surely the sub judice rule is designed to protect the rights of citizens who may appear in court and who would not want to have his or her case in any way jeopardised by talk inside the House. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House would support that. However, the Government are now deliberately using the sub judice rule as a means of gagging the House to prevent its debating something of great importance. It becomes absolutely perverse when we know that this matter is being discussed in other countries and that the books will turn up on these shores. Therefore, there might now be a case for you to reconsider the sub judice ruling in respect of this case, because it seems to Opposition Members that the Government are manipulating the office of Speaker by getting you to defend a principle that allows them to gag the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am bound by the resolutions of the House. Let me repeat the rule that matters are sub judice if they are awaiting trial, or under adjudication by any court exercising a criminal jurisdiction, and should not be referred to in any motion—including a motion for leave to bring in a Bill—in debate, or in questions to Ministers. I am bound by that resolution passed on 23 July 1963. If the House wants to change the resolutions, it is a matter for the House. I have already said that I am not prepared to exercise my discretion in this case.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The book which is now to be published in the United States and which, apparently is now being distributed, will arrive in this country shortly. I am concerned only with whether, in view of what you have said and ruled, the book will be made available in the Library and who has control over that.

The book will be available to most of us very soon. I accept that security and the national interest matter. As you will know, Mr. Speaker—because you will have read the report of the Select Committee on Privileges—we gave some thought to what is the security of the state and to who makes the judgment, the Government or others, in approaching you on such matters as the Zircon film. I have studied carefully the statement by the Prime Minister on 6 May, which I have in front of me. The right hon. Lady accepted the information given to her that the allegations made by Mr. Wright were untrue. If we are discussing something that is untrue, how can it be against the national interest for people to read it? So that we can make our judgment, will the book be available in the Library, although we cannot discuss it here?

Mr. Speaker: I have no idea. That will be a matter for the Librarian.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. As I understand your ruling, you are not prepared to accept the use of Standing Order No. 20 or any reference to the case in the debate on the Adjournment. However, would you be prepared to reconsider your decision on how the House might debate the issue if, as the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) said, the book comes into the country tomorrow and is then widely available, but the Government refuse to ban it or to take action in the United States courts? In those circumstances, would you be prepared to examine the whole issue afresh, including what you have said about the sub judice rule affecting not only the particular case in which the Attorney-General is now involved, but the three other cases? That strikes many of us as going very wide of the issue.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) first.

Mr. Benn: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I accept that you are in a difficulty over the sub judice rule. May I put it to you, however, that, according to a proper interpretation of that rule, it might be wrong for hon. Members to comment during the summer Adjournment debate on the conduct of the editor of The Sunday Times in publishing extracts from the book, but it could not be wrong for hon. Members to bring to the Chamber matters which are already in the public domain through The Sunday Times, and which we expect to appear in their full form?

I am only anxious, Mr. Speaker that we should not make a fool of Parliament by an interpretation of a rule that would deny to us uniquely what everyone else in the world is freely discussing, when it affects one of our former Prime Ministers and present Members of the House. May I invite you, Mr. Speaker, to narrow your interpretation and say that no one can refer to whether The Sunday Times, The Independent, The Guardian or the London Daily News is criminally culpable, but make it abundantly clear that we are allowed to speak about matters which touch upon Parliament, and which are now available to everyone —including yourself, Sir—and rule accordingly?

Mr. Faulds: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of your pronouncement a few moments ago, I shall now proceed to the Library and ask for a copy of this book to be made available to me, on the presumption that neither the Prime Minister nor any of the Law Officers can forbid the Library to get hold of it.

Mr. Speaker: That is a hypothetical question, but may I say——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why not?

Mr. Speaker: Because I am on my feet.

As the book is about to be published in America, I accept that this matter creates considerable difficulty for the House. I have already ruled that it is legitimate to raise anything that has come out in the Australian courts, but what should not be raised under our sub judice rules is the action that is pending before the British courts. I said at the beginning of my statement that anything that has come out in the Australian courts is fair game.

Mr. Benn: Or in The Sunday Times?

Mr. Speaker: That is before the courts in this country, but anything that has come out in the Australian courts is perfectly in order, and I do not think that the House needs to be too inhibited.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman wants to be called in the debate, I am not prepared to hear a speech from him now by way of points of order.

Sir Kenneth Bradshaw

3.51 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): I beg to move,

That this House requests Mr. Speaker to convey to Sir Kenneth Bradshaw, KCB, on his retirement from the office of Clerk of the House its deep gratitude for all his devoted work in the service of the House throughout a long and distinguished career.

I am confident that the motion unites the House in paying tribute in this time-honoured manner to someone who has held, with distinction, a number of important posts in the Clerk's Department over many years, and who has held for the past four years, as Clerk of the House, the highest office in the service of the House.

Sir Kenneth Bradshaw will be retiring at the end of August. By then it will have been 40 years, following war service, in which he was mentioned in dispatches, since he joined up, so to speak, in the Clerk's Department. I believe that that is longer than the continuous membership of any hon. Member now in the House.

To have maintained over such a length of time a record of total loyalty, integrity and devotion to the service of the House is a notable achievement in itself. To have done so with undiminished enthusiasm, never failing courtesy, and with, I believe the musical term is such 'brio', is a still greater one.

In particular, throughout his service—both as Clerk of the Overseas Office and in other posts, particularly in the Association of Secretaries General of Parliament—of which, I understand, he is currently the President—he has for many years done an enormous amount to forge international links and friendships between those who service parliamentary institutions. His hospitality and kindness in that work have become legendary worldwide.

Here in Westminster Sir Kenneth's name will also always be particularly associated with his concern throughout his service with improving the welfare and status of the staff of the House at every level. Always patient and considerate in negotiations, he has done much to resolve staffing disputes, like the protracted grading review, which had seemed intractable for many years. The present staff relations in the House owe much to Sir Kenneth's guiding judgment and personal concern. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you will agree that in this, and in many other matters, the House of Commons Commission is deeply indebted to Sir Kenneth.

Another important and lasting contribution which Sir Kenneth, in collaboration with the present Clerk of Committees has made, has been his published work on the comparative procedural workings of Parliament and the United States Congress. This broke new ground and is still recognised as a standard work.

On the less formal side, I understand that Sir Kenneth has been a social pillar of the Parliamentary Golfing Society for many years. With regard to the musical life of Parliament, his vocal style in his occasional interventions in our proceedings once, I recall, led a journalist to describe him as "the last of the bel canto Clerks".

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that every hon. Member here will, as I do, wish Sir Kenneth every happiness in his retirement. He enters it with the profound gratitude of all those who recognise how much the work of this House of Parliament has depended throughout the centuries on the proud traditions of the high office which he has so capably upheld, and which he now hands on to others, maintained and enhanced.

3.55 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): I am happy to join the Leader of the House, and I am sure the whole House, in supporting the motion of gratitude for the distinguished service that has been given by the Clerk, Sir Kenneth Bradshaw.

Sir Kenneth has been a servant of the House since 1947 and has brought to all the offices that he has held in the course of his service that remarkable combination of commitment and dispassion that produces excellence in our British public and democratic administration.

The standard of Sir Kenneth's contribution is made more remarkable by the fact that it has continued for four decades. While it is true, as Lord Wilson reminded us, that a week is a long time in politics, 40 years must be an eternity to be above politics.

In those 40 years Sir Kenneth has performed, as the Leader of the House reminded us, in two spheres that are connected with this Parliament and international democracy. Those services have been distinguished and distinctive. First, it will be within the memory of many hon. Members that he contributed his capabilities as Clerk to the Overseas Office in this Parliament for four years. Further proof of his reputation among our fellow parliamentarians and those who serve them in other Parliaments is to be found in the fact that Sir Kenneth is President of the Association of Secretaries General of Parliaments of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. Both that general involvement and the particular role that he played as Clerk of the Legislature of Saskatchewan 11 years ago means that there can be few among the ranks of Secretaries General of Parliaments who can rival Sir Kenneth's parliamentary internationalism.

Sir Kenneth's second source of domestic and international distinction has been his co-authorship, with Mr. David Pring, of the excellent and now classical work, "Parliament and Congress". The reviewers who greeted the book back in 1972, and its reprint in 1981, commented on the lucidity, scholarship and readability of the book. I can testify to all three of those qualities. Before I went to the United States in 1976—during the recess—to do a series of lectures and television programmes on comparisons and contrasts between our Parliament and the United States Congress I naturally reached for this book, and when I read it its clarity and detail gave me the same sense of gratitude as would be felt by someone who thought that he was climbing on to a life raft and discovered that he had boarded a luxury liner. This work is everything that the reviewers said it was.

My copy of that volume is at home, but to refresh my memory this morning I borrowed the Library's copy. I intend to take it back, which is another breach of convention, later in the day. It is clearly a well-used book, as any hon. Member can see, and it is a testimony to the respect that the book commands among right hon. and hon. Members that, in all of its 412 pages, only one page is marked, and one would exaggerate to call it defaced. On the contents page there is the merest line of a ballpoint pen around one item: "Salaries and Remuneration". Clearly, the book has not only lucidity but utility.

As hon. Members will know, those qualities are not confined to the book. Indeed, they have been the qualities, together with many others, that have distinguished Sir Kennceth throughout our acquaintance with him. I am sure that anyone who has known Sir Kenneth will regard him as a friendly man, an excellent communicator and a complete master of procedure, utterly dependable in his judgment and advice. For all those reasons, but most of all because of the distinguished service that he has given our democracy and our Parliament, I am sure that all here and all who have worked with Sir Kenneth over those 40 years wish him a long, active and fulfilling retirement, with limitless golf partners and a limitless supply of opera tickets.

4 pm

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): I am pleased to support the motion and to follow the Leader of the Opposition. As a former colleague of Sir Kenneth Bradshaw and the first Clerk of the House who was foolish enough to get himself elected as a Member of Parliament, I have profound respect for my more shrewd and more sensible former colleague. What the Leader of the Opposition has said is absolutely true. The privilege of being a servant of the House, whether as a Member of Parliament, a Clerk or official, is real. I learnt that privilege from, among others, Kenneth Bradshaw. He has been a fine servant of the House. I am honoured to have known him as a colleague and a friend, and he deserves well of the House.

4.1 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): On behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I support the motion with enthusiasm. As Clerk of the House, Sir Kenneth Bradshaw has been unfailingly courteous and consistently helpful to hon. Members, including those from minority parties. He has shown that impartiality and independence of the Government which the House requires of its Clerks. He has embodied and advocated that high view of the Clerkship in his international activities as President of the Association of Secretaries General of Parliaments.

Sir Kenneth's Clerkship has coincided with many changes in the way in which the House is run. This is perhaps symbolised by the fact that, so far as I can recall, he was the first Clerk who was interviewed extensively for the post of Clerk. He carried out that task in a manner that involved greatly extended managerial responsibilities, through the Board of Management — responsibilities which he discharged with great tact and skill. In doing so, he provided enormous assistance to the House of Commons Commission.

Those of us who worked closely with Sir Kenneth in that or in other spheres have come to regard him not only as an outstanding servant of the House but as a man of great integrity and charm and a congenial colleague. We all wish him the greatest happiness and activity in his retirement. We pay tribute to the work that he has done on behalf of the House.

4.2 pm

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): In adding the support of the Scottish National party, I speak not only for the party's current Members in the House but for all those who have served since 1967. The Scottish National party has been continuously represented in the House since 1967, and that period spans some 50 per cent. of Sir Kenneth's service to the House. All of us have greatly appreciated his objective advice and courteous assistance over the years, and we wish him a long and happy retirement.

4.3 pm

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Merionnydd Nant Conwy): I should like to associate myself with the remarks that have been made on behalf of minority parties in paying tribute to Sir Kenneth's work in the House. Inevitably, tributes of this kind are a celebration both of an individual's career and of the nature of our institution. It is perhaps appropriate that we should speak to this motion on a day when we have been debating the nature of our procedures and our rules of order. In adding my best wishes to Sir Kenneth in his retirement, I ask him to consider whether he will have the time to prepare a further edition of his excellent study "Parliament and Congress", because it might be influential in liberating some of our procedures.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved, nemine contradicente,

That this House requests Mr. Speaker to convey to Sir Kenneth Bradshaw, KCB, on his retirement from the office of Clerk of the House, its profound appreciation of his forty years of devoted service to the House, and his maintenance of the highest traditions of his office.

Adjournment (Summer)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That this House, at its rising on Friday 24th July, do adjourn until Wednesday 21st October.—[Mr. Ryder.]

Mr. Speaker: I must announce to the House that I have not selected either of the amendments on the Order Paper, but they may be raised during the debate.

4.4 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It has been reported to me that an hon. Member has been to the Library of the House and been told that the Librarian has been told that it would be inadvisable for him to obtain and make available in the Library a copy of the Peter Wright book. I should be grateful if you would look into this matter as the protector of the interests of all hon. Members.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have been asked a question, and I shall answer it. I do not know anything about this matter. I suppose that if such a book were to be ordered it would have to be ordered from overseas because it is not published in this country. I shall certainly look into the matter.

Mr. Winnick: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There is another book, which is apparently banned in this country because the Government have tried to take action against the publishers, namely, "One Girl's War" by Joan Miller. Two weeks ago I brought to the attention of the House the fact that it was in the Library. I wonder whether the Government have acted on the latest book because they are displeased that this other publication is held in the Commons Library.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I can usually speak for myself fairly effectively. I was the Member who went to the Library to put my name at the top of the list to read this fascinating book. I was told that the Library had been advised that it would be inadvisable to hold the book. I was given to understand that there was a letter from your Office, Sir, making that point.

Mr. Speaker: I assure the hon. Member that I know nothing about it. If he is first in the queue, I shall certainly be second.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I approached the Librarian on 7 July—last week—and asked him about the Joan Miller book in the Library so as to set the precedent for the arrival of Peter Wright's book. On 8 July, the Librarian wrote to me, saying:

"My present intention is to retain these copies in the Library unless and until I am instructed to the contrary."

The Librarian has made it clear that he wishes to receive and retain in the Library books that he knows and recognises are the subject of legal action outside the House and that are not freely available due to legal restraints. I put it to you, Sir, that the only way Joan Miller's book can be removed from the Library is by resolution of the House. If the Government refuse to accept the Peter Wright book, they have an obligation to place a motion before the House calling for the removal of the Joan Miller book, thereby enabling Parliament to debate this whole matter in a way that it has been prevented from doing today.

Mr. Speaker: The Joan Miller book is in the Library and I do not know of any indication that it will be withdrawn. I have already dealt with the other matter. I shall certainly look into it.

Mr. Dobson: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you confirm that, in the absence of a Library Committee, you are the only person who has the authority in the House to instruct the Librarian whether or not to make that book available?

Mr. Speaker: Yes. The Librarian is an Officer of the House and, as such, he reports to me.

4.8 pm

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): It is an honour to address the House. I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for calling me to speak during this debate on the summer Adjournment.

It is my privilege to represent the constituency of Argyll and Bute, one of the most beautiful parts of the country. Many hon. Members will have holidayed there and returned refreshed and invigorated. It is, of course, a complete myth that it rains a lot and that the midges wear tackety boots. I assure those who are to visit Argyll and Bute that they will find much there to delight and that they will always receive the kindly, courteous and hospitable welcome that is the hallmark of the highlander.

I understand that it is customary in a maiden speech to refer to one's predecessor. I happily pay tribute to John MacKay for his work in the constituency, and I know that he was a loyal and conscientious member of his Government. Perhaps I owe him a special personal debt. He contested Argyll and Bute twice as a Liberal candidate in the 1960s and had he not joined the Conservative party I might not be here today.

Life has come full circle. I was born and brought up in the Liberal faith and philosophy and I owe my success in large part to the continuing example and inspiration of my father—the late Lord Bannerman of Kildonan. Better known in Scotland, in politics, in international rugby and in Gaeldom as Johnnie Bannerman, he cut his political teeth in Argyll at the 1945 general election. Many of the problems that he encountered remain. The islands still bear the burden of high transport costs, and the failure to introduce the promised road equivalent tariff for ferries means that the islanders are considerably disadvantaged as they strive to build economically viable communities.

The whole economy of Argyll and Bute depends on thriving tourism, farming, crofting, fishing and forestry. In particular, the small farm and croft form the basis of our rural way of life, which has an intrinsic quality of its own. It does not have to be justified and it stands strong against any value judgment.

The reference to farming in the Gracious Speech gives me hope that the Government will remember that in Argyll and Bute we do not contribute to EEC surpluses. It leads me to hope that the Government will defend the interests of the family farm, especially in the less-favoured areas, and that they will consider allowing crofters and tenant farmers to participate in the woodland and forestry schemes, and to reap the benefits currently enjoyed by the landlords.

In the months ahead we shall hear much about the so-called community charge which is, indeed, a poll tax. No modern Western country would even consider such an unfair and regressive tax — last levied in England in 1381, it led to the Peasants Revolt. I hope that the Secretary of State for Scotland will reconsider the injustice done to two particular groups of people. Crofters and the Church have traditionally enjoyed a 50 per cent. derating concession but the Government have so far adamantly refused to continue that concession with the poll tax. Consequently, an extra £1·3 million will be taken out of the crofting counties and the Church of Scotland will have to find an extra £333,000. That will deal a hefty blow to both groups.

During the election campaign we heard much about the amount of money that is being spent on the Health Service. However, I regret to say that that money has not been spent in Argyll where, for nigh on 40 years, Campbeltown and Oban have waited for new hospitals. We have a superb staff who give a high standard of service to patients, but they are being asked to do so in impossible and unacceptable conditions, and in old and crumbling buildings.

Another matter that is causing grave concern in my constituency is the recent notification by the Nature Conservancy Council of the designation of an extensive area—over 32 square miles—on the island of Islay as a site of special scientific interest. The NCC sets out 20 operations that are thought likely to damage the SSSI. This is extraordinary in that it will affect 49 farmers and crofters who have worked the land over the generations without any environmental damage.

I am told of the NCC's objection to a temporary access to the proposed experimental wave power station and that a farmer who wants to level hillocks for easy cultivation will require permission because they give shelter to the corncrake. Those are just two examples, but the list of restrictions bodes ill for the social and economic welfare of the island.

We must seek a proper balance between nature conservation and the interests of the people who live and work in the area. To that end, I hope that the Secretary of State for Scotland will urgently consider the establishment of a Scottish nature conservancy council. It is vital that there should be close co-operation, consultation and agreement between the public bodies concerned with planning and land use and those who are affected by the designation. The people of Islay are deeply upset and angry. They fear that in the end 65 per cent. of the land area of Islay will become eligible for designation, and, if that happens, depopulation could occur on a scale not seen since the infamous clearances.

Many of my constituents have a particular interest in the Gaelic language, as do I. The need for Gaelic to be given a status equal to English, which is now enjoyed by Welsh, is all too obvious to those who know and care. Until reparation is made for the systematic and deliberate damage done to the Gaelic language over many years successive Governments must continue to bear the guilt. This ancient language lies at the heart of our traditions, culture and heritage, and its beauty in song, poetry and story is unsurpassed. We cannot afford to lose it.

We are told that the whole tenor of the Government's philosophy is the freedom to choose and to make our own decisions. We are told that we must stand on our own feet. In view of those tenets, I sincerely hope that the Government will respond to the wishes of the Scottish people by setting up a legislative body in Edinburgh with fair elections by proportional representation and the abolition of one tier of local government.

We in the Liberal party are convinced that institutional change would bring that freedom and, at the same time, improve the quality of decision-making. Scotland has lived too long at less than its full potential. There is more to life for its people than material progress; there is the right to choose, and to ignore that right is to court disaster. Scotland must recover her sense of destiny, her pride and self confidence and take her rightful place as a partner in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): It is with considerable pleasure that I follow the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie), who has just got her maiden speech off her chest. It is a great trial for all who join the House for the first time. The hon. Lady's speech was of great interest, especially to me, since I am interested in rural affairs. She made her speech with considerable charm and with none of the nerves which many people have on these occasions, and we look forward to hearing from her again. Her comments about her predecessor, John MacKay, will have given Conservative Members most pleasure. We miss him very much. I miss him especially because we battled together for many hours, day and night, in the Council of Ministers in Brussels. He was a doughty fighter for fishermen and especially for farmers in Scotland.

We discuss this motion, in different guises, many times during the year and I speak today for the first time in 16 years without having some Front Bench responsibility. To get myself back into the mood for doing this, I looked up the last two or three speeches I made 16 years ago. In June 1971, in almost my last speech as a Back-Bench Member, I was accused by Mr. Reggie Paget of being involved in a Whip's filibuster. I was somewhat perturbed to see that I replied:

"On principle, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I never speak to Whips."—[Official Report, 28 June 1971; Vol. 820, c. 172.]

At that time, Mr. Speaker, you were a Whip. You got your own back on me, because I was a member of the Conservative Whip's Office within a few weeks of making that remark. It has been somewhat difficult to get back into the swing of things.

I approve of the motion. I am especially pleased that the Leader of the House has been able to arrange an early rising of the House in July. This is an important matter, not least for the families of Members, especially Scottish Members. Scottish Members regularly used to complain that their children had been home from school for some time before the House went into recess. I hope that the Leader of the House will remember that sometimes Members' families pay a great price for our attendance here. I hope that it will always be part of my right hon. Friend's strategy to get the House up in good time every July. I also support the motion because my right hon. Friend is proposing a long recess during which the Government can produce a good deal of legislation before we return on 21 October. I hope that the Government will make the best use of the recess.

I reject the idea that is put forward every year of having a shorter summer recess and extending the recesses at Christmas, Easter and Whitsun. I note an amendment on the Order Paper and an early-day motion to that effect. I have a simple reason for rejecting the idea. Governments being who they are the moment we did that, they would increasingly appropriate the extra recesses at Christmas, Easter and Whitsun to discuss so-called essential legislation. Some of us know what Governments do. They begin by saying that it is only for one year, and before we know where we are, it becomes a regular part of the parliamentary scene. There have always been suggestions that the House should return some time in September. That would be messy, and the House should not sit during the season of party conferences. It is best to have a long recess just as the Leader of the House has proposed.

My right hon. Friend must ensure that the recess is properly used. He must bully Departments to have ready a large number of Bills to lay before the House as soon as it returns on 21 October. After those Bills have been before the House for the appropriate two weekends, I hope that the first two weeks of November will be full of Second Reading debates so that we may get on with the parliamentary process. I am sorry to see only one Bill awaiting Second Reading on the remaining orders at present. I had hoped that more Bills would be awaiting their Second Reading so that we could debate them when we returned in October. It is crucial to get the programme off to a good start.

The Leader of the House may have heard me say before that organising the parliamentary legislative year is a bit like growing a good crop of wheat. One starts at much the same time of the year. It is important to prepare the ground—to have the Bills ready—so that once the crop is sown it continues to grow and prosper without any check. I hope that he will ensure that that happens, but I assure him that Departments will give him every excuse as to why Bills are not ready for laying before the House the first week after the recess. I hope that my right hon. Friend will be ruthless with them in ensuring that the Bills are ready. If not, during the corresponding debate on the motion for the summer Adjournment in 1988, my right hon. Friend will be faced by complaining Members whose children are already busy on the beaches with their buckets and spades, asking their mothers why their fathers have had to go back to London. It is important that the House should rise early, in July, each year, and I hope that my right hon. friend will continue his good work.

We all know that this will be a busy Session. The Gracious Speech demonstrated that clearly. The first Session of a Parliament is always the busiest, and rightly so. But I hope that the Leader of the House will be ruthless with his colleagues in ensuring less legislation in future Sessions. I remind my right hon. Friend that before we were elected to Government in 1979 we all said a great deal about the need to stem the torrent of legislation which had poured out of the House over the years. I fear that we have not done as much as we should to stem that torrent. I hope that my right hon. Friend will insist on a good deal less legislation during the Government's 10th to 13th years.

Some Departments in Whitehall seem to think that their Ministers' success depends on how much primary legislation they can introduce. When new Ministers go to Departments, I have visions of the permanent secretaries standing at the top of the steps rubbing their hands together and saying, "Welcome, Minister. We have a lot of interesting legislation for you this year." I hope that my right hon. Friend will curb this dangerous trend, of which I disapprove. I have always regarded the Department of the Environment as a special culprit here. It has been notoriously bad at taking on more legislation than it can manage and then having to chop and change it at the expense of huge amounts of parliamentary time.

I am sure that my right hon. Friend knows all this and that he will take steps to ensure that we have a properly managed programme. He made great efforts to do that while he was Chief Whip. I hope that he will be vigilant in keeping legislation to a minimum and in getting it produced accurately and early so that the House is not kept here for longer than necessary during the summer months.

4.29 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I rise to follow up the matters that were raised with Mr. Speaker after Question Time about the material now in the public domain written by Mr. Peter Wright in his book "Spycatcher". It is being published in America today and extracts of it have been made available to the press in this country. I accept entirely that it would be wrong to comment upon the actions of those who may be held accountable in the courts for what they have done, but that is not the issue. The question that the House should consider without party prejudices of any kind is that a senior official of MI5, Mr. Peter Wright, who served in that capacity over many years, has written a book in which he has said that during the 1970s half of MI5, who are public servants, were engaged in an action designed to undermine or overthrow the elected Government under the then Prime Minister, Harold Wilson.

I was a member of that Government and many of the events referred to in Mr. Peter Wright's book strike a responsive chord in my memory because I know what was being said then. I knew it was not true, I wondered the source from which it came, but I decided simply to proceed and to note the events against the possibility that some explanation might be forthcoming later.

Mr. Wright says in his book that a Mr. Jim Angleton, head of counter-espionage in the Central Intelligence Agency, came to the United Kingdom at that time with a report that the Prime Minister was a Soviet agent and that the CIA virtually instructed MI5 to take action against an elected Prime Minister. Those basic facts only have to be stated for it to be clear that officials, some of whom may still be in the Civil Service, were guilty of attempting a coup against an elected Government in this country.

I do not claim that anybody in the present Government had direct responsibility for what happened. However, the Attorney-General is accountable to the House, as was his predecessor, the present Lord Chancellor, and the Prime Minister is responsible for the intelligence services. They have made no attempt to investigate the truth of those allegations by testing them in the courts. Instead, they have thrown the entire resources of the State into getting the allegations suppressed. The Cabinet Secretary was sent to Australia and was exposed to absurdity in the Australian courts for many reasons, one of which was that he confessed that he had been "economical with the truth" —that statement from the most senior civil servant in the country who is normally regarded as being apart form and separate from matters of political controversy.

To stay within the rules of sub judice I will not name the newspapers which attempted to bring out what happened. They were proceeded against by the then Attorney-General, the now Lord Chancellor, who, for all I know, may well be called upon to adjudicate on the matters he initially promoted as Attorney, should those matters go on appeal to the House of Lords where he sits on the Woolsack with some responsibility for such matters.

The hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), who is a lawyer, shakes his head. Anyone who really believes that the Government and the courts are separate knows little about the proceedings of the House or indeed of the other place. A comparable case of covert action is now being investigated in the American Congress. Colonel Oliver North and Admiral Poindexter are arraigned before the American Congress for action that is comparable precisely with what Mr. Peter Wright and, allegedly, Jim Angleton of the CIA did in Britain. Far fom the American Congress suppressing the matter because it might be the subject of judicial action—for all I know, it might be—in accordance with the tradition of open government in America, for which I have the greatest possible admiration, it has brought the matter out and Colonel North is required to explain everything that he has done. He has been forced to admit that he lied, and under cover of Congressional protection he is now delivering to the American people an account of the stewardship of Admiral Poindexter, the President and himself. Not in this country.

Mr. Winnick: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Benn: No, I would like to continue as I do not want to detain the House for very long.

It would be an outrage if the House were to adjourn and an allegation as serious as that made by Mr. Peter Wright about a coup against an elected Government were to pass unnoticed. I am a long-serving Member of the House and I have attended all its ritual functions. We always meet after an election in a mass of mutual congratulations.We elect the Speaker and Members on both sides of the House say how good a man he is. I join in that. We meet to say how we are the best Parliament in the world. The newly elected Speaker goes to the House of Lords and claims our ancient privileges, and everybody nods. When the Queen is to deliver her speech, not only do we lock the door to pretend that we keep the executive out, but we put the Outlawries Bill down to show that we are not obliged to consider the Crown's business first.

But if the Attorney-General decides that he wants to silence Parliament, he has a very simple way of doing it. He goes to the courts and tries to interfere with the freedom of the press, knowing that the Speaker is obliged by precedent to apply the sub judice rule to silence Parliament. There is as great a threat to Parliament today as there has ever been in its history. That threat is not by the occupant of the throne but by the Crown's Ministers who sit in the House. As I said in the Zircon case when I begged the House to refer that matter to the Committee of Privileges, unless we take the matter seriously this Parliament will be a laughing stock around the world, and rightly so. We bring schoolchildren here and tell them about the mother of Parliaments. We tell them how wonderful it is and how speeches are made fearlessly by hon. Members in the public interest. We tell them that matters of concern are aired in a way that other countries try to emulate. It is not true. The truth is that the House, on a matter as grave as any that has been before it during my time as a Member, which goes back nearly 37 years, has absolutely failed to insist on holding the Government, the Law Officers and the Prime Minister accountable because it has denied itself the opportunity of discussing the matter.

This is not a party matter. If Government Members had any evidence that some foreign security service was trying now to overthrow the Prime Minister by subversion, was "bugging and burgling its way across London" —I quote Peter Wright—the party opposite would quite properly be up in arms. I would hope that my colleagues would, too. However, when it happens to be a Labour Government that was subverted, where are the advocates of law and order? Where are the Members on the Government Benches who say that a crime may have been committed and that they want the guilty to be pursued in the courts? There is not a voice. The conduct of the Attorney-General and his predecessor in the case has fallen well below the standards required of their office.

I have heard many debates on the summer Adjournment where people get up to just make a point or, as we have just heard, to raise a rather funny speech about the length of the holidays. However, this is a substantial matter. I apologise for referring to the excellent maiden speech by the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie) at the end rather than at the beginning of my speech. It was a formidable maiden speech. As the son and grandson of Liberal Members, both of whom sat for Scottish seats, perhaps I may be allowed to put a special feeling into my reference to the hon. Member and to say that she will be heard with great respect whenever she chooses to address the House.

Before I sit down I must repeat what I have said. If Parliament does not have a full debate before the summer recess upon an attempted coup against the democracy of this country, masterminded by MI5 officials who are paid to protect our freedom and who are accountable to the Prime Minister, it will fail in its constitutional task to protect those who elected us.

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): Tempting as it might be to follow the line taken by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), I shall tread the traditional path of non-controversy and stick to non sub-judicial matters in my maiden speech. I congratulate the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie) on her maiden speech. I hope that I can equal it.

I begin by paying a warm and sincere tribute to my predecessor, Mr. Alfred Dubs. I believe that Alf Dubs was respected on both sides of the Chamber. He had a fine reputation as a Member of Parliament and he served his party well as a spokesman on home affairs and immigration matters. I believe that he did well by the people of Battersea. However, a Member of Parliament is judged not only by his work in the House but by his work in the constituency. From my experience of people in my constituency, I can say that a large number of individuals and organisations owe a great debt of gratitude to Alf Dubs for the work that he did for them. If when I come to leave the House I can say that I looked after my constituents as well as he looked after his, I shall have done well by them.

The best tribute that I can pay Alf Dubs is to say that political friends and foes alike refer to him as "a nice man". I certainly agree with that from the short knowledge I have had of him. Whenever our paths crossed during the election campaign there was a courteous and civilised debate between us, which is just as it should be in party political circles. I believe that that is a fitting tribute to the man that I have replaced in the House.

It seems almost superfluous to refer to my constituency. As I look around, I find that almost every other hon. Member seems to live in the constituency. Unlike most hon. Members who escape their constituents when they go into the Division Lobbies, I have a nasty feeling that as I go into the Lobbies I shall be nobbled by hon. Members urging me to take some particular action on their behalf. Nevertheless, I shall take hon. Members on a brief Cook's tour of my constituency. There are rather a number of bridges in it. It starts at the Nine Elms approach to Vauxhall bridge, and includes Chelsea bridge, Albert bridge, Battersea bridge, Wandsworth bridge and ends up on the Putney bridge road. The constituency goes down through the two commons of Wandsworth and Clapham and ends up in Balham.

The Battersea that I represent is something of a merger. It used to be largely Douglas Jay's old seat of Battersea, North, with a hefty chunk of Battersea, South which used to be represented by Ernest Partridge. With all these Jays and Partridges around, I am tempted to give something of an ornithological history of the area. However, suffice it to say that in this case the Tory eagle has landed.

If one looks at history, as one must, to find my Conservative predecessors in the constituency, one finds that 1959 was the last occasion on which there was a Conservative Member for Battersea, South. One goes into the mists of pre-war history, to 1931, to find my Conservative predecessor in Battersea, North. That was Commander Arthur Marsden, who was hot foot from commanding HMS Ardent at the battle of Jutland. Therefore, one can see that I look back as well as around and ahead as I consider my constituency.

I can look back at another rare bird in this place, a Communist Member of Parliament. Saklatvala represented Battersea — [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, Hear."] Hon. Members seem to remember him.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I knew his daughter.

Mr. Bowis: I cannot speak for his daughter, but I can speak for him. He stood as a Communist, but I notice from the footnotes in all the history books that he was a Communist with Labour party support. Wild horses would not drag from me any references to modern parallels with Militant Tendency.

There are many parallels with the past in my constituency. One sees many references to Battersea as having a fair number of what are described as "Yuppies". I do not know whether that is a parliamentary term, but it is used frequently in relation to the area. The first Yuppie in the history books goes back to William the Conquerer. He, as an upwardly mobile gentleman, owned the manor of Battersea and took his chums there to enjoy the delights of what was described in the Domesday Book as the wealthiest manor in Surrey. Therefore, things have not changed that much in the area.

There is a tradition of agricultural interests in the area. That may surprise many hon. Members. However, there is the grain and malt that goes into the Ram brewery at the Wandsworth end of my constituency and fruit and vegetables go into Nine Elms market at the other end of my constituency. We have a tradition that goes back to the days when the first asparagus was grown in Battersea park and lavender was indeed grown on Lavender Hill.

We have a tradition of colourful, if not turbulent, priests in the area. One was fined for catching salmon in the Thames and another was accused of consorting with witches. Today's incumbent has done nothing more scurrilous than serve a term as a Labour alderman.

In the south of my constituency we find the old route that is Stane Street, which the Romans built and down which the Roman tourists went on their way to Chichester, heading south along the line of Balham high road in a way that shows that Peter Sellers was not altogether inaccurate when he described Balham as the "Gateway to the South". Since then, Balham, Battersea and Wandsworth have grown and merged. From villages have grown towns and from towns have grown inner city areas. Areas have grown up and up, in many cases 20 storeys and more up. The borough of Wandsworth has inner city problems, as do all inner city areas. However, I believe that my area has found some of the answers to those problems.

The report "Faith in the City" referred to a number of relevant matters affecting my area. It referred to the unacceptably dull masses of municipalised housing estates, but it showed that the real need for areas such as mine was a thriving local economy. I think that that is what we have achieved. We have a partnership between central Government and local government, and a partnership between both forms of government and local firms and local people. It has put new heart into that area of inner London. The housing and environment have improved and the economic climate has taken off. It is a good place to live. It has the lowest unemployment levels in inner London and we have some 300 inquiries coming to the council every month from firms seeking to move into the borough.

I do not suggest for one moment that the successes and lessons of Wandsworth can be translated instantly to other parts of the country or to other inner city areas. However, I do suggest that the innovative and imaginative mix of public funding and private enterprise has done much to transform what was a depressing and depressed grey area of yesterday into a forward looking and confident community that looks to tomorrow's world with confidence and expectation.

I represent a wide variety of people. I represent those who have done well — many people in Battersea have done well. I congratulate those people, and it would be churlish not to wish them well in continuing their good fortune. We want more and more people to go on doing well. That is the climate of my constituency. However, I also represent those who have not done so well: those who are crying out to us for some form of help. My support came from a great range of people across the constituency, and I intend to represent the successful and those who need help.

There is a curious economic and fiscal truth, which is that low rates of income tax lead to a greater tax take. The same principle applies to company taxation. Tax cuts lead to greater wealth creation, greater wealth creation leads to more taxable wealth, and extra tax leads to more resources to be spent on areas of need; areas of need that are dear to the hearts of all hon. Members. The message in my constituency is that tax cuts and greater wealth creation lead to the spending that we want.

Having got the creation of additional wealth and an additional tax take, we must examine the balance that needs to be kept between spending and the maintenance of control over interest rates and inflation, without which spending would be much less effective than we would wish it to be. We must examine priority areas of spending, as well as increased spending.

My priorities for action relate to three areas of spending. They were referred to in one way or another in the Queen's Speech. One and a half of them relate to the ways in which Bills will come forward, and the other one and a half, I hope, will be considered by Ministers during the summer recess. They are summed up by the three messages by people in my constituency. They are, "I want my own home", "I want my child to get a decent education", "I want the worry taken out of my old age.". I bring those messages to the House. They say, "I am in a trap, and I want help to get out of it.".

Those are three traps, and they are not the fault of those who are entrapped. The child who is trapped in our education system in parts of inner London is locked into a system of neighbourhood mediocrity. The new education poverty trap holds faster children back and does not encourage slower children to catch up. I wish to encourage our education system to go forward to encourage children to stretch out as far as they can reach and to work and be rewarded to the height of their ambitions. The Government's actions go some way towards the achievement of that aim.

The moves to reform ILEA, to give schools greater budgetary autonomy and to give parents a greater say and influence in their children's schools are welcome. The move to make entry requirements and limitations on popular schools more flexible is also welcome. I hope that we can gradually unlock the education trap.

There are two housing traps. We in Wandsworth have one of the most successful boroughs, not only in enterprise, the environment and the economy, but in housing and home ownership. One third of our borough council tenants now own their own homes or, in most cases, their flats. The money that has been gained from that successful policy has been poured into improvements in houses, estates, sheltered accommodation and the great partnership between the local borough and local housing associations. But people still need housing help. Their housing ambitions are not met because of the absence of private rented accommodation. That is their trap.

Private accommodation once provided for young people in particular. Alas, in recent years, as hon. Members know well, for many reasons which we shall not examine today private accommodation has gone. I hope that it will return. The Government are seeking to encourage it in the institutional provision of private housing. I also hope that the Government will consider tax incentives for small private landlords, whom we also need back. That is half the housing trap.

The other half of the housing trap in my area relates to the particularly large number of people who live in housing association properties. Housing associations have done a great service for our country and for inner London. Nowadays, they are largely funded by central and local government. They take referrals largely from the local council of people who wish to move into housing association properties. Once people move into such properties, they suddenly find that, through no fault of their own, they lose their right to buy. They want the right —council tenants also want it—to buy the homes which they have done much to improve and for which they have great affection. I should like to see them being given back that right. It is not enough to give them transferable discounts; they should have the right to buy the homes in which they live.

Finally, I come to the subject of pensions. Most pensioners are now much better off than they were, and pensioners are the first to say so. All pensioners have benefited from the Government's success in containing and reducing inflation. In the past, the ravaging disease of inflation affected pensioners' incomes and savings. No friend of pensioners today would advocate policies that would risk putting the inflation rate back to 10, 20, or 30 per cent. and thereby putting pensioners at risk again, but a certain group of pensioners need our support. They have given great service to the country, but the country has not rewarded that service by ensuring them comfort in their old age. That group is just above the supplementary benefit line. They have some small savings and a small pension and do not qualify for the benefits that would be available if they had less. They have retired too soon to benefit from new second pensions. They hesitate to turn up the gas in winter. They say, "I cannot afford to put an extra lock on my back door." They are in a real hardship trap, and we should support them.

Housing, education and welfare are my three priorities for action. There are three problems, three traps, and three locks. I hope that during my time in this Parliament I shall play my part in helping the Government to find three keys to unlock these three traps.

Mr. Jimmy Wray (Glasgow, Provan): I pay tribute to my predecessor, Mr. Hugh Brown. He was a well-respected hon. Member. He worked very hard for the constituents of Provan. I respect him as a person and as a Member of Parliament. For a time, he served with the Scottish Office. He was a dedicated, able man. I have no doubt that many Opposition Members respect him as much as I do. Dod's Parliamentary Companion gives us a potted history of his career, and we know that he was noted for being a tough-talking Scot. His wife, Mary, also came from a great political family in Glasgow. She paid much attention to his constituents. I wish both Hugh and Mary happiness in his retirement.

This morning I consulted a dictionary for the meaning of the word "controversy". It means to debate or to be open to question. I have no doubt that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will agree that the Government are open to question. I do not have a great deal in common with Conservative Members. I abhor the rotten capitalist system that has brought misery to many families in my constituency. I am not like the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis). My constituency has the worst unemployment rate in Britain. In some areas, it is as high as 39 per cent.

The level of poverty in my constituency is deplorable. It is not so long ago that my constituents queued for the giros that did not arrive. They also queued at soup kitchens. Surely the Government must recognise the poverty that they have created by allowing banks to repossess houses and to raise their interest charges when coffers were empty. That is the type of Government and the type of capitalism that Conservative Members have supported for the past nine years.

One of the most horrifying pieces of legislation discussed in the Chamber was discussed in panic because, when revaluations caused rates to treble in Strathclyde and Glasgow, the Prime Minister panicked herself into setting up a study to establish a rating system based on the ability to pay. The Prime Minister introduced what she called the "community charge". It is a poll tax. I have an electorate of 43,000, but if that legislation is implemented in Scotland my electorate will be down to 10,000 because nobody will register. The legislation is a breach of civil liberties, because, if people do not register, they will not be allowed to vote. The legislation must not be implemented.

The first person to introduce a rate relief for the poor was Pope Gregory. It was based on a system of help for the poor, but we are now considering a system based on the ability to pay. The community charge transfers the burden from the rich to the poor. A couple living in a 30-bedroom mansion, paying £2,000 in rates, would be asked to pay £500 under the new system. The burden would be transferred to a family living in a slum. That family of five earners may have a joint income of £25,000 a year, but they will be asked to pay something like £1,500 under the community charge. We abhor such a policy, and that is why the great lady has been scored off 90 per cent. of Christmas card lists this year.

Democracy has been eroded. The Labour party was the first to set up an inquiry into the local government system under the Layfield committee. That committee reported in 1976 and stated clearly that it would be extremely costly and take 10 years to introduce a new rating system. I believe that we should look for a system with a buoyancy yield, and the only system that provides that is a local income tax system. Based on that system Lawrie McMenemy, earning £4,000 a week, would pay a flat rate of just 5 per cent. on that £4,000. Wee Mrs. Dobbs on £30 a week would pay 5 per cent. on that £30. The local income tax system would leave room for exemptions and fluctuations in income and inflation would also be taken into account.

There are 18 million people living on or below the poverty line in this country. Press reports of previous weeks revealed that some of those people are only a giro cheque away from starvation. Oxfam has been turned into the national tailor for many poor families because they cannot afford to buy clothes on the menial supplementary benefit provided by the Government. The Government had an opportunity to do something about that problem when they introduced the Social Security Act 1986. However, that Act was designed not to help the poor, but to take from them so that the Government could save £1 billion.

Over the past eight years, it has been clear that the Government can give and find money, but they find it for the wrong people. They found £8 billion for the highest taxpayers in the country. That payment is the equivalent of £219 per week or an income of over £11,000 a year. The Government gave relief to those who did not need it. What did they do for the lower paid—those earning less than £5,000 a year? They gave them £1·63 per week, the equivalent of £89 a year. For that reason we will fight to dismantle the rotten, corrupt capitalist system that has been created in the past eight years.

Are we safe in the Government's hands? I do not believe that we are. The Government have decided to spend billions on a new weapon, Trident, that can destroy 26 cities and kill millions of people in one blast. However, we should consider the protection that is afforded to the Members and staff of this House. Last week, one member of staff was bleeding profusely and ran down to the medical office. The lady saw a 6 in. by 6 in. box wrapped in brown vinegar paper and bound with tape. Although she was standing there bleeding, the messenger said, "We cannot open the box." However, she said that she must and, after four minutes of unwrapping the tape, she opened it to discover there were six pieces of linen, six elastoplasts and one piece of cotton wool in that box. She was then told by the Serjeant at Arms that the box should never have been opened because the contents of the box were there to protect people if there was a nuclear attack. Such is the safety provided by the Government for the staff and Members of the House.

Three dear old ladies, who have spent 100 hours in the Court of Sessions, have asked me to raise their pet subject, the Water (Fluoridation) Act 1985. I do not know how anyone could have voted for that Act, especially when one considers the paragraph that specified that fluoride would be applied to 1 mg per litre where practicable. I would like a definition of "practicable". No one has ever mentioned whether fluoride can be considered as a medicinal product. The Medicines Act 1968 states that a medicinal product is a substance that is used to clear up diseases. The disease with which fluoridation is concerned is dental caries, a disease of the mouth.

The 1968 Act also specifies what is meant by the adminstering of a medicine. If one takes one substance, mixes it with another, and administers that to an animal or a human being, that substance is a medicinal product. The Government should also consider that it cost £1·5 million to discover that they were ultra vires with regard to the Water (Scotland) Act 1946. Throughout Britain, we employ local authority engineers to treat the water to make it wholesome. We do not employ those engineers to treat the people who drink the water. That is an important fact. We do not want the civil liberties of individuals to be breached. I hope that my dear old ladies will be happy that I raised that matter on their behalf.

I have been asked by disabled people to draw attention to all the Acts that have been passed by Parliament over many years, especially the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970. Local authorities, including Strathclyde region, have not fully implemented the required survey. About one third of all chronically sick and disabled people are still suffering because central Government will not give local authorities the money to implement those provisions.

Another piece of important legislation recently passed was the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986, which, in relation to funding from central Government, is another farce. The Government have told local authorities not to implement it to keep costs down. They have offered little financial help and the finance that has been made available does not meet the needs in Britain, in Scotland or in Strathclyde.

Finally, high unemployment is a waste of talent, energy and creative productivity. Thousands of Glaswegians are unemployed while our oil, shores and land fall into the hands of the greedy merchants of the temple. The £58 billion of North sea oil revenue has been thrown down the drain in payments to keep people unemployed. We look for better for our unemployed. We look for jobs and apprenticeships, not for the slave and cheap labour of the YTS and MSC schemes. We look for investment. We want the Government to bring back the £109 billion that has been invested abroad, using cheap labour to get high interest rates. The Government can bring back that money.

We do not have to go far to know what an unjust world this is. Down at the Embankment, only a few yards from here, one can see people lying in cardboard boxes in the tunnels. The Government are uncaring and have no compassion. It is time that they got themselves together and started to implement policies to help the poor and unemployed. The quicker the Government do that, the better for the poor.

5.12 pm

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): This afternoon I feel a little like a man who has been doing the football pools without success for many years, but whose number suddenly comes up. In the 25 years that I have been a Member of the House I have never followed a maiden speaker. Today, however, I find myself following two, and that is quite something.

I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan (Mr. Wray). In the modern idiom, he was controversial, although there is nothing bad about that, because nowadays most maiden speeches are controversial. However, from the hon. Gentleman's delivery it is obvious that he is a robust speaker. I disagree with practically everything that he said, but I was interested to hear his comments about the "rotten, corrupt capitalist system". I am sure that he will be extraordinarily entertaining on the rotten and corrupt Socialist system although now is not the time to go into that, I should like to hear him speak on that topic.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman about fluoridation, as I am sure does my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), who is present. With my hon. and learned Friend, I have long been a campaigner in the House to try to stop fluoridation. We have not been very successful, but we have voted against it consistently. I hope that we can welcome the hon. Member for Provan to the ranks of those who, irrespective of party, oppose this indoctrination of water, which we believe to be harmful.

The hon. Gentleman paid a gracious tribute to his predecessor, Hugh Brown, whom many of us knew as a man of charm and a hard worker. He was well liked by hon. Members of all parties. If the hon. Gentleman does as well for his constituents as Hugh Brown did, he will do very well indeed.

As I am the first speaker after two maiden speakers, I should like to congratulate also my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis), whom all Conservative Members are delighted to see with us. His election was something of a surprise, as Battersea was one of the seats that we were not quite sure of winning. I enjoyed his confident tour de force of that area, which many of us know because of its close proximity to Westminster. My hon. Friend's speech reflected the success of that area, of many areas in the country and of our party. He is here because people are doing well and showing energy and enterprise. He is a modern and young product of that enterprise, and long may he be so. I appreciate that there are problems in Scotland, and elsewhere. They will be cured, and the thrust of this nation is forward, as we saw in the election.

I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea had the good sense to pay a tribute to his predecessor, Alf Dubs. He was a hard worker, and an industrious member of the Opposition Front Bench and he will certainly be missed by Opposition Members. Perhaps one of these days he will be back, but not, I hope, representing my hon. Friend's seat.

All hon. Members congratulate those maiden speakers, and indeed all other maiden speakers because we know what a trial it is. My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea, the hon. Member for Provan and the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie) made their maiden speeches with commendable confidence and we look forward to hearing from them in the future.

In this general debate on the Adjournment I should like to say a few things about one aspect of democracy. There are many who take democracy in our country for granted. We are rightly jealous of our democracy and fight strongly against those who try to undermine and subvert it. Sensibly, we have strict rules about our democratic electoral process which need to be observed faithfully and properly. Personation, for example, is a serious and punishable offence. That ballot is secret and polling stations are run with scrupulous fairness and independence. Casting one's vote at a polling station is relatively straightforward. However, there is one area in which our electoral and democratic rules are beginning to fray a little at the edges at the moment. It is time to stop the rot, and to do so now.

The main thrust of my argument relates to postal voting and its management. At the recent election, postal voting was something of a shambles despite the previous Government's praiseworthy efforts to extend it to include holidaymakers for the first time. The flaws and the bumbling incompetence of the Home Office officials who designed the new obstacle course of postal voting have already been exposed efficiently by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) in his recent devastating Adjournment debate.

To obtain a postal or proxy vote, one practically needed a law degree and experience in picking one's way through tricky legal documents. It is laughable to think what must have happened when the postal vote forms arrived at many council residential homes, or indeed at any residential home. I had a letter from a constituent this morning who, on the eve of polling day, called on his mother, only to discover that she had done nothing about the postal vote form. Those forms had been handed out, but no one had given any help or instructions as to what the old people should do to exercise their franchise.

Indeed, even people outside such homes and with plenty of intelligence who managed to survive one or two hurdles would always encounter a further one that would bring them down in their attempt to obtain a postal vote. In some respects, that endeavour almost took on the aspect of a competition for prizes, in which the organisers were trying to trip up the contestants. At the end of the postal vote form, one almost expected to see, "In case there is a tie, please describe in less than 10 words why you believe in democracy," or something like that.

I have discovered that people in quite important walks of life foundered along the way and were unable to get their postal votes accepted. As a result, thousands of votes were lost to all parties. Many postal votes were never returned, many others were returned but were ineffectual, and others were spoilt.

I suggest to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House that the whole postal voting system must be put right and a simple system initiated in time for the next general election. That is in the interests of all political parties and of our democratic process. We must safeguard the rights of as high a percentage as possible of those entitled to vote who come into these special categories; for example, the disabled, those who are going on holiday, those who are away from home because they have moved house and those who are away on business or for work purposes. I refuse to believe that in this advanced, electronic, computerised age we should retain a creaky, almost Victorian system of hit or miss, depending on whether one happens to fill in the form correctly.

In addition to the shambles of officialdom, I am worried about the attitude of the Post Office and the way it carries out its tasks. Every four to five years, when a general election comes round, the Government must instruct the Post Office at the highest level that it must provide extra supervision and pay extra attention to the handling of all communications in relation to that election. These are not merely ordinary items of mail which are processed daily. They are items which must be handled with care and expedition. I estimate that I lost well over 1,000 votes because of those who were unable to register on time, those who applied too late and those who were cheated of their franchise by officialdom. I am sure that that experience was shared by many other hon. Members. It goes without saying that in a marginal seat this could be utterly crucial to the outcome of the election.

In future, we cannot allow the Home Office to erect hurdles against us which are insurmountable by many people. We cannot leave to chance or a supposition of good will or efficiency that the Post Office will deliver poll cards, election literature and, most important, the growing number of postal votes that we shall have in years to come. Postal votes must reach their destination as quickly as possible and be transmitted back again.

In my constituency, postal votes were issued on the appropriate day. Some people were at home, literally sitting on their cases, waiting to go on holiday, knowing that their postal vote was to arrive the next morning, only to discover that there was a 24-hour delay because a sackful of postal votes had been put on one side and had not been dealt with by the Post Office. I would have thought that that was an electoral offence.

The electoral returning officer in my area made strong protests and I received an apology from the district head postmaster of the area that I represent. Two or three consitituents have alleged that their postal votes were issued by the returning officer, but never reached them. As a consequence, those people were disfranchised. One constituent wrote to me and said that he was now old and disabled and that he had voted in every general election since 1935. He regarded it as his democratic right and duty. This was the first time that he lost the opportunity to vote, because the Post Office did not deliver his postal vote.

These are serious matters, and in some cases they can influence the outcome of the contest. Whether or not they do, it is the right of every person of sound mind above the qualifying age to cast his or her vote at an election. It is extremely important that the Home Office takes these matters on board and acts positively to reform the system and for the Government of the day to say at election times to the Post Office, "It is your duty to provide the utmost supervision to ensure that all election communications are handled efficiently, dispatched on time and returned to the returning officer ready for counting when the election takes place." If we do that, we shall make a small but significant advance.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I have some sympathy with the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) about filling in postal vote application forms. I found it almost as difficult as booking tickets for the National Theatre. The sooner we revise those forms, the better.

I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Provan (Mr. Wray) and the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) on their maiden speeches. My hon. Friend succeeds an hon. Member whose reputation for hard work, sincerity and robust speech was well recognised in the House. Clearly, my hon. Friend comes to the House with intense feelings about poverty, inequality and unemployment, and I hope that we shall often hear from him in future. He endorsed the people of Scotland's strong condemnation of Government policies.

I must be careful about congratulating non-Labour Members, because when it fell to me to congratulate the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mrs. Barnes) shortly before the general election my remarks found their way into a pre-election leaflet that was circulated in the Greenwich constituency and I had to account to Ms. Deidre Wood for what I had said in the House.

When I grew up in Battersea, it was pronounced "Ba'ersea" and Arding and Hobbs was pronounced "Harding and 'obbs". The hon. Gentleman finds himself in the House because the people of Battersea do not suffer unemployment to the same degree as the people of Provan. He spoke with fluency and sincerity and recognised the problems, two of which, housing and education, are dear to my heart. He may live to regret the Government's proposals for them, because he will find that the policy of the London borough of Wandsworth, which the Government intend to emulate, is a policy of rehabilitating buildings rather than the lives, hopes and ambitions of people.

It is no solution to the problems of inner-city London and of high council flats simply to remove the people facing the problems and to replace them with others on a high income who want an address close to the City of London. The same is true of schools. The hon. Gentleman may well find that if the better organised, articulate parents have a chance to take their schools out of the state system, the sink schools, which have a larger proportion of deprived children and face the inequities of the inner city, will not be improved, but their problems will be intensified.

I cannot conclude my opening remarks without mentioning the loss of my friend Alf Dubs, a man with a king-sized conscience for those who suffer any sort of oppression. He will be sorely missed and I hope that he will soon be returned to the House. It is no exaggeration to say that there were people in Battersea with tears in their eyes the day after the election, because they owed so much to his sincerity and campaigning.

Alf took a great interest in immigration and I believe that the House should not adjourn for the summer recess until there has been a ministerial statement about the conditions of a constituent of mine, Donald Michael Brown, who is liable to arrest and removal from the United Kingdom without any right of appeal, without any trial and without any statutory or judicial way of dealing with the problem. His wife, Katherine Brown, was born in the United Kingdom and her rights are also affected.

The history of the matter is very simple. Mrs. Brown was born here, but went on holiday to Jamaica and married Donald Michael Brown there. He applied to the United Kingdom high commission in Kingston for entry to the United Kingdom as a husband. However, there is an immigration rule that is an intellectual assault. It states that a person cannot come to this country if the primary purpose of the marriage is to gain entry to Britain. According to the immigration rules, the primary purpose of a marriage can be absolutely genuine, namely, that the couple have fallen in love and want a permanent relationship but the couple may be caught because at the same time the primary purpose of the marriage might be to come to the United Kingdom. How can there be two primary purposes for a marriage? That is an intellectual assault.

The rule effectively states that if an overseas male marries and wants to come to Britain, he cannot do so. However, if he marries and proves to the Home Office that he does not want to come here, he can come here. That is the rule in a nutshell. That is the rule that caught my constituent.

My constituent married in Jamaica in March 1986. It might help matters if I give the Home Office reference number. There is a system that ensures that we can get replies to these matters in Adjournment debates. The matter is now being dealt with by the Minister of State, and the Home Office reference number is B439046. The temporary admission number is TN/RLE/2375/86. I hope that that will make it easier for the Leader of the House.

Mr. Brown was refused permission to come here in May 1986. Mrs. Brown has a problem. Her mother has heart disease. My constituent has a council flat of her own and she is self-supporting. However, her mother suffers from a severe heart condition. Therefore, Mrs. Brown had to return to the United Kingdom some time in May or June 1986. Her husband came here on a visit in December 1986. It is true that he did not tell the Home Office that he was coming here to see his wife. I expect that in dictatorships all over the world when, someone wants to be near a relative or to get into a country to be united with his family, that person would tell lies about the reasons for wanting to join a husband or wife. I am sure that that happened in Germany before the war, and I am sure that it continues to happen. I do not hold it against my constituent that he did not tell the entire truth when he tried to get into Britain to be with his wife. He got into Britain by gaining temporary admission, and that is why he is liable to arrest and removal without a trial or appeal.

Mr. Brown's wife is now expecting a baby to be born in October. All pleas for Mr. Brown to be allowed to stay with his wife have been turned down. The wife, who has rights in these matters, faces a great dilemma. In parentheses, if my female constituent had been a man, because she was established in the United Kingdom on 1 January 1973—if the sexes were reversed—she would have an absolute right to be joined with her spouse. However, because of the way in which the rules are drafted, she does not have an absolute right for her husband to join her because she is a woman. She faces a cruel dilemma. What is she to do?

If the husband is removed to Jamaica, she must make a choice. Should she go to Jamaica and give up her home here? She has adequate accommodation. Should she give up her home in Britain and abandon her mother, who is suffering from heart disease, who is in and out of hospital and who lives only a few doors away because the local authority has shown good sense by housing them closely together? Should she abandon her home and her mother on the one hand, or her husband on the other? Should she go to Jamaica with her child, where the child may have fewer prospects than in the United Kingdom? What is she to do?

When we consider the question of primary purpose, we realise that the immigration rule is nonsense. The rule is sexist, because it distinguishes between males and females. It creates a cruel dilemma of choice for a pregnant wife in a genuine marriage with genuine conflicting family responsibilities. That rule should be changed.

There is a form of unofficial prerogative of mercy, although that is not a royal prerogative of mercy. At all times, the Home Secretary or the Minister of State can say that the rules are working in a cruel, harsh and unconscionable way and that he will put to one side the harsh operation of that rule. I ask the Home Secretary, through the Leader of the House, to consider that this is one of those cases where the prerogative of mercy should be used and my constituent Mr. Brown should be allowed to remain with his pregnant wife, who is expecting the birth of her baby in a few months' time.

I have another reason why I believe that the House should not adjourn just yet, and this has nothing to do with immigration. It was reported in the papers today that the Home Secretary is about to release 5,000 criminals from prison back into society. Crime is one of the worst problems in my constituency. It is not all that easy to get into prison in London, because the courts are, on the whole, very reluctant to send people to prison. Now, however, 5,000 non-violent offenders are to be released. I accept that they are non-violent and that they are burglars, pickpockets, car thieves and people who have been convicted of graffiti, criminal damage and other offences. The cases of those people have been considered in detail in the courts and they are about to be released by the Home Secretary back into society before they have served out their sentences.

As a recompense for the Government's inability to deal with matters of law and order properly, I hope that anyone who is burgled or loses his car as a result of the reconviction of any one of these released people during the time when they would otherwise have been in prison will take advantage of an extension to the criminal injuries compensation scheme. There must be some recompense for the incompetence that the Government are visiting upon the victims, who may include my constituents. It is an extraordinary comment on the so-called party of law and order that the Government are emptying the gaols of some 5,000 people to make room—as this is not an amnesty—for another 5,000.

My main plea is for mercy for my two constituents who face a grievous family dilemma. I hope that at the end of the debate the Leader of the House will not redeem but will start to make his reputation by bringing mercy to this case.

5.37 pm

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): I am grateful for the opportunity to make my maiden speech. I am happy to follow the tradition of the House by paying tribute to my predecessor, Richard Wainwright. He was nothing if not persistent. He fought and lost three elections in Colne Valley before gaining the seat for the Liberal party in 1966. When he lost the seat in the 1970 general election, that, I believe, was the only seat to be gained by the Labour party that year. However, he regained the seat for the Liberals in 1974 and held it until his retirement at the general election. Richard Wainwright was, I believe, a respected Member of the House and a good constituency Member who was always on hand to help constituents with their problems, however small. He was ever present in the constituency and he was very approachable. It is my intention to follow his example in that respect.

Colne Valley has a rich and interesting political history. In 1923, it provided the country's first ever Socialist Chancellor of the Exchequer in Philip Snowden. Another Labour man, Victor Grayson, who was Member of Parliament for Colne Valley in the first decade of this century, disappeared in somewhat mysterious circumstances. That is an example that I do not intend to follow. I hope that I shall not be too controversial if I state that a former Prime Minister, Lord Wilson, was born in Milnsbridge in my constituency.

In this interesting political jigsaw puzzle that is the Colne Valley there has been one vital piece missing—in its 102-year history Colne Valley had never had a Conservative Member of Parliament. That was the case until four and a half weeks ago, and I am delighted to be the piece that completes the jigsaw. Indeed, it is worth pondering why, if there is such an appalling north-south divide — as Opposition Members contend — the good people of Colne Valley should see fit to elect their first ever Conservative Member of Parliament after so long.

I hope that I shall be allowed to indulge just a little in eulogising my beautiful constituency. Although they might not realise it, part of my constituency will be well known to many people both inside and outside the House, for as they enjoy the antics of Compo, Clegg and Foggy in the TV series "Last of the Summer Wine", they also enjoy the attractive scenery of Holmfirth and the surrounding Holme valley in my constituency where that series is filmed.

I do not imagine that many constituencies can boast that no fewer than five packs of hounds reside in their boundaries, yet that is the case in Colne Valley, with the Holme Valley beagles, the Colne Valley beagles, the Pennine hunt, the Rockwood hunt and the Colne Valley mink hounds. Indeed, I am delighted to pay tribute to the field sports followers in my constituency who gave me enormous support during the election because they saw that the Conservative party was the only party that posed no threat whatever to their traditional pastime.

Colne Valley takes in some of the suburbs of Huddersfield, such as Lindley and Crosland moor, which will tell those people who sometimes mistakenly associate Colne Valley with Nelson and Colne in Lancashire that Colne Valley is in the very heart—some would say it is the very heart—of west Yorkshire.

With its textiles tradition, Colne Valley was one of the major engine rooms of the industrial revolution. Sadly, the last 25 years have seen the textiles industry decline, and the industrial Colne Valley has declined with it. Happily, however, I can report that this area, along with many other parts of Yorkshire, is being revitalised by the entrepreneurial efforts of many local people. Recent reports from the regional CBI and the local Kirklees chamber of commerce have demonstrated growing confidence among the business community.

Unemployment in my constituency has fallen by nearly 900 over the last year. These improvements have been brought about by the Government's economic policies that have led to low inflation, improved productivity, more responsible trade unionism and greater support for small businesses.

There is one major obstacle that stands in the way of increased economic progress in my area and, indeed, in many other parts of the country. I refer to the problems caused to industry by local councils and the planners. As firms increase their business, in many cases they need to expand their existing premises or to find additional premises. As a result, they come into contact with the local council, and only too often find that their problems have only just begun. There are so many hurdles to overcome —from the highways department to the water authority, from the planners to the tree planters. If one's building is listed, one's problems are compounded. After all that, one's proposal must then win the approval of the elected councillors.

A number of local business men have come to me with problems put in their way by the local Kirklees council. Let me give an example. John Crowther plc of Milnsbridge has turned itself round from being a loss-maker to what is now a thriving business, employing 400 people and exporting nearly 50 per cent. of its output. Crowthers wants to pull down an empty, derelict mill called Union Mills and in its place build some single-storey units that will create jobs for local people. That mill is an eyesore and is now dangerous because of its dilapidated condition. It is a mess. If one wants confirmation of that one only has to ask my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary who visited the mill with me last Friday. Yet the council has just refused to recommend demolition. There is no justification for the loss of jobs that would otherwise have been created.

On Friday I also visited a small printing firm, L W Graphics in Longwood. That firm wanted to expand, found the ideal premises 12 months ago, put forward a planning application and was turned down — not on environmental or traffic grounds but because the application went against the local plan which says that change of use of existing buildings for office purposes can only be permitted if inside the town centre. That was despite the fact that the premises had been used for commerical purposes for more than 20 years. What a crying shame that those few extra jobs were never created because of an unnecessary and petty bureaucratic restriction. I could quote many similar stories of how the rules and regulations of Kirklees council have hindered and, indeed, blocked the development and progress of industry in my constituency.

As this is my maiden speech, I would not dream of suggesting anything controversial, such as that these obstacles are an indication of the innate hostility of certain Labour councillors to private enterprise. My experience is that business men are very good at saying what they can do, what can be done, why a new product can be made and sold and why new jobs can be created but that council officials are very good at saying why something cannot be done. It is my belief that had today's planning controls existed 150 years ago, the industrial revolution would never have taken place.

The Government will have to look at planning controls again. In my view, some local councils are abusing them, and in so doing are hampering the Government's efforts to revitalise the private sector of industry. Of course, we must have controls. We must protect the green belt and the best examples of our architectural heritage. But the pendulum has swung too far, and thousands of jobs that could have been created have been lost for ever. I am sure that the examples I have quoted are merely the tip of the iceberg.

In Yorkshire and my constituency scores of budding entrepreneurs are ready and able to create the jobs of the future. They have the courage, enterprise and ideas to create that employment, but many of them do not have the patience, know-how or mind of a bureaucrat to overcome the frustrations of local government red tape. This Government must free them so that they can go out and create the extra wealth, prosperity and jobs that we all so desperately want to see.

5.50 pm

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): I succeed in the House the former hon. Member for Cunninghame, North, who was before that the hon. Member for Bute and North Ayrshire, Mr. John Corrie. I am pleased to pay tribute to the diligence of Mr. Corrie's efforts over the years and to wish him well, whether in his retirement from politics or in his temporary absence from them.

My constituency is, in many ways, Scotland in microcosm. It is a mixture of the industrial and the rural. It is a constituency of great beauty; sadly, it is also a constituency of greatly wasted resources and talents. We live in a society which can apparently afford to dispense with the labour of 30 per cent. of my male constituents, with the unique deep-water facility at Hunterston and with the skills that have been built up over generations among the steelworkers of the Garnock valley.

I do not intend to take the House on a Cook's tour of my constituency. I shall quote only one statistic—from a document published last month during the election campaign. It is a careers report from the Ardrossan office of Strathclyde regional council's careers service, which states that of 174 school leavers, at Christmas fully 50 per cent. had failed to find any form of employment, and that 66 of those who had were on youth training schemes. Only 13 were in permanent employment. Of the other 50 per cent., the report states:

"Their prospects are bleak. There are no jobs and no YTS vacancies for them."

It is into this real world that the Government intend to introduce the venal concept of conscription into jobs and schemes that do not exist in order to fulfil the myth that this is a land flowing with opportunity for all.

I intend to concentrate my remarks on the subject of the poll tax, otherwise known as the community charge. I feel that, after two years of debate on the matter, we in Scotland have something to teach the rest of the United Kingdom. Let me say to Conservative Members that, with respect, it is a lesson to which they might do well to listen. The Conservative party has learnt certain lessons in Scotland about what happens once the realities of the poll tax, as opposed to the glittering package of alleged reform, become known to the public at large. In a more musical and romantic age, the events of 11 June might have been commemorated with a couple of pipe tunes: I suggest that "Lament for the Earl of Ancram" and John McKay's "Farewell to the Isles" might not have been inappropriate memorials to the debate on the community charge.

The community charge, or poll tax, was born out of blue-rinsed funk and panic among Scottish Conservatives who saw electoral disaster staring them in the face some two years ago. At the end of the day, they have the community charge on the statute book. However, they have also had the electoral disaster. The idea was conceived that if the 20-odd per cent. of Scottish people who vote Conservative were bribed with a shameless transfer of wealth from those who have least to those who have most, those people would dutifully salivate their way to the polling booths to thank the Conservative Government for their generosity, and would return Conservative Members to those constituencies. That idea was based on a misconception about the quality of the human spirit. It was based on the assumption that everyone — or at least everyone who had previously voted Conservative — voted on the basis of shameless, naked greed, without the slightest regard for the conditions of the society that surrounded them.

Fortunately, that calculation did not prove justified. In my constituency, and in many constituencies with a larger middle-class electorate which was supposedly to benefit from the scheme, electors in their droves rejected the poll tax precisely because they realised the unfairness of it—although it was to benefit marginally, or even by a substantial amount, their own wallets. I hope that I have enough faith in human nature in the south, in Wales and in other parts of the United Kingdom that the same calculations will be made by the electorate there in a few years' time. Those people may decide that they are going to benefit, but they will, I trust, also decide that they do not wish to benefit at the expense of old-age pensioners, the disabled and the poorest families in the land. For it is those people who will have to pay the tax, so that the wealthiest in the land may be subsidised and live in even greater comfort.

I can give this transfer of wealth a simple title: the Dulwich factor. I can think — hypothetically — of a wealthy retired couple in Dulwich who will benefit from the tax by, let us say, £2,000. As long as that is an abstraction which will not greatly affect others in Dulwich, it may not affect their behaviour, electoral or otherwise. But when the people of Dulwich realise that for that wealthy couple to benefit someone else must pay £2,000, they will become curious about the workings of the new tax. And when they realise that the people who will pay the £2,000 to subsidise the wealthy couple are not an abstraction but indeed themselves, they will become not only curious, but extremely angry. That "Dulwich factor" has already applied in Scotland, and I confidently predict that it will begin to apply in the rest of the United Kingdom.

The poll tax as it is proposed is a shameless transfer of wealth. It presupposes, or rather makes the hypothetical assumption, that everyone in our society can afford to pay equally, irrespective of means. To add insult to injury, even the weakest in the land — even the frailest pair of pensioners in my constituency who exist on supplementary benefit pension and are at present exempted from paying rates—must initially find £2·60 a week from their pitiful pensions. Why? So that the wealthiest people in my constituency, and in society as a whole, may make massive savings.

I trust that, when people are confronted with the unfairness of the system, and then see it applied to the disabled and all the other categories of poor people in our society, they will reject the tax. When the Scottish poll tax measure was debated in the other place, the Government made a concession in respect of the mentally handicapped. They discovered a new category of person: the severely mentally handicapped. The Government decided, in all their generosity and majesty, to exempt the severely mentally handicapped, but not the merely mentally handicapped. In what kind of society do we live when the merely mentally handicapped — and all the physically handicapped — are to be taxed, so that the Dulwich factor may apply, and the wealthiest in the land are given a shameless handout?

My main objection is not on the financial argument or the venality argument, but on democratic grounds. I was interested to hear the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) wringing his hands over the state of the electoral register and the iniquities of the postal vote system — and quite right, too, although I would remind him, as a Member for an Ayrshire constituency, that if the electoral register had not been so disastrously bad in our part of the world, the Secretary of State for Defence would have been packing his Red Box and never returning to the House.

On the democratic argument, my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Provan (Mr. Wray) was absolutely right. The poll tax will take hundreds of thousands—indeed, millions—of people off the electoral register. If the head of a household of limited means is asked how many adults are living in the household, and the price of honesty is another £350, £500 or £750 per head, it will be in his interests to minimise the number of adults living in the household. We shall be back to the means test days, when inspectors came to the door and asked how many adults were living in the house. Suddenly, young people were away, staying with aunties, and people were hiding under beds and in cupboards. The price of being caught in one's own home will be the payment of hundreds of pounds more by people who cannot afford it. I do not know whether the advice of the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) to get on one's bike has been accepted in reality, but it will be accepted in theory because parents will say, "No, the kids are not here; they are in London"—or Manchester or Liverpool—"looking for work."

Another aspect of this tax is that it will destroy and disrupt family life. To admit that members of the family are living at home will lead to families paying more tax. That will be the result of this family-loving Conservative Government's policies. Many people will be taken off the electoral register. In this year of grace, 1987, is it respectable for a Conservative Government to seek to diminish the electoral register by removing vast numbers of people from it? Almost by definition, they are the least able to afford the tax and therefore, almost by definition, they are the least likely to vote for the Conservative party. Even according to the Conservative party's diluted concept of democracy, is it in the interests of that democracy to proceed with this tax?

I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to take note of my forecast that by the end of the debates on this tax it will be abandoned because the suburban peasants who vote for the Conservative party will revolt. In Scotland, this tax was acceptable only to the 20-odd per cent. who previously voted for the Tory party. In England and Wales, the Conservative party has to avoid seriously offending 50 per cent. of the electorate if it is to make the tax a vote winner. On the basis of the Scottish experience, I confidently predict that the Government cannot do it, that they will not do it, that sooner or later they will have to retreat in bad order, and that the poll tax will disappear.

That brings me to a very important point: what is to happen to the poll tax in Scotland? In the first few days after the general election and in whatever may be the opposite of the first flush of success, the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) clung to the idea that the poll tax must be implemented because it is to be legislated for in England and Wales. According to his curious logic, it would be nonsensical to implement the poll tax in one part of the United Kingdom but not to implement it in the remainder. I hope those words are firmly on record so that when the poll tax is abandoned in England and Wales it will also be abandoned in Scotland.

Under no circumstances must the poll tax be implemented in Scotland before it is implemented in the rest of the United Kingdom. If there is an undemocratic or anti-democratic attempt to impose the poll tax in Scotland before it is imposed in the rest of the United Kingdom, there will be abstention on a massive scale. There will be non-registration and non-payment on a massive scale. There will be a unity of purpose in Scotland that will flummox and bewilder those who sit on the Conservative Benches.

I have been very disappointed, though not surprised, by the reaction of Conservative Members to the outcome of the election in Scotland on 11 June. If they had had any grace, sense, or long-term vision, they would have reacted sensitively to their disastrous election result on 11 June. There has been no such generosity of spirit. Now, the ludicrous idea is that Scottish local government will be legislated for by a Committee that does not include a Scottish Office Minister. Those on the Government Benches sneer and say that because of the Union we, too, are lumbered with the status quo.

I have always supported the Union, but I do so only if it can be used as an instrument of progress. I do not want the world or this little island to be further divided up. But if the Conservative party believes that the union can survive when it is seen as the guarantor of mass unemployment and mass poverty in Scotland, if it thinks that the Union can be used as an instrument of interminable repression, it has another think coming to it. The Act of Union is written on parchment, not on tablets of stone. If the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) wants a place in the history books, let her reflect that the Falklands war will come to be regarded as a minor skirmish compared with the stigma that she will incur if, by her intransigence towards the people of Scotland, she succeeds in becoming the instrument of the destruction, after 280 years, of the Union.

6.5 pm

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): In 17 years, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I have never before had the opportunity to compliment an hon. Member on a maiden speech. I compliment the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) on his maiden speech. When perusing "The Oxford English Dictionary" it might be difficult to reconcile the term "non-controversial" with what he said. None the less, it was a powerful speech and it came from the heart. I look forward to hearing him speak on many other occasions, when his comments can be subjected to critical examination.

I was glad that the hon. Gentleman paid tribute to my old friend, John Corrie, who was a first-class Member of the House. We all look forward to his speedy return. Similarly, I compliment my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) on a very good maiden speech. I welcome the tribute that he paid to Richard Wainwright, who, with me, was a trustee of the parliamentary pension fund. He was a very distinguished and very hard working Member who looked after the interests of all hon. Members and tried to improve their pension arrangements.

I shall refer briefly to three issues. First, I support my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith), who referred to the muck-up by the Home Office of the postal voting arrangements. I welcome very much the attitude of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department who said that he would examine with a very flexible mind many of the points that had been made. I hope that changes will swiftly be made.

Secondly, the community charge legislation is to be welcomed and the sooner it is in force the better.

Thirdly, I wish to refer to the postal services in north-west London. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House should note that one of the purposes of this Adjournment motion debate is not to indulge in the rhetoric of major political issues, but to refer to matters that are of particular concern to our constituents. I have no knowledge of hordes of people who are anxious to read a work of fiction by a man named Peter Wright.

It is appalling that when he wrote to me the district postmaster in north-west London said that he understood and recognised that a change in the population had resulted in a substantially increased volume of mail, and that in order that particular addresses should not always have their first and only delivery, in many cases, at 12 noon, he was arranging to stagger deliveries, so that on one day their mail would be delivered at 8.30 am and on the next day it would arrive at noon. He is making everybody share the misery.

I do not criticise the postmen, who are doing a first-class job, but the management—and perhaps the union leadership—ought to realise that if there is an increase in the volume of mail their duty is to provide a service so that those who pay 18p and 13p for the delivery of their letters are provided with a proper service. The sooner that that is realised in north-west London, the better. I hope that my right hon. Friend wil convey those remarks to the chairman of the Post Office.

Last Friday my secretary posted two letters to me, not merely with the correct London postal district, but with the correct postal code. The small envelope, which was posted at 8·15 pm on Friday, arrived at my home in London NW2 on Saturday morning. That was the second letter that she had sent to me and it apologised for omitting to tell me something in the first letter. The first letter did not arrive on Saturday, even though it was posted some three hours earlier, at 5·15 pm, again with the correct London postal district and postal code. Might it be that it was too large for the Post Office?

I ask my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to take up this matter, because the larger envelope, which is supplied to us, is being delivered late, yet the smaller envelope is getting through. The Post Office must be told that this is not satisfactory to the House of Commons. As a result of the larger letter arriving late, the letters that I could have signed and posted on Saturday to arrive at my constituents' homes on Monday will not arrive until tomorrow, because I could not post them until today.

The last matter that I want to ask my right hon. Friend is whether, before the House rises for the recess, he will tell my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment that I am becoming tired of waiting for him to take over, under the provisions of the Housing Act 1980, the functions of the London borough of Camden in respect of its right-to-buy applications. There are hundreds of cases, not scores, where Camden is in breach of its statutory duty under that Act. It is denying hundreds of my constituents their right to cease paying rent and buy their own homes. I am aware that the power exists in the Act, because I was one of the Ministers who was responsible for that legislation.

The time has long passed when Camden should be allowed to thumb its nose at the Government and the law of the land. Behind the scenes its officers are saying, "Don't worry, we know how not to provide the information". The council is refusing to fill vacancies months after they have been created, and over and over again the ordinary people are suffering. The ordinary people showed what they felt on 11 June, because the overwhelming support that I received in my constituency came from council estates where people are sick and tired of the inactivity of Camden in dealing with this matter.

Those are the points that I wish to raise with my right hon. Friend. I hope that they will be dealt with before we rise for a well-deserved summer recess.

6.12 pm

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): I have listened to the five maiden speeches that have been made. One of the joys of being an hon. Member is that when one hears new Members making their maiden speeches one learns something about the charms and problems of the area that they represent. I am sure sure that all hon. Members will listen with great interest to their future speeches.

I should like to congratulate warmly my two hon. Friends on their maiden speeches. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Provan (Mr. Wray) clearly outlined why we have this enormous north-south divide. He outlined the problems that his constituents face and why in the election on 11 June there was an overwhelming vote of support for the Labour party in Scotland.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) made an outstanding speech. He spoke with great confidence and sincerity on an issue that will, without doubt, dominate the House in the coming months. The comments that he made and illustrations that he gave about the effects of the poll tax in Scotland will be of interest to every hon. Member who has not suffered from the effects of it but who has deep concerns as to its effect

The issue that I should like to raise is the conditions under which men and women are kept in custody in police cells. I must tell the Leader of the House that at the present time 355 men and women are being kept in police custody because our prisons are overcrowded. If those men and women were receiving the same rights as unconvicted prisoners who are on remand in prison, there would be no need for me to speak in the debate. The conditions under which men and women are being kept are an utter disgrace in this day and age.

The rights of the Home Office to hold men and women in such conditions come from the Imprisonment (Temporary Provisions) Act 1980. I stress the word "temporary" because when that measure was introduced in 1980 a firm assurance was given by the Home Secretary, now the noble Lord Whitelaw, that those provisions would be temporary. In 1982 only 42 people were kept in police cells, but in June 1987 there were 355.

The former Home Secretary, the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), made a statement that was issued by the Home Office on 2 July 1983. It said:

"The Home Secretary, Mr. Leon Brittan, said today . . . he was determined to ensure that the use of police cells to hold prisoners is eliminated before the end of this year."

In a written answer the former Parliamentary Under-Secretary for the Home Department, the hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), said:

"I am conscious that it is not always possible to ensure that prisoners held in police custody receive all the entitlements that would apply if they were in prison custody and I am aware that there have been particular difficulties in relation to visits and exercise."—[Official Report, 8 May 1985; Vol. 78, c. 407.]

How true that is today, yet that statement was made over two years ago.

Sadly, the position for men and women who are being held in police cells has worsened since then. I have some comments that were made by Sue Richley, in April of this year. She is the deputy chairman of the bench at South Western magistrates' court, which is a major court in the south of London. Although it is not in my constituency, it is in the borough of which I am one of the Members. I shall not quote all that she said, but these are some of the matters to which she referred. She described the conditions that she had seen and referred to the conditions at the court in Lavender Hill and in similar cells that she had visited elsewhere in London. She said:

"These court cells were made for people to be kept in for no more than four hours while they were waiting to appear in court. Some are being held for weeks and many for several days.

There is no proper bed, just a kind of bench that pulls out from the wall on which the"

police officers

"put an old mattress . . .

There is no room for a chair or table or any furniture . . .

There are washing facilities but they are very poor . . .

There is nowhere for"

"to put their belongings. They just keep everything stored up in lots of plastic bags."

Those comments were made by a magistrate in April 1987. Wandsworth prison is in my constituency. Over the years I have visited that prison on many occasions, so I have a fair idea of what conditions should be like for people who are being held in prison. Prison standing order 8A clearly says:

"An unconvicted prisoner will be afforded immediate and ample facilities for communicating with his relatives, friends and legal advisers."

As well, he has the right to daily changes of clothes and the right to have food brought in from outside by relatives or friends. That is all denied to the men and women kept in police custody.

Two of my constituents have been held in custody for four months. The wife was shunted around—the only description that I can give—for weeks from police cell to police cell. She is now held in Holloway prison. Likewise, her husband was shunted around and he is now held in police cells in Northamptonshire. His home is in my constituency in Wandsworth. When his relatives sought to visit him, they were denied access and told that visits were not allowed.

Last week I took up this matter with the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg). As a result of pressure, my constituent is now allowed visits once a week. For more than three months that husband and wife have been denied access to each other. They are convicted of no offence. They are in custody on remand, but that proves nothing. We all know that vast numbers of people are remanded in custody and are often acquitted and discharged. I have two letters which the Leader of the House might like to see. The husband is now on a hunger strike, protesting at the refusal by the authorities to allow him to see his wife. It is an utter disgrace that such conditions are imposed on people who have not been convicted of any offence.

Time does not permit me to outline what I think should be done. I happen to know a bit about prisons, and I disagree with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser). The tragedy is that far too many people are in prison. A great many should never have been put in prison. They may need some form of care, but not prison. So long as they are in police custody, constituents such as mine will suffer the basic denial of what are their rights even though they are held in custody. If my constituents were held in prison they could enjoy all those rights that are clearly stated in prison rule books.

I beg the Leader of the House to take up this matter with the Home Office. I have quoted the comments in 1983 of the former Home Secretary the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks. The position has worsened since then. There are people living in the most degarding conditions that one can imagine. They are denied access to relatives and friends. My constituents, who have been married for many years and have children, are denied their rights. This is an utter outrage and I beg the Leader of the House to do something about it, and as soon as possible, not only for my constituents, but for the many men and women also suffering under these conditions.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): I rise with some trepidation, as this is my maiden speech, and with some confusion about what maiden speeches should be. I have sat through this debate and many others in the short time since I became a Member thinking that maiden speeches should be uncontroversial and related to a subject pertaining to one's constituency. But it seems that that message has not got through to several Labour Members. I sat through one maiden speech this afternoon by a Labour Member feeling considerable resentment about his arrogant assumption that he had a monopoly on care. Some of us have become Members because we care about people. We care deeply about the people in our constituencies. We shall not take from Labour Members in what are supposed to be uncontroversial speeches assumptions that we lack care and that they have a monopoly on it. As the hon. Gentleman who made that assumption is not here, I hope that he will read Hansard to find the depth of my feeling and, I am sure, that of many of my hon. Friends on the matter. I am sure that you will be relieved to know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that that is the last controversial matter to which I shall refer.

I have the great honour of standing in the House as the Member for Esher. That seat has been the subject of two previous maiden speeches since the war. The last was by my predecessor, Sir Carol Mather, in 1970. He spent 17 happy years here working hard for his constituents, the last 11 as a Whip. Before entering the House Carol Mather spent 22 years serving in the Welsh Guards and, sadly, was one of the declining number of hon. Members who had a Military Cross for the services he rendered for this country in the last war. He was a heroic man. Sometimes that was not always noticed because of his quiet disposition. His service as a liaison officer to Montgomery, his capture and subsequent escape and many other incidents during the war are a tribute to him. The constituents of Esher were proud to have him as their Member for 17 years, during which he assiduously looked after their interests, never failing to take up a case and always being particularly interested in the concerns which they brought to him. As I said, this is a proud moment for me to make my first speech as his successor.

It is also a proud moment for me to mention Esher. Not everyone necessarily knows of the joys of Esher. If one drives down the A3, even perhaps slightly faster than the official speed limit, one may not necessarily notice the beauty of the countryside which lies on either side. On the section of the M25 that abuts onto the A3 to the east, one may be going too fast, finding too much other traffic or hearing too much road noise—a matter to which I draw the attention of the House—to notice the green fields and the quiet tranquility of the area. I urge those hon. Members who adopt that fast practice to see some of the lovely villages that comprise the constituency, including Thames Ditton, Claygate, Ripley, East Horsley — villages of great distinction—and perhaps to shop in Cobham, which has an ancient mill site of interest. I commend some of the fine houses in the constituency, many now looked after by the National Trust. I urge a visit to Claremont, a house with tragic associations, with the death of Lord Clive and the premature death in childbirth of Princess Charlotte. It has a more appealing interest as well in the sense that it is connected with Vanbrugh, Kent and Capability Brown—a worthy tribute to their work, especially in the gardens which are well worth the time spent away from the A3.

There are many other facets of the constituency which I should draw to the attention of the House, perhaps most notably the Royal Horticultural Society gardens at Wisley —a fine example of the way in which we in Britain can not only talk about gardens but grow them. As perhaps the world's worst gardener, I look with complete admiration at everything on display at Wisley.

Another aspect of my constituency that is worthy of note is the great voluntary spirit, which is part of the way of life of this country of ours. People join together to do things that the Government do not do and should not be looked to to do because they are so much better done by the community. One example of which the people of Esher are justifiably proud is the Princess Alice hospice, put together through voluntary donations and of great service to those who, sadly, need its help.

The constituency that I represent houses 62,500 electors or thereabouts who reside in parts of the boroughs of Elmbridge and Guildford. It is bounded by the river Thames, and the river Mole and the river Wey also play their part. As I said, I urge hon. Members to come and look for themselves. If they do, they will be greatly impressed by the wonderful commons, fields and farmland which make up a rural setting in close proximity to London. That is the matter to which I wish to refer today.

In an age of economic growth it is vital that we should remember how important it is to preserve the environment and thus the quality of life. If we fail in that duty now, it will be too late to try to recover the environment for the generations who come after us. The green belt around London—of course, it applies to other cities, too, but I am speaking particularly of the area that I represent—enables people to travel and find countryside rapidly. That is not possible in many other countries that I have visited. The green belt was brought in by statutory instrument in 1955 and the provisions strengthened in circular 14/84. People living in and near the areas that it affects have reason to be eternally grateful for it. There is every justification for continuing the green belt, partly because it enhances the quality of life to which I referred. We need to stop villages coalescing into one great concrete jungle and to prevent complete over-building in the south-east, which would prevent us from enjoying environmental pleasures and which would result in overcrowding and overuse of facilities and roads. Far from representing bad planning the green belt restrictions represent extremely good planning. They encourage industries to locate in other parts of the country—which many hon. Members would welcome—rather than trying to develop the green fields of the south-east. The green belt is critical for other reasons. It is one of those great environmental developments which have awakened the better spirit of people in the south-east and made them go out and work for themselves in their residents' associations and so on, to protect themselves from possible encroachment.

The green belt is a vital matter of Government concern. The green belt and threats to it lie at the very heart of the relationship between central and local government — whether the interests of the locality should take precedent. I was delighted by the statement of the Government in the previous Parliament to the effect that they would resist further encroachments into the green belt. I am especially mindful of the statement by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) in his previous incarnation. He made it quite clear to property developers who wished to build large and unwanted shopping complexes on green belt land that they would have to suffer the full costs of any application for appeal against local objections because there would be a presumption against such schemes. I have in mind the Elmbridge mall scheme in Esher, which many of us fervently hope will not go ahead. It is unwanted and unnecessary and will be of no advantage to the local environment. I hope that Ministers' statements will be further developed into a coherent policy. That would be a good theme for the Government to pursue in this, the European Year of the Environment.

In its 1984 report the Select Committee on the Environment said that the green belt should be sacrosanct. I endorse that view and I have already stated the reasons why. Many of my constituents are very concerned about the confusing signals which are coming from the Government and which arise out of the current process of planning appeals. There are many occasions when coherent local objections to a scheme seem to be overridden when the developer has gone to appeal, the inspector has reported and the Secretary of State has made a decision. It is important in a democratic society that we realise that this gives rise to immense frustration at local level. Where there is clearly stated local opposition to a scheme, we must ensure that there does not appear to be an imposition of a different decision from above. If the Secretary of State for the Environment has no alternative — because the statute leaves him no alternative — the Government should seriously consider whether the statutes are correct or whether they need further review. During the lifetime of this Parliament I shall push hard to make sure that the statutes say what my constituents feel they should say — that is, to give prime responsibility for such matters to local interests.

Borough councils have a major responsibility to ensure that the green belt that we are protecting is kept in good condition and does not become scrubland or run down. They have a duty to plant and maintain trees and to maintain and improve common land. They must look for sensible and sympathetic alternative uses of farm buildings so that the farmers do not have to break up their farmland into small units, which is a subject of great concern. National Government have a responsibility in this respect also. We need to consider rural planning policies in view of the development pressure and movement of people and industries in the south-east. If developers could not hope to override local interests by going to appeal to the Secretary of State, that could reduce the speculative purchase of land by developers who think that, if they keep trying, ultimately they will win.

Many property developers are ingenious men with a great deal of willpower. If they were told that there would never be an opportunity for them to have land banks in the green belt — because they would never be given the right to develop them — they might turn their ingenuity, enthusiasm and financial acumen to some of our inner-city areas and derelict land. That happens to be a crucial and highly welcome plank of this Government's policies. It is a major part of the Queen's Speech. For the Government to establish this central platform for their current legislation, it is vital for them never to reduce the controls on the green belt and to ensure that, by removing hope from the developers, they also remove some of the pressure which is causing people so much concern.

This matter goes to the heart of some of our debates, and especially the debate between central and local government. I commend the green belt issue to the House. It has a wide interest for those of us who fervently believe in the environmental matters which are so important to our way of life and our quality of life. It will be a major part of our forthcoming debates on issues which may, at first sight, not appear to be directly relevant to it.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray). It falls to me to congratulate the hon. Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) on his maiden speech. He showed us that he has an encyclopaedic knowledge of his constituency and did a fine job as an advocate of tourism in the area. He also paid a fine tribute to his predecessor in the House.

I shall speak only briefly because of the limited time available to me. My remarks are addressed essentially to the Government, but they also have implications for members of the official Opposition. How will the Government and the official Opposition respond to the fact that the Government have no mandate to rule in Scotland? I remind the House that, of the 72 Members of Parliament from Scotland, 62 sit on the Opposition Benches and only 10 on the Government Benches. Despite consistent pressure since the State Opening of Parliament and throughout the debate on the Loyal Address, there has been no positive response from the Government on how they will handle Scottish affairs or respond to the election results north of the border.

The issue has been exercising the minds of people not only in the House but in the media in Scotland. The issues have not only been mentioned by Opposition Members. There has been pressure from the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), who said:

"It is commonly said that we must remain a united kingdom . . . The parrot cry that we must just have a united kingdom bears no relationship to the reality of modern times."—[Official Report, 2 July 1987; Vol. 118, c. 666.]

The right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen) said:

"I have to say that I do not easily entertain the prospect of going through this Parliament assuming that we shall continue the present basis for Scottish affairs without consideration."—[Official Report, 30 June 1987; Vol. 118, c. 398.]

Both right hon. Members urged that attention be paid to the Scottish dimension.

Added to this, last week the Government found themselves in a dilemma when looking for Members to serve on the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs. Three of the five Conservative Members who were available to serve on that Committee refused to do so. That may have left the Government in a dilemma, but it has left Scotland with a major problem. The work of Ministers should come under effective scrutiny from Back-Bench Members. If we do not have a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs because Government Members refuse to serve on it, there are plenty of Opposition Members prepared to serve on such a Committee to ensure that legislation is subjected to the scrutiny that it needs. It is not as though there were not enough issues for the Select Committee to discuss. We must consider the Government of Scotland itself; the prospect of nuclear dumping; the future of Ravenscraig; the prospect of many of our industries being taken over; the dilemma of the whisky industry in the wake of the Guinness takeover; the problems of agriculture and fishing; and, not least, the poll tax.

It would be wrong for the House to adjourn until the Government gave us clear guidance on how they will respond to the election results in Scotland. It is not good enough to ask Scottish Members to return to their constituencies during the recess unable to say, "We will ensure that these issues are raised in the House through the appropriate channels." The Government seem to be unwilling to establish a Select Committee.

[Mrs. Margaret Ewing]

The official Opposition in Scotland also have a major responsibility. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) leads a band of 50. The people of Scotland have given a mandate to the Labour party, and we ask the Labour party to take a clear initiative on this. Or, as is predicted in some newspapers in Scotland, will it be no action yet again from the Labour party, but only oratory? The hon. Member for Garscadden may laugh, but the Labour party is looking constantly over its shoulder at the concept of independence as propounded by the Scottish National party. The Labour party in Scotland has already had eight years to deliver the Scottish people from the Government's economic policies, but they have failed signally to do so. Another four years of similarly inept opposition will be rejected by the people of Scotland at the next general election. The Labour party is equally on trial.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): This is my first opportunity to tell the new Leader of the House how glad I am to see him in that role and how much I hope that he will enjoy it. He more than anyone will appreciate the difficulty of following the right hon. Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen), who was held in genuine affection by hon. Members on both sides of the House and whose humour and eloquence of phrase dominated much of the previous Parliament.

Today we have heard a series of excellent maiden speeches. The debate lends itself to such speeches, and all the hon. Members who spoke today did great credit to themselves and to their constituents.

The hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie) was fortunate to be the first to be put out of her misery. Although I was not in the Chamber to hear her speech —I was attending a meeting—I understand that she can preserve for her memoirs a unique commendation from my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who described her speech as formidable. Although my right hon. Friend is a controversial figure in the House, he is also recognised as a master of the parliamentary arts, and such a comment from him must mean that the hon. Lady's speech was well worth listening to.

The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) made an extremely articulate and good maiden speech. He was extremely gracious in his remarks about a friend whom we were sorry to see leaving the House. As he said, Alf Dubs is an extremely nice man of great diligence who looked after his constituents assiduously. The hon. Gentleman claimed that Battersea was the original yuppie land. It is the normal tradition in the House to try to find something nice to say about one's constituency! But I enjoyed the hon. Gentleman's contribution and look forward to hearing from him again.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Provan (Mr. Wray) made a wide-ranging maiden speech which was a mixture of humour and conviction. He paid tribute to a dear friend of mine and of yours, Mr. Deputy Speaker, Hugh Brown entered the House at the same time as we did, and the House will miss him sorely. My hon. Friend's speech was hardly non-controversial, but, as we heard about the problems of his constituency, we understood why he thought he needed to speak in that way. He mentioned the problems of the poll tax. I share his incredulity that, having drawn the correct conclusion that the present tax system is wrong, the Government decided to put in its place something that is unfairer and more difficult to defend.

My hon. Friend the Member for Provan mentioned fluoridation. That issue gave rise to some strange coalitions across the Floor of the House during the previous Parliament. I remember the many bitter opponents of fluoridation fighting well into the night on the issue. I wish that we had had an extra ally and an extra vote then. It is interesting that fluoridation was considered outside the context of the possible privatisation of the water system. One is bound to wonder how the decision making that is left to the water authorities at the moment will be handled and whether the indemnification that has been given to the public bodies will still exist for private organisations.

The hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) made a maiden speech in which he referred to Richard Wainwright, his predecessor as a respected Member. That certainly is the case. Richard and I were both made Privy Councillors on the same day and I have always felt great friendship and affection for him. I was glad to hear the hon. Member speak of him as he did. I understand that the constituency has never had a Conservative Member of Parliament. That is one record that I am rather sorry to see broken, as the hon. Gentleman will appreciate. As far as I can gather from his speech, it seems that his constituents spend half their lives in support of hounds pursuing all the poor wretched animals in his constituency. He made an impassioned plea for blood sports, although, after listening to the later part of his speech, I could not help thinking that he wanted to replace the fox with the planners.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) made a singularly articulate speech. It was controversial but very effective and very powerful. He spoke with as little affection of the poll tax as did my hon. Friend the Member for Provan. The hon. Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) spoke with pride of his membership of the House. I say quite genuinely that I hope it is a pride that he carries however long he stays in the House. I think the Leader of the House would say the same as myself. I have been here 23 years and whenever I walk into the Chamber I think that it is a unique privilege and a unique honour. Having a marginal seat, I am always delighted when I am re-elected, to my incredulity, at successive elections. What he said was appreciated on all sides of the House. He made an impassioned plea for the preservation of the green belt, which I am sure will strike many a reflective chord in his constituency. I am glad to see that we have someone who intends to set out to become the terror of the developers in the new Parliament.

The hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) is, if she will excuse the phrase, a recycled Member. It is good to see her back and to hear her speak again. I think she will not be offended if I say that I almost recognised some of her phrases. I am quite sure that she will be as combative and active as she was when she was previously here. I look forward to her further speeches.

The hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) referred to the voting shambles. It certainly sounded that, and it merits a proper investigation. It is interesting to note that there is another form of disfranchisement that has also inadvertently taken place. A consequence of the bed and breakfast legislation, unintended as it was, is that a lot of youngsters are moving around so frequently that there is now a virtual disfranchised army of should-be young voters. It is a quite serious problem that I expect every hon. Member has encountered. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) made a very effective constituency speech. His indictment of the attitude of the Home Office on immigration, when he said that if one can prove that one does not want to come here it is willing to let one in, was effectively made.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) referred to the issue that we discussed earlier today—the Wright book and the way in which it has been handled by the Government. The Leader of the House knows that a feeling I have had for a long time and which I have repeated frequently is that it is a matter of great disbelief to me that here in this mother of Parliaments we can have a Prime Minister, Law Officers and even Government Back Benchers who are utterly disinterested that there was an attempt to organise a coup to overthrow an elected Government. I find that bewildering and more than slightly worrying.

I was deeply disturbed to hear earlier today that the Librarian of the House has been told that he must not hold a copy of the Wright book. We hope to pursue that further because the Librarian takes his instructions from the Speaker via the appropriate committee, and purely through that route. The Committee and the Chairman do not exist. As the Speaker was unaware of any such instruction having been given, we want to know who told the Librarian that he is not to hold a copy of a book which any of our constituents travelling to America will be able to buy and probably bring back, but which Members of Parliament are to be denied the opportunity to read.

Despite all the arguments that my hon. Friends put forward for our not going on recess in a fortnight's time, I am very much looking forward to that opportunity.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): We have had a wide-ranging debate, in which many points have been raised, and I will do my best briefly to answer as many as I can. If there are any specific points that I do not answer, I will certainly write to the hon. Member who raised the point.

As this is the first Adjournment debate for a number of years that has not been led either in person or in proxy by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), it would be wrong of me not to say how much Government Members appreciated his courtesy. He is a formidable parliamentary orator. He had a distinguished Front Bench career over 20 years and we will miss him from the Front Bench. However, I have no doubt that he will make his presence felt in many ways in the years to come.

As the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) said, we have had six maiden speeches—three from the Government side and three from the Opposition side. I am sure that all who made their maiden speeches today can be well pleased. They made vigorous and forceful speeches. There was nothing stereotyped about any of them. Each hon. Member spoke from his or her constituency point of view about things they felt very concerned about. Their constituencies can be proud of the way that they have started their parliamentary careers.

We heard first the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mrs. Michie). She made her constituency sound very attractive to me. I have to sail my boat to where I want to go on holiday, and from where my boat is situated at present the 88 days of the summer recess will not get me around to Argyll. However, I am tempted to do it in two stints—this year and next year.

My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) made a very effective speech. I have known my hon. Friend for many years and I am delighted to see him in the House. I know that he will make many more speeches. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan (Mr. Wray) spoke well and with sincerity about things that he feels passionately about. Having been the Chief Whip when the Fluoridation Bill went through, I hope that he does not take it amiss that I am glad that he was not around in those days to cause us additional problems.

My hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) certainly made a very effective speech about the opportunities and problems in his constituency. He spoke about the difficulties that many of his constituents and businesses have with planning controls. I am delighted that he found time in his speech to make a reference to field sports.

The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) made an impassioned and effective speech. We shall certainly listen to his future contributions with added respect.

The predecessor of my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor), Sir Carol Mather, and I spent many years together and, I might add, many nights together in the Whips Office. He is one of my dearest friends. My hon. Friend made an effective speech, in which he talked about the problems of the process and the interaction of central and local government and of the problems of the green belt. I look forward to more contributions from him in the future.

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) raised the subject of the Peter Wright book, as did the right hon. Member for Swansea, West. It is wrong to say that the Government do not take this matter extremely seriously. I advise anybody who has any doubts about that to look at the comprehensive statement made by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 6 May 1987. That set out in great detail the position the Government have taken and what has been done in the way of investigating the claims. I do not want to add any more than that except to say that it is not true to say it was not dealt with carefully and with a great deal of trouble. However, I should remind the House that in the New South Wales proceedings the Government are seeking to uphold the lifelong duty of confidentiality that is owed by all members of the security services, present or former, to preserve the confidentiality in respect of matters arising from their work, unless authorised to publish. That is an important principle and I believe that the Government are right to do everything in their power to seek to uphold it.

Mr. Alan Williams: If it is so important to uphold that principle in Australia, why is it not important to uphold the same principle in the United States?

Mr. Wakeham: The Government's legal advisers will advise on what to do. It is not for me to comment any further on the matter except to say that the Government will take all steps possible to preserve that principle.

[Mr. Wakeham]

The question as to whether the book should be put in the Library is a matter for Mr. Speaker and not the Government. It must ultimately be for the House to decide these matters if there is any difficulty.

Mr. Winnick: Is it possible for the Leader of the House to use his good offices to try to ensure that there is a statement on the position arising from the fact that the book is being published in America and will be freely available for anyone who comes in from the United States? Could we have a statement this week on that aspect?

Mr. Wakeham: I will look at that matter, but I cannot give the hon. Gentleman any encouragement to think that there will be a further statement from the Government this week on that aspect.

My hon. Friends the Members for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) and for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) raised the matter of postal voting. I know that the Home Secretary is concerned about that. I know that he is looking into it and I will see that the points raised are referred to him.

I know that the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) is in contact with the Home Secretary. I heard his speech and I recognise the careful and sincere way in which he put the points of his constituents. I can do no more than say that I will refer his remarks and the way in which he made them to the Home Secretary to see whether anything can be done to assist his constituents.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate raised other matters concerning the size of envelopes and the postal service. I shall refer the matter of the postal service generally to my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I will see that the chairman of the Post Office knows about it. I feel that I should look into the matter of envelopes for the House of Commons myself and I shall certainly see what can be done. I shall refer the disturbing information about Camden and the difficulties my hon. Friend's constituents have over the right to buy to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

The hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) showed a great knowledge of the problems of his constituents. He clearly knows a great deal about the way in which the police service and custody should be organised in this country. What he said caused me some concern. He has courteously sent me correspondence so that I can see that the Home Secretary has the matters immediately in hand and will write to him to give him any information he can.

Resolved,

That this House, at its rising on Friday 24th July, do adjourn until Wednesday 21st October.

Orders of the Day

Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Question, That the Bill be now read a Second time, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 54(1) (Consolidated Fund Bills), and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Benyon.]

British Broadcasting Corporation

7.16 pm

Mr. Peter Temple-Morris (Leominster): It is an honour and a pleasure to introduce the debate upon the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill. Although I have done so once before, far more frequently during my parliamentary career I have laboured on during the watches of the night. Therefore, it is a fair reward for a "Consolidated Funder" that, on occasions, he gets to speak at 7.16 pm. I shall speak on a subject about which I care very much and in which I have absolutely no interest whatsoever to declare other than a strong belief in the British Broadcasting Corporation and — perhaps even more important—a strong belief in its capacity to play a formidable role in the British interest abroad. The importance of satellite television in general and satellite television news in particular is recognised in all parts of the House. In a few moments, I shall refer to certain early-day motions that were tabled only a few months ago during the final stages of the last Parliament.

Satellite television news is a fact of life. All concerned with it recognise it to be the way of the future. Various concerns in various countries are rapidly expanding into satellite television, whereas we are patiently waiting. We have to, because the BBC has no option but to approach the Government in the matter. It is not a matter of going cap in hand; it is an approach that has to be made. Although other countries are expanding satellite television, we are patiently waiting for a Government decision.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has been considering the matter. I appreciate that it is complicated and that policy questions are involved. That is one of the reasons I raise the matter now. I hope that it will be an additional spur to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and his right hon. and hon. colleagues to consider matters that are important to the national interest with all due speed. My hon. Friend's Department has been aware of the matter since November 1986. As the months go by — one cannot help but think that a year will soon pass — matters get more and more difficult for BBC external services as others are beginning, continuing and developing satellite television. It is no excuse for Government to say — as my hon. Friend says, it is not for me to anticipate his contribution — that they want details on this or that. So far, since the submission of the matter in November 1986, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office having known of the matter for many months before that, there has been no reaction other than to ask for details.

The demand for a decision, as I have said, is within the knowledge, and I hope has the support, of the House. Two early-day motions were tabled—of course, I had a lot to do with them—in the last stages of the last Parliament in only April of this year. Both those motions were interlinked and together give a measure of Back-Bench support—not just Conservative Back-Bench support—for a decision on this matter.

Early-day motion 846 was tabled during the previous Parliament with my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker), myself and others as principal signatories. It stressed the urgency of the overall situation. It made no mention of the BBC, but drew the Government's attention to the fast expansion that was taking place in satellite television. It urged the Government to declare support for a United Kingdom programme of satellite television news. I repeat that that motion made no mention of the BBC. It was a totall Conservative motion, put down on 3 April 1987, and by 15 May, when the House was already up and we were about to fight the general election, it had gathered 145 signatues. Those 145 Conservative signatures represented more than half of those on the Conservative Benches who can sign early-day motions. I ask the Minister to take note of that.

Early-day motion 852 was put down by me and was an all-party motion. It was tabled several days after the previous motion, but by 15 May it had gathered 224 signatories from all parts of the House. If we include an amendment, which was not unfriendly, that motion had 230 supporters in all. It was a BBC motion and it overtly urged the Government to allow the BBC to proceed with satellite television news as soon as possible. In other words, it urged the Government to make up their mind. Of the 224 signatories to that motion, it is perhaps educative for my hon. Friend if I put it on record that there were 118 Conservative signatures, 90 Labour signatures, 12 alliance signatures and four others.

If this matter is raised again, it is important for my hon. Friend to realise the support from all sides of the House for a decision on this matter. The 118 Conservative supporters represented almost all the 145 who had signed the motion that made no mention of the BBC. I sent out letters to exactly the same people who had signed the first motion, asking for their support for early-day motion 852, and only 27 declined overtly to support the BBC. There is a lesson for us from those early-day motions.

The present situation is that satellite television and satellite television news is a fact of life. Equally, it is also a fact that a formidable American lead has been built up. Such a lead is not automatically attractive to everybody, not least the Third world, that would, perhaps, like something a little different and a little more balanced. Let me run through those who are engaged in satellite television news. Cable News Network, CNN, is marketing its 24-hour news service all over the world. Columbia Broadcasting System is marketing its evening news in Europe. National Broadcasting Company is selling its "Today" programme to Australia and is marketing its news programme on European cable. Independent Television News—this debate is not, in any way, an occasion to criticise ITN—is in Europe via Superchannel.

Good luck to ITN, but my message to the Front Bench is to let the BBC in as well. It is wrong that the BBC should be kept out because of its structure and charter. However, I applaud ITN's efforts and the fact that it is marketing a European news programme on the Superchannel. That programme is directed for a commercial return. An important point to bear in mind is that ITN, in common with others, is not making much money at the moment. However, it is investing in the future and it is a commercial future. Indeed, for everyone concerned except for the BBC it is a commercial venture.

ITN has linked hands with the mighty American Broadcasting Corporation to form World Television News and is planning a 24-hour cable satellite news service. Again, that will be a commerical undertaking. Those are commercial undertakings, but another important category we should not forget is Government — offered free services. Among our European partners, the French are already seriously considering that option with regard to Francophone countries. Bearing in mind France's track record on cultural diplomacy and its expenditure on such matters, I have no doubt that the Frenoh will pursue that option. The United States Information Agency has a free service in operation on the Worldnet service for news on television via satellite. That news is available to anyone, anywhere, who can take satellite television. However, an important point to consider is that there is a third category, a unique category—the BBC.

Although the BBC may be dependent upon Government for its finances, the whole essence of the BBC is that it is independent of Government when it comes to its broadcasts. It is a unique category, so it should be treated with all due respect and consideration.

The importance of satellite television has been recognised. It is vital for international communication, commerce and information. In many respects, information equals influence. I happen to believe—I trust that it is not a jingoistic, nationalistic comment to make—that this country has an influence for good. That influence should be displayed across the world, if only the Minister and his Department would allow the BBC to exert that influence.

With regard to the development of satellite television there is a demand—it will become apparent—for the BBC to enter this area. Although the BBC is not in the game at the moment, and although it has not seriously marketed a project, there have already been many favourable approaches. ITN is already in the game, quite rightly so; it can go out and sell something. It has taken every opportunity, via the newspapers, to inform us of the progress it has made. However, the BBC has its hands firmly tied behind its back. The BBC could sign up 10 countries tomorrow. Indeed, 20 other countries have made it clear that they would want the service, but they would be unable to pay in whole or in part for the service.

That problem brings us to the realm of public service broadcasting in the international context. The BBC will, if it is allowed, quickly expand. There is an enormous potential for the BBC within the Third world, where the news service is much wanted. I believe—I do not want to embarrass my hon. Friend; indeed, I am sure that he will smile—that there is considerable support for what I am saying within his Department. I trust that I am not being too optimistic about that.

There are difficulties—piracy, censorship and so on—but we must make a start. We must endeavour to create the demand. We already have examples to prove that that demand is there. I was amused by the German example. East Germany, and in particular East Berlin, can get West German television. When the East German Government considered their position, such was the demand from the rest of East Germany to receive West German television that the Government had to make arrangements to supply that service throughout East Germany. Therefore, virtually all that country receives the television broadcasts from the Federal Republic.

We have encouraging signs from the Soviet Union thanks to Mr. Gorbachev and what he is endeavouring to do under the policy of so-called openness. It is no accident that, as part of that policy, Western leaders have been allowed to appear on Soviet television. That development is extremely relevant when we discuss satellite television news. Those Western leaders have been allowed to say exactly what they want, including my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. Before my right hon. Friend went to Moscow, the BBC Russian service was unjammed. Shortly after my right hon. Friend returned from Moscow, the Voice of America was unjammed. I am not attempting to suggest that the Voice of America is a blinding example of neutrality, but it is now being transmitted into the Soviet Union.

The possibilities are enormous. The future is beyond the satellite and the take-up of satellites by national networks and cable. The future will be the age of the dish. I have seen a few dishes and I appreciate what they are like. I have seen them sitting on top of the odd school. However, in general, such dishes are for the rich and the ingenious. It is surprising how many people, even now, are endeavouring to make them and the number who, within a short period and in various countries, will make them. It is no accident that the USIA, with its Worldnet publications that are associated with the service, is publicising how to "do it yourself" and make a dish. Of course, that body wants people in many different countries to have dishes and to listen in.

The impact of satellite for the future is being seriously considered in the Eastern bloc and in many Communist countries. I believe that there was an article in Pravda quite recently that went into this in some detail, so seriously does the Soviet Union take this matter.

A matter of vital concern are the qualifications that the BBC needs to participate. Hon. Members are aware of many of the arguments and I intend to run through them reasonably swiftly. Lord Reith began external broadcasting on the radio 55 years ago, so the BBC has 55 years' experience of external international broadcasting. Incidentally, as my hon. Friend knows, Lord Reith could not get the money either. However, he was able to raid his own funds to get the money, but that cannot be done now because of the structure. The licence fee cannot be raided.

I hesitate to say it, and I hope that it is not now true, but the Government then—I hope not now—did not have the imagination to appreciate what we now realise was one of the most remarkable feats of external broadcasting in the world. The external services give the BBC's efforts credibility and their audience has been built up to 125 million. When travelling, we have all encountered people hurrying out of rooms and from under the so-called palm tree to listen to it.

That credibility has been achieved at the price of discomfort from time to time. I give one relevant example, about which one or two people, inside and outside Government, have been concerned. Many people say that the Iran revolution was brought on by the BBC's external services. I think that I am entitled—with, as the Minister knows, an Iranian wife who had a considerable stake in the ancient regime there and whose family had to flee that country because of the revolution—to make it clear to the House that those accusations against the BBC are untrue. The BBC spoke the truth. Enormous pressure was put on it. In my humble way, I, with my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths), was asked by the then Iranian embassy to go over the scripts at the BBC. We did that. However, my hon. Friend, with his previous journalistic experience, and I, with knowledge of Iran, could not find anything wrong. I might add that I did more than reading scripts, because I followed the matter in some detail for many months. It is wrong to think that, because the BBC speaks the truth, it should be accused of bringing somebody down. How much worse it would have been had the BBC not spoken the truth, but the Government in Iran had fallen anyway—as, I am sad to say, was probable.

As for the BBC's qualifications and readiness, it has the appropriate structure in place. It has the experience that it has gained in radio. It has more foreign correspondents than any other organisation engaged in this enterprise. As I have said, it also has tradition and credibility. It has the news resources and the backing of Television Centre, with all its expertise.

On cost and timing, I hope my hon. Friends will sympathise and agree that the sort of money that we are discussing will hardly break the bank. I advise my hon. Friend that it is not a question of the BBC coming cap in hand or demanding more and more money or saying that, because it is part of the public sector, we, the great strong Government, cannot give it the money for which it asks. Satellite television will involve considerable returns and considerable profits will increasingly be available. I dare say that from time to time one would have to sort out the balance between the BBC's public service element and the profitable activities that will be available to it. The capital costs will be £1·4 million, and £7·8 million per annum will be required to run it on the basis of a five-day service with all possible economies. Obviously, a seven-day service would be more expensive: indeed, one could spend more money on the whole thing if one wished.

We should remember that at the moment nobody is making money out of satellite television but at least the private sector is offering a loss leader and is considering the future. However, the hands of the BBC are tied firmly behind its back in its efforts to get in on the same thing. The income offset at the end of the second year is estimated to be about £2 million, which will increase as developments are made. Satellite television can be on the air in six months and fully operational in one year.

I refer now to the BBC's overall position and to the arguments against it. The BBC is different, if not unique—I have used that word before—because it is not a commercial operation. It is a public corporation and must conduct itself according to its charter, which does not permit it to put up venture capital or to do anything that its competitors in this area—rightly—can do.

As hon. Members know, the BBC's external services are funded somewhat differently from the BBC overall. They are funded by Her Majesty's Government through the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. There is no way in which the BBC's external services can touch the licence fee. Therefore, by their creation and existence, they become dependent on the Government. They need Government consent even to borrow. I do not suggest that they should borrow money for what I see as a public service broadcasting operation in the interests of the country.

We are grateful to my hon. Friend for the level of BBC external funding and I am sure that he will tell us how generous the Government have been to the BBC's external services. We are all looking forward to hearing the facts and figures. The level of external funding for the BBC is about £114 million. The overall increases, about which my hon. Friend will tell us, have been extremely welcome and, as he knows, much is capital expenditure for the audibility programme. However, my recent experiences suggest that the BBC's external services could be a little more audible still. Many things are more audible than the BBC's external services as anybody knows who has struggled to receive them. Similarly, anybody who has visited Bush House knows that it is not a plush operation, and nobody pretends that it is.

I remind my hon. Friend of something that happened in, I believe, November 1983. The increases in expenditure have become broadly acceptable—there have been no rebellions in the Chamber in the shape of votes—but they were achieved after one of the biggest Conservative Back-Bench revolts on foreign affairs, when no fewer than 60 of my hon. Friends, including every officer of the Back-Bench Foreign and Commonwealth Committee, either abstained or voted against the Government. It was miraculous to see the effect that that had. I warn my hon. Friend that there could be similar goings-on unless, with his usual sensitive responsiveness, he urges the Foreign Secretary to take action on this matter, in conjunction with the Prime Minister.

As I have mentioned, the BBC is not a Government information service. Unlike USIA, and Voice of America, the BBC is vigorously independent; that is why it is trusted. The BBC represents the concept of public service broadcasting. We accept the BBC nationally. Although it has had its critics from time to time, the nation does accept that it embodies the concept of public service broadcasting. Thus, the fundamental argument is that it is utterly wrong to prevent the BBC from doing what it is best created, suited and fitted to do internationally on a public service basis, provided that one can sustain its qualifications—which, in my view, are easy to sustain. There is also the fact that it has an obvious role internationally.

I said that I would mention a few of the general policy arguments against the BBC. Her Majesty's Government must consider these as part of their policy considerations. This is a vital area for the future status and role of the United Kingdom and will approximate what radio has achieved with the switching on of short-wave sets and so on. It is the Government's duty to act in our best interests. We would all agree with that. We have a unique international asset in the BBC. Moreover, any course of governmental action other than to allow the BBC to go ahead with what it has been created to do would throw that considerable national asset away. With that background to the decision, I shall deal with one or two of the policy options and considerations.

One argument, particularly from those who do not like the BBC, is: "Leave it all to the private sector and free enterprise. We do not like the BBC, so stuff it and let ITN proceed." The name ITN would be a bit of a mystery in the middle of some desert, for all the distinguished luminaries who broadcast on it. While such a course may save taxpayers' money, it would throw away our best national asset and limit the United Kingdom in this important area to an ultimately commercial approach.

The second argument, which is often raised by independent television companies, is, "It is unfair to create subsidised competition for ITN and the private sector." It is fair to say that the whole existence of the BBC has been and is subsidised. It already competes with ITV and ITN here and all over the world, subsidised or unsubsidised. Surely the overriding argument must be for the maximum use of available credibility in the national interest.

The third argument is, "If there is Government money going, let's have a jolly good tender. Everyone can come galloping along and tender, including the BBC, and then doubtless we in the private sector can outbid it and will have all this lovely Government money which otherwise would go to the BBC." That is somewhat unnecessary, because ITN is already proceeding with its allies in this area and has money to lose from the private sector. We can all clap at that and wish it good luck. That argument also ignores the concept of public service broadcasting for those who most need the news. We have a clear duty in both their and our national interests to transmit news to those who cannot always pay for it.

Some people say, "Let's have a joint effort with ITN and the BBC." That is wholly impracticable. They already compete all over the world, ITN is already proceeding with this and there is the whole question of editorial control and advertising. Such a suggestion is not on; it is a general nightmare.

The final position at the end of the day is that we need a decision soon. We have the BBC and we must use it. This matter is crying out for action and Ministers are placed by us to deliver action. That is why many of my hon. Friends and many hon. Members feel so strongly about this. I do not suggest for a moment that the motives behind Government decisions are anything but altruistic, but if any dogma were to creep into this decision the country would not forgive the Government and many people, rightly, would take a dim view.

Fundamentally, we accept public service broadcasting nationally and it is utterly wrong to prevent it from performing its obvious international role. The BBC has no option but to come to the Government for assistance and it is doing so. It needs to get started in a vital industry of the future. It is about time the Minister recognised the qualifications and arguments and let the BBC get on with it.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): The evidence of the BBC external services to the fourth Foreign Affairs Select Committee on cultural diplomacy included a complaint that in the past the external services had been in receipt of nothing more than avuncular pats-on-the-shoulder commendation during debates in this House. Nobody who reads the speech just made by the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) can accuse him of that. I agree with much of what he said. He made a powerful case for the BBC fairly, properly, and in a forthright manner. He laid the question about the future of the BBC TV service fairly and squarely at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office door. I hope that the Minister will provide an answer.

Perhaps we are not addressing the question to the proper Minister, but I hope that we shall have an early decision from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. I suspect that, in his heart of hearts, the Minister is sympathetic to the BBC case and has the same hopes and aspirations as the hon. Member for Leominster and that the real sticking point will in reality arrive when the new Chief Secretary to the Treasury and other Treasury Ministers consider the financial implications of the proposal. I hope that will not be the case in this urgent, important decision. If the Treasury uses its usual cost-benefit analysis procedures, it will follow the wrong path in assessing what the external services of the BBC can provide in terms of satellite televised news systems and the work that it already does on radio.

With the forbearance of the House I shall rehearse the arguments for the existing radio external services. I would hate to think that in these times of financial constraints —and I do not deny that they are real—the money that is required for the televised news service should be supplied at the expense of any existing radio programmes produced by the BBC external services. There is an argument for further development of the radio system already provided by the external services and the valuable monitoring services at Caversham and elsewhere.

There may well be 730 million television sets in the world, but there are 1,600 million transistor radio sets and we must not ignore that audience. The needs of the radio service are as urgent as ever, and there is plenty of potential for developing the technical services. I am worried that large parts of the eastern USSR, Latin America and North America still find it difficult to hear the existing radio services broadcast by the BBC. To increase the audibility of such broadcasts will cost money, but it would be money well spent if it was decided to devote resources in that direction.

The number of hours that are broadcast by radio through the external services has decreased since the second world war from 850 to 732 hours per week and the number of countries to which we broadcast has decreased from 45 to 37. Since the war there has been a decrease both in the number of hours of broadcasting each week and in the languages covered. I regret that. The most recent cut, in 1981-82, which reduced the number of languages from 40 to 37, was regrettable and bad in terms of cost effectiveness as it saved only about £1·5 million.

There is a genuine case to be made for starting up a language service to Korea and for extending the Pashto and Tamil services, the Arabic service in north Africa and the Spanish service in Latin America. A real argument can be made on any kind of objective analysis for extending the present external services. Also, there is a real need to extend our present radio and TV communications to Third-world countries in the southern hemisphere.

The Minister will be aware that I have a particular interest in overseas development. Three billion of the world's population of 5 billion live in Third-world countries. By and large they are poor, a high proportion of them are young people, and most of them believe that they are exploited by the north. That amounts to a potentially explosive situation over the middle to longer term whether regarding international trade, the development of the world economy or in any other area of international relations. The World Service as presently constituted must be extended. We all have stories of the influence of the radio service. The World Service has a proven record, and the hon. Member for Leominster articulated that record eloquently and properly. He described the generous ways in which the BBC considers problems faced by Third-world countries. The news and information services in many of those countries are severely hobbled in many ways by their Governments or by technical constraints.

I know that the Minister is familiar with the arguments about UNESCO, as one of his first duties was to try to sort out the problems. I understand that there are real problems, but I do not share the Government's views about UNESCO. However, the UNESCO ideas about the new world information order were a symptom of the fact that there is real and rooted prejudice in some of our sister western countries' broadcasting services which are monopolising the airwaves in the Third world. That is not generally a criticism made of the BBC external services which have a reputation for independence and a programming policy that is substantially and positively development oriented.

We must not ignore the work carried out by the external radio services in the Pacific basin, India, Brazil, or any of the other vastly important areas. I am wholeheartedly in favour of the arguments deployed by the hon. Member for Leominister, but I do not want that argument to proceed or that service to develop at the expense of the continuing development of the radio services provided by the BBC's external services.

I want now to consider the television proposal. I fully support the argument that has been deployed, but I do not want to reiterate what has been said. I believe that the proposal is no new development, although in technical terms the hardware and transmitters that will be necessary are new. I consider the argument more in terms of simply maintaining the BBC's position in international broadcasting. There is a great deal of expansion taking place in many different areas within transnational television and satellite broadcasting, as the hon. Member for Leominister has said. If the BBC does not enter and become fully involved in that area or make the most of the unique BBC qualities and experience it possesses, it will be substantially left behind. That would be deeply regrettable.

Rather than considering the television proposal as breaking new ground or as a new revolutionary proposal, I believe that the least the Government can do is to enable the BBC to continue to add its own to this new field and to thrive and prosper. We would expect the USA and USSR to devote resources to broadcasting. However, we must consider the resources that Japan, Germany and other competitors are spending in this area of broadcasting. The public service ethic which the BBC would bring to producing an international televised news service is of fundamental importance. Every day that the decision to proceed is delayed is lost time and that time will be difficult to recover.

[Mr. Archy Kirkwood]

I am obliged to say that, having studied the background, the Government give me the impression that they do not appreciate fully the value of the asset available to them in the BBC's external services. If they did, I do not believe that they would hesitate further, but would forthwith approve the scheme for the new BBC external services satellite television. At the estimated cost, in my opinion it is cheap at the price.

7.55 pm

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): One of the paradoxes of Parliament is that we spend so long debating trivia and so little time debating essentials. Tonight we are discussing the projection of our country throughout the world over the next 20 or 50 years. If we begin to consider all that can flow from that, we can sense how vital the issue is.

Lord Carrington, when he was Foreign Secretary, said:

"Let me begin on a note upon which there will be no disagreement in any quarter of the House: that is, the support and admiration of all of us—and of course I include Her Majesty's Government — for the work of the External Services of the BBC. There is nobody who does not recognise the excellence of what they do. Certainly so far as I am concerned, I believe them to be an important arm of Government foreign policy. Indeed, I think we have got to look at the whole of our defence and foreign policy as one, and external broadcasting has a most important part to play in the influence that Britain can exert throughout the world" —[Official Report, House of Lords, 30 July 1981; Vol. 423, c. 811.]

As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, I believe that the attitude of Government in recent years towards the BBC external services has been amateurish and appalling. Governments have been like the small boy who is used to going to a filling station and getting a free watch. When he is handed a valuable heirloom, he just does not appreciate the difference. If hon. Members think that that is a bit strong, we must remember what Lord Carrington said on television when he left the Government in 1983:

"When I was Foreign Secretary, I was told I had to save money on the overseas service of the BBC. I think that was really totally counter-productive and the money saved was trivial compared to the amount of damage done. I think the time has now come, really, when the Treasury and the Government ought to look at cutting out a function in Government rather than cheese-paring on the things that are essential and have to be done."

It is my case, and it was the case of my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris), that the television services must be provided in the interests not simply of the best external broadcasting system in the world, but of our country.

Why is the BBC so good? It is so good partly because throughout the world vast numbers of people speak English, and perhaps even more want to speak English. Secondly, at the time of the second world war, the BBC established a superiority for telling the truth that it carries with it today. That is the difference. Our competitors in eastern Europe and the United States and Canada lack that essential history. That is why, although their broadcasting services are listened to, they are not considered to be in the same category as the BBC's external services.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): Integrity.

Mr. Townsend: As my hon. Friend says, it has integrity. That is the key.

I had the privilege last Thursday of watching the ITN service go out from Wells street. That was a superb and very professional half hour and it does the company great credit. I do not believe for a moment that there is no role for the BBC external services as well as ITN.

We are like visitors to a new continent. We see a vast hinterland, the mountains, the rivers and the forests. We are just starting on a vast adventure. Who would like to forecast in 10 years' time, let alone in 100 years' time, the future of world television broadcasting? It would be a crying shame if the BBC, with all its expertise and use of languages, were not leading the way.

I end with another quotation, this time from, of all people, Colonel Gaddafi. He said:

"All the Arab radios rave from dawn till noon but nobody listens to them because everyone switches on London."

I want them not only to switch on London and listen, but to switch on London and look.

8 pm

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): I congratulate you, Madam Deputy Speaker — I think that is the correct term——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Just call me Madam.

Mr. Buchan: I was trying to avoid that.

I came into the Chamber by accident. One of the problems of this House is that things can go on in the Chamber and we who are working diligently elsewhere hardly know that it is happening. I missed the announcement of this opening debate, but I have come here to congratulate the hon. Member for Leominister (Mr. Temple-Morris) on raising it.

It is an important matter, not least because it occurs at a time when much of the future of broadcasting in general — quite apart from the external services aspect — has been brought into question by the Peacock report, the Green Paper on radio and things that, regrettably, are being said by the Government. That puts into jeopardy much of the best kind of broadcasting that the hon. Member for Leominster described. I am delighted that at least Conservative Back Benchers still use the phrase "public service broadcasting". On that there will be no dispute between us, at any rate in relation to external services.

That is my first reason for supporting the hon. Gentleman. Given the rush to follow the misguided view of the Peacock report, it would be criminal to strip away any other areas of broadcasting that should be undertaken by public service broadcasting, should be undertaken only by such broadcasting and would be best undertaken only by such broadcasting.

Secondly, we are now entering a phase in which diplomacy is not merely of the old-fashioned kind. Among other things, it now consists of trying to have an understanding of our own country best known abroad. However, along with cuts in broadcasting there have been cuts in relation to the British Council. We have never understood the importance of the British Council or the fact that it matters that Ian McKellan and others perform "Coriolanus" on the steps of Acropolis in Athens. That sometimes means more than the diplomacy that is carried out formally.

I question the quotations from Lord Carrington to which the hon. Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) referred. As I see it, the function of the external services is not necessarily to project the views of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. It is to do what the BBC has been famous for doing for the past 50 years: to give a reasonably objective – it cannot be any more than that because none of us is totally objective – picture of world events emanating from London.

I remember the horror that occurred two years ago when the Government intervened in the "Real Lives" programme. There was interference by the Government to prevent a programme from being shown. That had a shattering effect in various parts of the world, which had accepted the freedom and independence of the BBC. It was because of that recognition of its freedom and independence that, paradoxically, most of its valuable work was done for Britain. Therefore, I do not accept the argument that it is a projection of the diplomacy of foreign affairs.

The "Real Lives" incident had that serious effect and some of us have had to fight back to restore the position, which was not helped by the Government's intervention over Zircon. Nevertheless, for the past 50 years, of all world broadcasting organisations the BBC has been the most acceptable and recognised throughout the world. It has done a major job on behalf of this country precisely because of its relative objectivity.

My third reason for supporting the BBC is that it is proper that it should have the imprimatur of public service broadcasting, because if anything is in doubt it is the question of over-commercialised, so-called independent, satellite broadcasting. I have seen some of it emanating from America. If one goes to any of the poorer West Indian islands and sees what comes from the American independent broadcasters in the form of news—I think particularly of the all-day news stations—one will get an idea of the cultural shock that it is to those poorer West Indian islands, because it is seen as the normal interpretation of world events as observed through American eyes.

The Government will have to be persuaded. They do not like public service. They think that public expenditure is a bad thing, unless it is for frigates and so on. But in relation to other things, we must deal with a deep, ideological malaise on the Government Front Bench.

I have no doubt that we shall get good words from the Minister. He can do little else but give what I call a "lying in state ceremonial" type of speech and tell us how excellent our external services have been. However, we might not get the final commitment. Normal lying in state ceremonial ends with a commitment when the poor guy goes into a hole, but rarely do we get any commitment or action in respect of public expenditure from the Government Front Bench.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): I assure the hon. Gentleman that it is no part of my job tonight to bury the external services.

Mr. Buchan: I was making a complicated metaphor in relation to any commitment that might be made. Perhaps it was too subtle for the Government Front Bench. At any rate, we would welcome that commitment. I think that my own Front Bench will oppose the report. It had better. We wish the hon. Member for Leominster well and hope that this is the beginning of a successful campaign to have this brought about.

8.6 pm

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): I wish to add a few quick words in support of my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris). One point that he did not make was that he has had many years of experience in the Inter-Parliamentary Union. He knows the effect of British broadcasting overseas, and he speaks with that sort of knowledge when supporting the spread of the BBC's established performance in radio broadcasting to satellite broadcasting.

My hon. Friend said that the BBC had experience in broadcasting. That statement of fact is unarguable. But equally important is the fact that the BBC has built up a constituency of overseas listeners who are waiting to become BBC overseas viewers. If we do not grab that opportunity, we shall be missing an opportunity for the BBC.

As for budgets, in spite of the increases to which my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster drew attention, and which I am sure the Under-Secretary will cite, the BBC overseas service has been badly done by in recent years, and it is just as well that that point is made. The small increase in budget for the added influence that we could have had in terms of listenership, audibility and reach throughout the world would have been as nothing compared with, for example, the cost of running embassies in some parts of the world where the presence of the BBC is even more important.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Or buying a tank.

Mr. Rathbone: Or buying a tank, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) says.

The BBC makes a marvellous contribution to the world in terms of information which is unbiased and trustworthy, and in terms of entertainment which spreads British culture throughout the world. It also does so in terms of learning, not only direct learning – I hope that there will be room for that in a televised BBC overseas service – but indirect learning. I hope that we shall hear the most positive speech that the Under-Secretary has ever given, or is ever likely to give, in support of my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster.

8.10 pm

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I am glad to have a brief opportunity of joining the debate in order to congratulate the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris), who raised the subject, and also to say again something that I have been saying for a number of years. I think that it deserves to be considered in the context of the proposal to put the BBC overseas services, or at any rate the news services, on to television.

I do not think it would be sufficient for the BBC simply to put out a daily news programme. The news should be seen in the broader context of regular, informed television programmes on the historical, political, commercial and cultural trends that explain the significance of the news. The BBC has already firmly established that practice on the sound wavelengths, and the move to television would be a natural extension of all the excellent work that has been done over many years.

If the facility to provide news programmes were expanded so that there was a full daily service of supporting programmes, the cost could be considered as being spread over 24 hours. We could include other matter that would also attract the very willing support of the taxpayer. We ought to make a full programme that builds on what we already have, and what the country already does extremely well. The BBC already provides a world language tuition service, which I believe is followed extensively in the far east, Latin America and elsewhere. The BBC is expert in providing that service, which is a well understood and accepted part of what the BBC does. At the same time, in this country we have established the technique of a broadcast university through the Open University. That is a most important extension of the use of television into the educational and higher educational spheres.

What a very good thing it would be if the BBC now proceeded to establish a world university of the air as part of Britain's service to the world. That would only be building on what we are already doing. The cost would be small, but the influence could be of tremendous benefit to mankind. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will consider the idea seriously at last: I have been recommending it for many years. In the meantime, other countries have been getting the idea and catching up with the BBC. Possibly they will pass it before long in providing that type of service and Britain will once again be left behind.

We owe it to the Third world to carry on the colonial tradition of helping people to understand our civilisation in Britain by giving regular historical, technological, constitutional and other programmes to supplement the sometimes very meagre resources in Third world countries for higher education. Many of our ex-colonial territories, for instance, have educational establishments which we may have founded in the past, or which other colonial countries may have founded in their colonial territories but which are not able to provide a sufficient stimulus in those countries now because they have not the teachers or the facilities to keep up to date with the subjects that they are trying to impart. What a bonus it would provide if the BBC were able to supplement the local facilities by means of a regular, established television service to bring all those subjects up to date.

The proposal would, if implemented, be supported by British publishers, who already have a worldwide market for technical books which are widely used in education and are influential in producing engineers, doctors, chemists and others who look to Britain for the ideas that they have already begun to absorb in the course of their education. That is a lifelong influence, which we should not throw away. British publishers of technical books would welcome the opportunity to follow up television courses, regularly given free to humanity, with printed supporting tuition, which would be an extension of the educational service that they are already seeking to provide.

We should not make this service merely an English language service. It should be a European Community project. Films of an educational character, once made, could easily be dubbed into French and Spanish. That would enormously extend the range and utility of the satellites which would continuously transmit news programmes all over the world. How easy it should be, surely, for us to collaborate with other European Community countries and make the concept part of our contribution to the Lome convention. I have often thought that we should be prouder than we are of the Lome convention, which is one of the most substantial contributions that the European Community has made to the external world since the Treaty of Rome.

Our own former colonial dependencies and associated territories are not the only ones that we have to consider. As members of the European Community, we should consider our responsibilites to the French, the Spanish and the Portuguese speaking territories, who have looked to Europe for education and inspiration in the past. We should be willing to give them 20th and 21st century technical assistance by the modern method of regular television broadcasting.

I was encouraged by the written answer to a question that I tabled recently. On 29 June my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs said:

"We are aware of the potential opportunities offered by satellite broadcasting. We are considering these carefully. There is currently no provision in the grants in aid of the BBC external services for a world university of the air project. We shall consider whether this could be pursued under EC sponsorship."—[Official Report, 29 June 1987; Vol. 118, c. 238.]

I was encouraged by that reply. Although I should like to think that money was beginning to flow in this direction, at least in an exploratory way, it seems to me that the idea has planted itself in the Foreign Office, and I hope that it will grow into something of great importance.

As a Member of the European Parliament for many years, I have discussed this idea with parliamentary colleagues in Strasbourg. I believe that it would be enthusiastically supported by other EEC countries and that that support would assist the BBC to reach the widest possible audience. I am glad that the Foreign Office is already aware of the matter, but I hope that this debate will stimulate a surge of activity, and will also enable my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to get money from the Treasury to follow this important initiative. I should like it to be carried forward, not just for the sake of Britain's honour, but in the national interest. As a great exporting power, we cannot simply sink out of sight and let the Japanese, the Americans or any others take our place.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Leominister (Mr. Temple-Morris) for initiating this debate. Until a few weeks ago, I worked for BBC television news. During my time there, I worked on one of the pilot programmes for the television news project, which hon. Members may have seen. Although I worked for the BBC, that does not necessarily mean that I always agree with what it is seeking to push, as the BBC will discover in the future. On this occasion, however, I do agree.

In the brief time available, I want to try to answer a couple of questions. First, do we need a world television news service? I believe that we do. Television will supplant radio more and more throughout the world, largely because of fast-moving technology that will bring satellite television to homes not only in the West, but in the East and the Third world, because of the cost savings brought to national television systems. It will be easier for people to receive television programmes in their homes, beamed from anywhere else in the world.

The reputation of the BBC is paramount throughout the world. In many countries to which I have travelled on behalf of the BBC it is trusted as an organisation that tells the truth. The BBC is relied on by all other journalists. They listen to the BBC World Service on their short wave radios. Its name is already established. We need to use that name to put forward our views throughout the world.

The name "ITN" can be a bit of a mystery. It is no criticism of ITN to say that occasionally it hijacks the name "BBC" to gain entry to other parts of the world by mumbling, "We're from British television." When the BBC then goes along it is told, "You're already here." I am not surprised that ITN tries that trick. Whatever people may choose to believe, only the BBC could provide a television equivalent to the World Service.

If we were discussing only a new service on television, I should not say that the BBC ought to run it, but running a world service is different. A world service implies reputation. It involves the use of the BBC's resources throughout the world — its correspondents and its contacts with other television broadcasting organisations. That service could be run most cost effectively by the BBC. It has the capacity, and already it has most of the capital equipment. National television stations in other parts of the world will buy BBC products, but they will not buy the products of other organisations.

If the BBC were given the small amount of money that is needed to start up the service, it would be prepared to beam its services to those parts of the world where a profit could not be guaranteed. We need a useful world service. That is why I distinguish it from an ordinary news service. In the foreseeable future, usefulness will be in inverse proportion to the profitability that is likely to be achieved. Usefulness will not be achieved by Superchannel, WTN, CNN, Worldnet or any of the other organisations.

Technically, it is easier to receive pictures in this country from eastern Europe, because of the method of broadcasting and the use of satellites. Were it to be beamed to them by satellite, it would be easier for people in parts of eastern Europe to receive the World Service. That idea could be pursued with profit by the BBC technical experts. The other organisations in this market will never provide a world service that gives the British view, and that advances, through the strength of their advocacy not through what they say, British interests. A very small amount of money, compared with the amount that is already provided for the World Service, would enable the Government and the country to ensure that the money is well spent. If no money is provided, we shall never know whether we made the wrong decision. If we make the wrong decision, we shall pay for it in later years when radio becomes obsolescent or even obsolete.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): It is a pleasure, Madam Deputy Speaker, to see you in the Chair.

I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) on raising this issue on the Consolidated Fund Bill and on having come first in the ballot. Usually I have to get up in the early hours of the morning to reply to Consolidated Fund debates. I congratulate him also on his continuing campaign and his persistence on this issue. It has been noticed and commended by many Opposition Members as well as by Conservative Members.

The hon. Gentleman did not know whether he should declare an interest. Nor do I know whether I should do so. As a spokesman on foreign affairs, I have broadcast from time to time on the World Service and I hope to do so again, particularly if there are pictures.

I have just returned from Washington where I observed and tried to influence a little the Iran-Contra hearings. If any proof were needed of the power of television, the way in which Colonel Oliver North, by his acting ability, coupled with his being somewhat elastic with the truth, has manipulated a relatively pliant and uncritical media shows once again how powerful that media is. It is astonishing that a self-confessed liar, who admits to law breaking, who shares the responsibility for the deaths of hundreds and the misery of thousands in central America, can manipulate the media in America in such a way as to make him into a hero. It was sad and worrying to witness that. It says a good deal about the lack of critical coverage and analysis by the media in the United States. Mr. Rupert Murdoch also understands the power of the visual media. He is now avidly buying up local stations in the United States so as to ensure that a fourth United States network comes under his control.

The kind of service that we are debating is already operating in America. With pictures, Voice of America is powerful. However, it is organised on the basis of cultural imperialism rather than cultural diplomacy. France and other Governments are considering such a service. Hon. Members have already referred to the fact that Britain is being left behind. ITN is already said to be providing such a service on behalf of Britain, through Superchannel news. I am not against that—quite the reverse. I welcome it. A plurality of British output is surely good. However, without being unduly critical of the ITN coverage, it is not tailor made. Its distribution around the world is limited. It does not provide special material and there is only one contact outside Europe, which I understand is Japan.

The BBC service is vital for a number of reasons. I shall refer to three of them. First, I refer to its experience with the World Service. It has experience of 55 years of sound broadcasting; it has 120 million listeners around the world; it still has a worldwide reputation for accuracy and impartiality, despite the efforts of the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit).

Secondly, I refer to the wide coverage of BBC news. Ten networks around the world have already agreed to take BBC programmes, and 20 more will possibly do so. BBC will have a much wider distribution than ITN.

Thirdly, I refer to the BBC's unrivalled foreign news-gathering service. It has 26 full-time correspondents around the world and 100 overseas stringers. Furthermore, the Foreign Office makes great use of the BBC's well respected monitoring service. The BBC will provide special programmes. It will not just recycle existing material.

Those are three strong reasons — but there are many others — why the Opposition believe that the go-ahead should be given as quickly as possible. The BBC has conducted market research and has established that there is a demand. That demand should be satisfied.

Unlike commercial television, the BBC is unable to put up the risk capital. Therefore, it has asked the Foreign Office for the money that is needed to set up this service. It requires £1·4 million of capital, and the running cost will be £7 million or £8 million. That is not a lot, as Conservative Members have said. I am sure that the hon. Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) will know only too well that that figure is equivalent to the cost of two or three days of fortress Falklands. The Foreign Office is dragging its feet while our competitors are marching on. Will the Minister tell us what is delaying his decision? On 15 January 1987 in an article in The Times the political reporter said:

"The Foreign Office . . .is considering"

these proposals,

"but has said that there will be no rapid answer."

We are used to that sort of reply from the Foreign Office. However, that was January and it is now July. Time is marching on and we are losing out further. Conservative Members have asked whether it is dogma that is holding this matter up or whether the Government have an aversion towards public service broadcasting. Is it cost-cutting or vindictiveness against the BBC? I hope that those are not the case.

The excellent report of the Select Committee points out how little as a country we spend on cultural diplomacy. That does not merely relate to the BBC, but to the British Council, which is doing an excellent job and which has had its budget cut by 21 per cent. in real terms. Germany spends twice as much as us on cultural diplomacy and France spends three times as much.

The paradox, dilemma and peculiarity of the comparison was pointed out well in an editorial on Friday by Martin Jackson, in "Broadcast". He said:

"Curious isn't it, that a Prime Minister so wedded to the trappings of national virility—both in her Common Market and defence policies"—

I shall not comment on either of those policies—

"should acquiesce in muting Britain's influence in the world."

That is curious because this is the sort of positive influence that we should be encouraging. Britain's values, which are shared by all hon. Members, of freedom and democracy should be encouraged and spread around the world. We should allow the BBC, with its high reputation, to continue its tradition of independent broadcasting into television. Television news from the BBC that is relayed around the world will be a vital and important part of our cultural diplomacy.

The Opposition wholeheartedly and enthusiastically support the hon. Member for Leominster and every hon. Member who has spoken in this debate. We hope that the Government will agree to give the BBC the necessary funding and we hope that they will do so sooner rather than later.

8.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): It is a great pleasure, Madam Deputy Speaker, to be speaking in front of you. I hope that I shall not be misunderstood if I say that we will be meeting later during the night, because I have some six debates to answer during the next few hours.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) for raising this important topic. I was aware, before I came to the debate, of the high regard that the House has for the BBC external services, and if I did not know I can be under no illusion now. It is right that the future development of such a valuable national asset should be a matter of national interest and national debate.

I listened extremely carefully to the detailed points that have been made by hon. Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) made his latest salvo in what has been a long, hard-fought campaign by him in his true tradition. I am delighted that he found my answer to his question encouraging.

We currently face some important challenges and decisions with regard to external broadcasting. Most of the debate has concentrated on the proposal for a world television service, but that is one of a number of new avenues that have been opened by the rapid advance of broadcasting technology. We have already invested heavily in modern technology to improve the audibility of the BBC's external radio services. All the evidence that we have—this is an important point—suggests that short wave radio will continue for the foreseeable future to be the major international broadcasting medium, which is a point that was made by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood). Currently there are some 1,600 million receivers worldwide, and that number is likely to continue to grow.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Eggar: I shall not give way, because I have a lot to get through.

It is not only the technology that changes, because the needs of the BBC's international audience develop in tune with sociological and political changes in the countries in which the people live and to which the programmes are broadcast. A particular case in point is our broadcasts to the Soviet Union. We welcome the decision to cease jamming the BBC's broadcasts, and we hope and expect that this decision will be implemented consistently, although it is a pity that it has not been extended to the BBC's Polish service. Unhindered access to a large Soviet audience is a new and qualitatively different challenge for the external services, with far-reaching implications for the kind of programmes and the hours and times at which they are broadcast. It is true that in the developing world audiences' needs change rapidly as education and development progresses. The activities of other broadcasters must be taken into account. I am thinking, for example, of the massive increase in commercial broadcasting in some parts of the world.

The Government are in no doubt that the BBC external services are a precious resource that brings great benefits to Britain. They enjoy a high international reputation for the quality, accuracy and impartiality of their broadcasting. That can only enhance Britain's image. In their news coverage it is the task of the external services to broadcast a balanced British view of national and international developments, including an accurate and effective representation of British life. In that they enjoy editorial independence.

It is the Government's task, in close co-operation with the BBC, to ensure that the funds that we invest in external broadcasting are used to maximum effect. We must ensure value for money in the technology that we employ. We must discuss how to respond with the necessary flexibility to the challenges of a rapidly changing world. We therefore maintain a close and continuing dialogue with the BBC external services to set the geographical priorities for broadcasting and the hours broadcast in each language. In doing this we must consider the requirements of the BBC external services within the framework of the total Foreign and Commonwealth Office budget and to assess them against overall foreign policy priorities. We bear the responsibility for ensuring that the taxpayer's money is spent economically, efficiently and effectively. That is why we believe that it is right for the National Audit Office to have access to the external services to carry out its examinations. Following the Perry report, we attach considerable importance to securing agreement on the revised financial memorandum, which had been proposed by that report.

A glance at the figures for the funding of the BBC external services shows why we take this responsibility so seriously. The BBC's present broadcasting output stands at over 732 hours per week, which is the highest level since the 1950s. To achieve this level we have increased grants-in-aid in real terms by over 50 per cent. in the past eight years. About half of this has gone to support increases in running costs. The remainder has funded a programme of capital expenditure, which was begun in 1981, to improve audibility. In 1979-80 the BBC external services accounted for 12 per cent. of the total Foreign and Commonwealth Office diplomatic wing expenditure. The figure is now 17 per cent.

I hope that that figure, when put in context, gives an answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) who cast aspersions on the way in which the Foreign and Commonwealth Office spends money on the BBC in contra-distinction to our true diplomatic effort and our embassies. We must take an overall view, and it is fair to say that the BBC external services have done well over the past five years, in what has been a time of constrained spending.

Mr. Buchan: Why was that policy necessary?

Mr. Eggar: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, but I am trying to discuss world television news. We are studying the whole matter of Government involvement. It is a deceptively simply proposition which raises a number of extremely difficult issues. Broadcasting by satellite is neither simple nor inexpensive. It is estimated to be 10 times as expensive as broadcasting by traditional means.

The broadcasting of television programmes is not merely a logical extension of radio broadcasting. We need, for instance, in the context of television broadcasting, to examine again the audiences whom we are trying to reach and how we shall reach them. In many areas of the developing world radio is likely to remain the sole means of communication for the foreseeable future. I need hardly say, in addition, that in closed societies, especially in the Eastern bloc, which are a priority for external broadcasting, it is no simple matter for them to acquire, erect and use a satellite television receiving dish. It is, of course, far easier for authorities to spot a dish than to spot a short-wave radio receiver.

Furthermore, the technology is changing almost from day to day. We must be sure that any investment will be a sound use of taxpayers' money. That is why we are conducting a thorough analysis of all the issues raised by satellite broadcasting. We hope to consider the whole proposal and the Government's role in it from production of a programme to delivery to the potential audience.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): When will we know?

Mr. Eggar: We are already engaged in exploratory discussions with the BBC and others interested in this idea. Partly as a result of those discussions the BBC is, I understand, renewing and changing its original proposals. I hope to be able to study its revised plan shortly. I have a feeling, from listening to my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster, that he may know rather more about the proposal that will soon land on my desk than I do.

We should not, of course, ignore the fact that British broadcasters are already present on the international scene. Many hon. Members have referred to the ITN's World News, which is transmitted by Superchannel and is available to a potential audience of more than 8 million homes in 15 European countries. It is available also in hotels and by individual satellite receiving dishes in a number of other countries. Furthermore, I understand that, since the beginning of this month, it is available in Japan. I am told that there are other possible opportunities.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the Minister answer one question? He said in a fairly waffly comment that the plan would be considered "shortly" — that famous ministerial word. Both sides of the House are anxious to know when he expects to announce a decision about the request, whether it is revised or not, by the BBC for financial assistance. When does the hon. Gentleman expect that announcement to be made?

Mr. Eggar: Discussions have been continuing since we received the first BBC proposal in November 1986. I understand that the BBC is shortly to send me a further revised proposal. I do not know when it will arrive. I assure hon. Members that as soon as it arrives we will be able to continue our evaluation of the various options open. I am not in a position to give a definite time for announcing a decision, because I am not even aware of the precise proposal that the BBC, and other interested bodies —that is an important addition—will put forward.

The Government are faced with an important and extremely complex decision. It involves a number of separate issues, especially the need to identify audiences and to ensure that any product that is in any way assisted by public money can reach the appropriate audience, otherwise it simply is not justifiable to put in public money at the first stage. For instance, we must consider how people can receive a product which is in any way financed by British taxpayers' money if they do not have access to a satellite dish. We must know exactly what the markets are and decide whether we can justify any kind of public subsidy to transmit that product into the homes in those areas. I am unwilling to be pinned down to a time, but I assure hon. Members that this issue is receiving considerable attention and priority. It will continue to do so. I look forward to receiving the BBC's further proposals.

Local Government Finance

8.45 pm

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): It is nice to see you in the Chair, Madam Deputy Speaker. I hope that you will continue to show the fairness that we saw when you were a Committee Chairman, that you will allow Back Benchers to intervene from time to time and that you will control Front Benchers. I thank you also for allowing a three-hour debate on the important subject of local government finance. The number of applications for this debate clearly shows the interest and concern of many hon. Members.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Where are they?

Mr. Caborn: I have no doubt that they will come in from the Tea Room and other places in the Palace in the not-too-distant future.

The concern about this subject can be broken down into three main aspects. The first is the difficulty faced by many local authorities in meeting their daily commitments on behalf of the communities they represent, especially in the main conurbations where many of the problems of housing, social services, education and deprivation are evident and, some would say, reaching crisis proportions. Local government and public representatives have to meet and cope with those problems in difficult financial circumstances.

The second matter concerns the introduction of the new community charge, which was clearly outlined in the Gracious Speech only a few days ago. No doubt many hon. Members will try to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, to speak in more detail on that than I have time to do.

The third aspect is the way in which, over the past eight years, the Government have manipulated the financial arrangements, along with other local government legislation, in a manner which is best described in the words of the Financial Times:

"the Government have no coherent strategy or philosophy for the future of Local Government in Britain."

At worst, it can be called deliberate financial strangulation and drip-feeding of poison into local government, led by the Government Front Bench, aided and abetted by the gutter press, especially the tabloids. They have attacked local government with unfounded allegations, although facts never stood in the way of a good story in the tabloids. Unfortunately, the worst venom has been reserved for our local authorities. The present financial constraints do not even allow many local authorities to carry out their minimum obligations. About 42 Bills passed in the last few Sessions tried to strangle local authorities.

That attitude forced even the Audit Commission to conclude

"the position of Local Government in many of the areas has become impossible."

Many people inside and outside the House are asking: is the problem just hatred of local government, as fostered by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for the Environment, or is it that the impossibility to which the Audit Commission referred is deliberately designed to limit the role of local government and place that limited role to the Government's advantage or to create the conditions for local government's abolition?

Tragically, over the past eight years, democratic trade union rights have been removed and a tier of local government abolished. We must question the conditions imposed by the Government, particularly on local authority finance. Are the Government trying eventually to abolish or greatly curtail local authority control? Are they trying to build the centralised administration that many of us fear? The Gracious Speech implied that education could become far more centralised. I suggest that the Government are taking us towards that type of administration. That was underlined clearly in an article in the Sunday Telegraph on 5 July:

"Meanwhile, Mrs. Thatcher has ordered ministers to take the offensive over the controversial community charge and over the inner city programme. The aim will be to lay the blame for squalid housing and urban deprivation at the door of the Left-wing councils which, ministers say, care more about extremist politics than people."

That is not the idea that is even now emanating from the Palace. The Palace is trying to bring communities together. However, it is clear that, to the Prime Minister, confrontation with local government is the order of the day. During the election campaign, the Prime Minister declared that she intended her third term to see the removal of Socialism from the face of the United Kingdom. Her vindictive approach to local government could be seen in that context. She wants to limit the role of local authorities because she knows of the strong role that Socialism maintains in our major inner-city areas in the north. She sees local authorities as a legitimate target.

It is true that the Government are now putting forward proposals to assist the inner-city areas. If they are not trying completely to resurrect the industrial base, at least the Government are attempting to rebuild the inner cities and provide safety valves to alleviate what could be a major problem in the future. However, all the proposals are bypassing democratically elected local councils and disregarding the views of people who have spent years in the localities, who have been put where they are by the ballot box and who know the feelings of the people they represent. Unfortunately, the Government want to try to bypass the democratic process.

The Government's cynical approach to local government has not gone down particularly well with Conservative Back Benchers. That was highlighted by the statement of the previous Leader of the House, who was quoted in an exclusive interview in the Sunday Telegraph on 5 July as saying that the Prime Minister now acted more like Stalin. I think she could probably teach the Soviet Union a lot about centralism.

Last Friday, the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) said, in reply to the remarks of one of his hon. Friends who was rather enthusiastic about the removal of Socialism from the face of the United Kingdom:

"We cannot say that our mission in history is to eliminate Socialism; that is a function of the will of the people."

He said that people would only reach the same conclusion as the Conservative party if

"we produce attractive policies that appeal to the whole electorate. Our national share of the vote did not increase last time; it fell slightly. The workings of the electoral system gave us another big majority in the House, but we know that people do not agree with our policies. We must persuade them. We cannot simply bash them on the head and insist that they accept our policies." [Official Report, 10 July 1987, Vol. 119, c. 654.]

Unfortunately, we are getting used to the style of government that bashes people on the head. However, many Conservative Back Benchers are even now challenging that type of Government, and the dogma of the Government Front Bench, particularly towards local government, is becoming unacceptable to them.

What is the case against the Government's financial manipulation during the past eight years? We have a whole new jargon written into local government vocabulary, which includes financial targets, rate capping, precepts and the rest. Ironically, the constraints implicit in that vocabulary have not applied to central Government. Between 1980-1981 and 1985-1986, central Government expenditure increased by 51 per cent., while local authority spend over the same period increased by 32 per cent. That clearly shows that the criteria apply to local government but not to central Government.

Since the Government took power in 1979, we have seen two major developments in local government finance. As I said, there has been an increase of some 32 per cent. overall since 1980-81, but capital expenditure has gone down by a staggering 44 per cent. in real terms. Current expenditure is expected to remain virtually static in real terms over the rest of the planned period to the 1990s, but capital expenditure is expected to continue to fall over the same period. Current expenditure is rising by an average of 2 per cent. to 3 per cent. per annum in real terms and net capital spending is falling by 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. per year in real terms.

A closer look at the details of local authority current expenditure in England shows that the Government have succeeded in changing the distribution of that spend. Spending on social security, housing benefits and law and order are now taking a significantly larger share of spending than in 1979-80. Education, the local environment, transport and housing consume a much smaller proportion of the total than in 1979-80.

The cut in capital expenditure goes to the heart of the problems of our inner cities. If it is not defused, the time bomb planted in our inner cities over the past eight years could reverberate well beyond those areas. It is rather ironic that, while we have been called upon to improve our infrastructure — in transport, energy and education — central Government have been cutting the very means that would make it possible.

I shall take Sheffield as an example to illustrate what I have said. In 1981-82 the housing capital account had an allocation of £19·2 million; in 1987-88 the allocation is £17·3 million—a reduction of over 10 per cent. That is before allowances have been made for inflation. The increase in the retail price index over that period was 36·6 per cent. For education, capital expenditure was £3·2 million in 1981-82, which has now been reduced to £2·6 million. That comes after a report at the end of a two-year study conducted by Her Majesty's inspectors, which came out in favour of Sheffield education authority's services, expenditure and curriculum, and gave a glowing report. We had favourable press releases and comment even from the Department of Education and Science. But although the report said that we managed our financial affairs to the benefit of the pupils and the service in general, there has been a 20 per cent. cut during that period—again before allowing for inflation.

Community services have also borne the brunt of the cuts, especially in the inner cities. There is an average of 30 per cent. unemployment in Sheffield, Central and of about 50 per cent. in the inner city. But our community services budget has been cut by about 40 per cent., again before taking inflation into consideration. Some may argue that revenue expenditure has increased. In 1981-82, 51 per cent. of Sheffield city council's expenditure was financed through central Government grants — specific or supplementary grants and the block grant. For 1987-88, the proportion has fallen to 48 per cent. The city council's expenditure increased in cash terms by 36 per cent. between 1981-82 and 1987-88, because the city council took over responsibility for the metropolitan county council services in 1986-87. That expenditure increased to 52 per cent., and the ratepayers are having to foot the bill for the reduction in the percentage that used to come from central Government.

The Secretary of State's ignorance was shown on 1 July, when he attacked my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett). He said:

> "There can never be enough public money to do everything through municipal ownership, nationalisation and services provided by highly unionised public sector services. It is inherently inefficient, and, worse, the necessary level of rates drives businesses and business men alike away." [Official Report, 1 July 1987; Vol. 118, c. 534.]

I do not know where the Secretary of State got his brief from, or whether he occasionally goes off his brief, but we should consider the spend on the private sector in Sheffield in 1984-85. Sheffield's total budget for that year was £262 million. Of that, slightly less than £100 million — 38 per cent. — was spent in the private sector or on agencies outside the control of the local authority. The false picture has been painted that all the revenue that goes to a local authority is designated within that authority. That is totally untrue. The private sector, especially builders and architects, have said that the cuts experienced during the past eight years and the strangulation of local government have had a major impact not only on the viability of their businesses but on their survival. The Secretary of State should know better than to make such statements.

The Government, aided and abetted by the gutter press, in their attempt to limit the role of local authorities, have painted a picture of irresponsible councillors of all parties. They have said that local government does not serve the community, but then they come up with the poll tax. On 29 June this year, the Secretary of State said that the rates bill for the average household in Sheffield will increase from £371 to £496 — an increase of 33·7 per cent. The Minister will know that that is only half the story. Much of the increase will fall on those who can least afford it. If the Bills introducing the poll tax go through the House — they may be opposed by some senior Conservative Members — they will represent another blow to those who can least afford it.

If the Government continue to attack under-resourced local government, they will be in breach of the consensus that has been accepted for many years: that local people who are democratically elected should have a say in how the money is spent. Crude though it may be, we have used the rating system for the redistribution of wealth generally. More than that, we have used it to develop the infrastructure of the more deprived areas so that we can attract industry. That consensus has now clearly been broken. Many Conservative Members and outside agencies, in documents such as "Faith in the City", have said

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Caborn: I will give way in a moment.

[Mr. Caborn]

It has been pointed out in documents drawn up by many institutions outside the House that we are building that time bomb. Unless the Government start taking note of what people in various localities are saying, not only will they break that consensus but there will be major problems for the inner cities.

Mr. Favell: Will the hon. Gentleman say a word about the unified business rate and how that will affect Sheffield? Will it not reduce the charge to businesses substantially and is not unemployment the major problem facing Sheffield? Would not a reduction in overheads of businesses be welcome to Sheffield?

Mr. Caborn: Obviously a reduction in charges would be of some assistance to any business. It depends how one accepts responsibility within a community. When the Government destroyed the cheap fares policy that was supposed to be a massive burden on ratepayers, the removal of that redistribution of wealth fell heavily upon industry. Where the net reduction in the family budget was about £10, people put in for wage increases to combat it.

If the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) speaks to business men in the centre of Sheffield who have lost a tremendous amount of business because people cannot afford to travel there, he will find that business activity has reduced considerably. If he talks to industrialists about high interest rates, the high value of the pound and energy costs over the eight years of the Government, he will find that rates pale into insignificance in terms of a vibrant manufacturing base in the city of Sheffield. Any industrialist will tell him that they will always moan about the rates, but that the real cause of the decimation of the industrial base is clearly the economic policy that has been pursued by the Government, which has strangled that manufacturing base with high interest rates, an over-valued pound and energy costs.

I hope that the Government will take on board what has been said not just by Opposition Members but by Conservative Members — that if they do not start treating local government in a manner more befitting the type of civilised society in which we live, they will reap the consequences.

9.7 pm

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): The House is indebted to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) for giving us such an early opportunity to debate local government finance. I suspect that it will not be the last opportunity and that we shall debate the subject again and again over the next few months. If we continue to do so in the atmosphere of calm authority that you, Madam Deputy Speaker, bring to our proceedings, we shall all be very grateful.

No new tax or charge will be popular. It is no surprise, therefore, that the Opposition have latched on to the proposed local government finance reforms as a key part of their political attack on the Government. Nor is it any surprise that some of my hon. Friends have expressed, and may express during this debate, occasional reservations about some of the details of the reforms that have been proposed. Many criticisms have been made and will be made about the community charge. Almost all of the criticisms that I have heard so far can be answered.

First, it has been suggested that the new community charge is not to be based on the ability to pay. Of course, rates were not based on the ability to pay and many of those who will benefit under the community charge — single people, pensioners and single-parent families — were unable, in many cases, to pay a high rates burden but will be able to afford the lower sum that the community charge represents and will be grateful for the reduction.

Secondly, it is suggested that the community charge will benefit the better off. That seems a rather curious argument. The community charge applies to working couples on good salaries and it may well be that in certain areas—we could call this the Dulwich argument — their community charge, if two of them are earning, will be less than their existing rate demand or less than that of others who are not in such fortunate circumstances, who are not earning as much, but who happen to be living in the same borough. However, it is a false argument. The community charge will account for only 25 per cent. of local government finance. Another 25 per cent. will come from the business rate, but, more importantly, the remaining 50 per cent. will continue to come from central Government. Those who keep saying that the community charge will help the better off have not taken that on board. That is a crucial point. Those who pay higher rates of income tax will be making their contribution to that 50 per cent. of local government finance. In fact, they will be paying twice as much towards local government in their income tax as they will through the community charge.

The Dulwich argument is not simply false but is rather curious coming from the Opposition. They are saying that some people who are better off will be paying a little more towards their public services. Where have we heard that before? We heard that from the Labour party throughout the election campaign. The Labour party was appealing to the sense of community and sense of obligation among those who were better equipped to pay. I find it rather odd that the Labour Members should now style themselves as the defenders of the prosperous bourgeoisie, and are concerned that its pockets should not be pinched further by the community charge when they were suggesting just a month and a half ago that those same people would be quite happy to pay a little more. Indeed, some of the people who are now complaining about the community charge are the very people who told us two months ago, perhaps on the doorstep, that they did not need the tax cuts that the Chancellor provided in his March Budget. They said that they did not need the extra £100 or £200 a year, but they are now squealing across the suburbs and the home counties at the prospect of paying an extra £50 in a year through the community charge.

The third criticism that I do not understand is that the community charge will not help the north. It is true that in some areas of the north, particularly in Yorkshire and the north-west that happen to have that fatal combination of historically low rateable values and high spending Labour councils, the individual may be paying more through the community charge than he pays at present in rates. However, that ignores the other central reform in our proposals, the reform of the non-domestic rate and the introduction of the national non-domestic rate. Of course, that would lead to substantial reductions in the business rates burden. I can speak only from the point of view of my own region. It is already estimated that business rates will fall by about 40 per cent. in places such as Newcastle, Middlesbrough and other towns in the north-east.

It is also calculated that the total benefit to the north—even as the Opposition style their geographic north will be about £700 million a year. That is a considerable sum. It is three times what the Government are spending on their regional aid budget at the moment, and it should not be ignored by anybody who believes in the urgent necessity of regenerating the economy of the north.

Fourthly, it was suggested by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central, who introduced the debate and has already fled from the Chamber, that somehow the reform is centralist and that it will undermine local democracy. That is one of the weaker arguments to be mounted against the community charge. I suspect that, as time goes on and we debate the proposal, we shall hear less of such an argument. The strongest argument for the community charge is that it will strengthen local accountability because it will directly improve the responsibility of local government.

Of course, if council rates continue to be high until the introduction of the community charge, and if councils continue to be high spenders and ignore central Government advice on spending targets, as they have done for four or five years, the community charge may be high. Councils may find that electors will pay even more than they pay at the moment. But it will not be for the Government or for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to make the decision. The decision to enforce a higher community charge will be for local councils. They will have to account for it in due time. Indeed, if they consistently impose a community charge that is higher than the national average, it will be transparent to their local electors in a way in which present rate levels, caught up in the complexity of grant-related expenditure—GRE and all the other synonyms of local government finance which have baffled the House for the past four or five years—are not. For high spending local authorities, the logic of the community charge is absolute, and for them there will be no hiding place. Fifthly, I cannot accept the criticism that the community charge may be unfair. No system of local government could be more unfair than our present rating system. No account is taken of ability to pay, of the extent to which people use local services, or of the need to involve a much larger number of people in local democracy. No account is taken of the need to redress a situation in which 35 million people use local services but 20 million people do not pay rates. We must remove the absurdity in some central urban areas such as in Manchester, where only one in four adults pay any rates. That is not only absurd in principle but pretty tough on the man who pays rates.

I have already said that I believe that almost all criticisms of the community charge that I have heard can be answered. Indeed, I have no doubt that those criticisms will be answered admirably and efficiently by my hon. Friend the Minister when he replies.

However, I have heard one criticism from outside the House to which I believe my hon. Friend should address himself if he has time. The criticism is that this sensible reform of local government finance is not, at the moment, being linked to any reform of local government structure. My hon. Friend should bear in mind the consequences of the reform that he will be promoting. Once we have a local government that is locally responsible and truly accountable to its electors, I believe that it will make no sense to continue with the two-tier structure of local government. We should reconsider, as recommended years ago by Redcliffe-Maud, single-tier, all-purpose authorities responding to local demand in a much more effective way than at present.

Such is my single note of reservation. I hope that my hon. Friend can satisfy my question. There will be many more debates on this subject. I hope that when criticisms are made of the community charge they will be better founded in fact and based on a better grasp of what the Government are seeking to do.

9.21 pm

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): I hope that it will not be thought presumptious or unduly prococious of the part of a maiden speaker to offer you, Madam Deputy Speaker, my congratulations on your new appointment. May I express the wish of those on the Liberal Benches that you enjoy your appointment and occupy the Chair for a long time to come.

I am grateful for the opportunity afforded to me to make a maiden speech in this House. I do so attended with all the apprehensions to which maiden speakers are traditionally subject. In the spirit of that tradition, I wish to begin by referring to my predecessor, Barry Henderson.

Barry Henderson served the constituency of Fife, North-East sincerely and conscientiously during the time he was its Member of Parliament. To me he was a courteous opponent, and he was gracious and generous in defeat. However, none of those qualities, admirable in themselves, was sufficient protection against the condemnation by the electors of Fife, North-East of the party of which he was such a loyal supporter. Some of the condemnation was especially reserved for the community charge, or the poll tax as it is colloquially described north of the border.

I trust that we on the Liberal Benches may be forgiven some small self-indulgence from the realisation that the constituency that returned Mr. Asquith for so many years has once more returned a Liberal Member of Parliament.

The House will be aware that within my constituency lies Scotland's oldest university, founded in 1411. That university has a long noble tradition of scholarship in the arts and sciences, in teaching and research. The maintenance of that tradition is becoming increasingly difficult in the present climate. Research, in particular, is an issue of considerable controversy within that university. It is universally recognised within the academic community that research for its intrinsic merit is an essential feature of a vigorous and healthy university. It must surely be accepted that scholarship should not lightly be sacrificed to commercialism. However, that is an inevitable consequence of Government policies towards universities.

Since 1980, St. Andrew's university has suffered a cut of 21 per cent. in real terms in University Grants Committee funding. It has survived only by the skilful management of its investments and by a robust programme of recruiting foreign students who pay full fees. Obviously, that programme has been acompanied by a reduction in opportunity for students from the United Kingdom. Indeed, it may not be long before that institution is staring deficit in the face. One may think that that is hardly conducive to the role that is required of it during the last part of the 20th century.

This debate is concerned with local government finance. Anyone who listens to those who are involved in local government on a day-to-day basis will readily accept that many of the difficulties that local government faces arise from the continuing reduction in central Government's support for local government. In Fife, North-East, for example, if the housing support grant stood today at the same level as in 1979, the rents for council houses would be £6 per week less. Until that reduction in central Government support is halted, the pressure on local authorities will continue to be acute and damaging. To suggest, as appears to have been suggested in the House a few moments ago, that the community charge will bring a solution to the many problems of local government financing seems to ignore the fact that the community charge, of itself, will create its own difficulties.

Of course, it is accepted that rates are universally discredited, although from time to time one feels that, as a means of raising local taxation, rates still enjoy some support from Labour Members. The replacement of one regressive tax by another is no solution. The community charge, or the poll tax, must be regressive and unfair; otherwise there would not be any need for rebates. If it were essentially a fair charge, there would not be any necessity to make allowances for those whose personal circumstances were such as to make them unable to pay. A tax that will benefit mostly those who earn over £350 per week is self-evidently unfair.

We argue, as we have argued for a long time, that the only fair system of raising local taxation is by a local income tax based on the ability to pay. If ability to pay is recognised as the proper measure for raising taxation on a national, United Kingdom-wide basis, why is it denied that the same basis should be applied to local taxation?

If the Government were to undertake to restore the level of central Government support to what it was in 1979 and to introduce a local income tax along the lines that we have argued, real progress could be made in the financing of local government. I look for that, but so far I have been disappointed.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): It gives me great pleasure to follow the maiden speech of the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell), who spoke with great clarity and coherence and who, I am sure, will make many more speeches in the House. I understand that he is an advocate, and I welcome him to the small band of lawyers in the House. As his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), who is seated on his left, and who is a leading member of the all-party group of barristers, will inform him, we are a much-misunderstood, misrepresented and maligned group of individuals.

I welcome the hon. Gentleman also as a representative of, among other institutions, St. Andrew's university. Some of my hon. Friends have, for a number of years, been trying to contain the influence of St. Andrew's university on the thinking of the Conservative party, but with not as much success as some of us would have liked. Therefore, for many reasons, we welcome the hon. and learned Gentleman into the House and look forward to hearing from him on future occasions.

I should like to make several straightforward points about the rating system and local government finance. First—this is an important point—no one will lament the passing of the present domestic rating system. It is an anachronistic system, which owes much to the old concept of the window tax and which is riddled with anomalies and unfairness. An elderly widow who is a pensioner may well, for example, be liable to pay exactly the same rates as her neighbours, where perhaps both husband and wife go out to work. That cannot be a fair system.

The present rating system gives every incentive to local councils, such as Oxfordshire, to be profligate and to write cheques on other people's bank accounts because on average only half of those who can vote must foot the bill for any extra spending. The present rating system gives no real incentive to local councils to be prudent as they have little accountability to those whose money they spend, often with gay abandon. Therefore, the arguments against the present rating system are many.

Secondly, if any hon. Member has any lingering support for the present rating system rather than opting for something new, such lingering support should evaporate when one considers the prospect of revaluation. The point which has not been taken on board by nearly enough people is that we could not carry on with the existing system without a revaluation, since the last was in 1973 and revaluation is part and parcel of the existing system.

In Scotland, only five years after the previous revaluation, the rateable value of an ordinary house increased from £171 to £726 and the rateable value of a modest flat increased from £405 to an incredible £1,289. Imagine what revaluation in England and Wales after 14 years would do. Inevitably, it would lead to serious disruption for many present ratepayers. Therefore, I do not believe that the present system has any friends or supporters either on the Opposition Benches or on these Benches.

Time and again during the general election campaign that was made clear on the doorsteps by many people who asked that at last the Conservatives should redeem their pledge to reform the rating system. Clearly the electors understood what the Conservatives were proposing in our manifesto which stated that we would "legislate in the first session of the new Parliament . . . to replace rates with a fairer Community Charge."

Thirdly, the community charge has several clear advantages. It is straightforward; nearly every adult over 18 will be liable to pay an equal share; and there will be protection for weaker, poorer members of the community. Furthermore, the community charge will ensure both that those who spend the money will again be accountable to those who provide much of the money that is spent and that business, commerce and industry will no longer be prey to the unreasonable demands of unreasonable councils. It is an inherently fairer system as 69 per cent. of single pensioners and 83 per cent. of one-parent families will be better off.

Naturally, some critics will try to dream up as many obstacles and difficulties as possible, and I have no doubt that the difficulties they will seek to raise during the passage of the legislation will be legion, but the burden of proof is undoubtedly on them. If they do not believe that the present rating system is sustainable and they are opposed to the community charge, the burden of proof is clearly on them to come up with an alternative which combines fairness and accountablility by councillors to those who provide the money they spend.

So far, during the debate on the Gracious Speech and in press comments on the reform of the rating system, we have not seen a shadow of a scintilla of any suggestion from any opponents to the community charge of any alternatives that they could devise. They will not be able to argue with any conviction that the community charge will weaken local democracy; it does exactly the reverse, because it strengthens local democracy by making those elected directly responsible to those who pay. After at least 15 years of debate and argument over the present iniquitous rating system, the Government have at last come up with a real viable alternative.

Fourthly, it is important that this point should be understood clearly by everyone—under the community charge, people living in counties such as Oxfordshire will pay more than they need to under the new system only if the county council refuses to cut spending. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment recently released figures that reflect what the position would have been if a community charge had been introduced this year instead of rates. The figures show that households in Oxfordshire with more than two people would end up paying more under the community charge system than under the rates system, but only—this point has been made time and time again—because of overspending and profligate spending by the county council. If the county council cut spending, the same household with the identical figures would pay £27 a year less under the new community charge than under the rates system.

We must get the message home to people that the figures clearly show that it is important that high-spending authorities such as Oxfordshire should start to identify sensible economies. It is also important that those of us who live in counties such as Oxfordshire should insist that such economies are made. There will be a real incentive for all of us living in Oxfordshire to insist that such counties begin to behave prudently and sensibly and stop writing cheques on other people's bank accounts. Nearly every adult in Oxfordshire will have a vested, direct and identifiable interest in ensuring that the county is prudent.

There are four simple points. First, the present rating system is discredited. Secondly, the community charge will be much fairer. Thirdly, the burden of proof is on those who oppose the community charge to come forward with another system, and we have seen none of that to date. Finally, under the community charge many people have the potential to be better off, but only if local authorities try to contain their spending and do not continue to pursue profligate spending policies, spending money on other people's bank accounts.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to speak in this important debate. The debate affects all of my constituents who will be interested to learn the views of Conservative Members who have said that rich people tend not to live in large houses and poor people tend not to live in small houses. That means that under the present system they believe that things are inequitable.

I want to pay tribute to Ray Ellis, the former Member for Derbyshire, North-East. Ray would have been interested to be involved in this debate. He was a former councillor in south Yorkshire, and that county council has since been abolished. He served in this House for eight years and during that period he faced strong Government opposition. When I took over from Ray Ellis, I had hoped to be in an easier position, but I face the same level of strength on the Government Benches.

The Government must realise that the election result has not given them a mandate to ride roughshod over people's feelings. Strong feelings were expressed across both sides of the political divide during the election campaign and on no point were feelings running stronger than on the poll tax.

Ray Ellis was the fifth miner to represent Derbyshire, North-East, an area which has suffered boundary changes. The first miner was a Lib-Lab, elected in 1907, who joined the Labour party in 1910. For 68 years of the intervening 80 years the constituency was served by five mining Members from Derbyshire. Among them was Tom Swain, who was well known in the House and was a fighter on behalf of his constituents in more ways than one. I have broken that tradition in that I am not a miner, but I take over the commitment to fight on behalf of mining in my constituency.

Some mining is still left in north-east Derbyshire. There are three pits, one of which is at High Moor, where Ray Ellis was for a number of years an extremely effective union branch secretary with a sound reputation for negotiating on behalf of his members. The other two pits are at Renishaw Park and Ireland. Ireland is on the boundary of north-east Derbyshire and Chesterfield and is currently the subject of closure plans by the NCB.

The NCB has also produced a hit-list of further pits in the area, such as Markham, Bolsover, and Warsop. Renishaw Park also appears on that list. Such closures would seriously affect the future employment prospects of people in my constituency.

In the three constituencies of Bolsover, Derbyshire, North-East and Chesterfield, mining is still the leading employer, partly because of the growth in unemployment within the area. Even so, the mining industry has been contracting, although jobs have been contracting at a faster rate. It can therefore be seen that mining still has a prominence in the constituency, and it is my intention to argue on its behalf and for the maintenance of the pits in those areas, particularly as they all have workable coal reserves.

I shall also defend the mining industry because of my own background. My father, relatives and my wife's father were miners. During the past 21 years I have taught both Derbyshire and Yorkshire miners, although they have probably taught me much more. In fact, three Members of this House attended classes that I have taught, and they, too, are now teaching me much more than I ever taught them.

I probably learnt more about miners' interests during the academic year 1984-85. During that time I taught two classes of Yorkshire miners, who attended rigorously despite the fact that it was the most terrifying period that they had ever gone through. Indeed, one of those miners was later killed when he returned to his pit.

My election to this House indicates that many changes are taking place in north-east Derbyshire. It is no longer an area pockmarked with pits, as it was at one time. It now contains a commuter element which centres on Sheffield and Chesterfield, of which I was a part as a teacher. Derbyshire, North-East is a socially and politically divided constituency, although not on traditional north-south lines. There is a classic east-west divide, with a strong Labour feeling in the east and a strong Conservative feeling in the west. Both views should be taken account of by the Government, because to some extent it is a replica of what we now find generally throughout the country. A wise Government do not ride roughshod over differing attitudes and opinions, but seek to reconcile such conflicting interests and attitudes.

The Government's poll tax is a striking example of the problem that now exists, because in north-east Derbyshire the east-enders of the constituency will be expected to subsidise the west-enders, and that will cause uproar.

The Government are seemingly intent on creating scenarios that repeat those that we have seen in the past in Derbyshire, North-East. The eastern part of my constituency includes Clay Cross; in the western part are commuter areas such as Dronfield and Wingerworth. Clay Cross fought the Housing Finance Act 1972 for reasons similar to those that people have put forward against the poll tax. The Housing Finance Act provided for people's rents to be increased to pay for subsidies for their neighbours, and to reduce the rate burden and generally to transfer funds to the Exchequer. The poorer people were expected to subsidise the richer. But that was mild in comparison to measures instigated by the Government since and in the poll tax that is now on the cards, including reduction in rate support grant, controls being operated centrally, and the destruction of the ability and right of people to provide and act for themselves and to control things democratically. Clay Cross and the other areas in Derbyshire, North-East are unlikely to be willing to sit back gently and allow that to occur.

Financial problems in the community affect such areas as Dronfield, which, like many western areas, also has its working-class wards. In one of those wards there is a problem that requires Government finance and assistance. There is a fire raging underground near an industrial estate at Callywhite lane in Dronfield. We are seeking a delegation from the district council, the town council, firms, trade unionists and others to seek Government assistance. According to a magistrate's decision last week, the council is expected to find £300,000 to put out the fire. In terms of grant penalties, that would be £342,000—the product of a 4p rate, in areas that can ill afford it. Clearly, there is a case here for help from central Government.

The Department of the Environment has at last agreed to meet the delegation, but only after I put before the House early-day motion No. 46, signed by several other hon. Members; after an oral and a written question were put forward; and after I had tried to raise the matter on the Adjournment. Now, because we are approaching the summer recess—which I voted against—that delegation may not be met until September. That is not adequate for my constituents. Serious dangers need to be dealt with, and North-East Derbyshire district council is beginning to require assistance, particularly financial assistance.

There is an embankment of 40 to 45 ft. with a stream at the bottom. At the top of the embankment, on car park land behind firms, the temperature is 40 deg C. on the ground. At the top of the embankment the soil temperature is 60 deg. At the bottom of the embankment it is 87 degrees. Three feet below the bottom of the embankment the temperature is 630 deg C. in various hot spots. The fire cannot be put out with water; water oxidises the soil. The fire is gathering momentum; because it is growing in area it is threatening other firms and gas supplies in the area. At stake in the immediate future are 300 jobs. If the district council puts up the rates and requires firms under the Public Health Act 1936 to provide the money, a number of those firms will go bankrupt. They will not be assisted by the poll tax, nor by the provision that is made for businesses; they will go by the board, and 300 jobs will have gone in an area of high unemployment. Even worse than that is the fact that the stream at the bottom of the embankment is within 100 yd of a BMX track. Children are not prevented from going to the stream; all that is provided is a warning notice. That must be acted on.

I return to Clay Cross. That struggle showed that to engage in hard battles against Government measures is not unpopular. In a recent by-election, a formerly debarred Clay Cross councillor was elected to the North-East Derbyshire district council with 85 per cent. of the votes. The Government believe that such a high vote is impossible, but that is the percentage that has to be gained to establish a closed shop.

The Clay Cross councillors did not intend to defy the law. They believed that under the Housing Finance Act 1972 a commissioner could be sent in to take over housing. It was only after they had been through the courts that it was decided that under the Local Government Act 1933 a surcharge should be levied on the councillors. Many of my constituents, particularly those in the mining community, are aware of the fact that, although the action that was taken then appeared to be quite clear and open, the law can apply differing interpretations. Many sacked miners in north-east Derbyshire, including many of those who helped me in my election campaign, believe that to be so.

The Government should not unduly burden people. Instead, they should seek to reconcile conflicting interests. I shall quote from a letter that has been written to me by somebody who lives in north-east Derbyshire. It is not a put-up job. The letter comes from a 10-year-old girl in Unstone Green, which is a deprived area. In her letter Claire Staines writes:

"Dear Mr. Barnes, I am just writing to say how glad I am that you won your election. Can you ask Mrs. Thatcher to let us have more books and equipment for our school, and when is she going to find a job for my Dad?"

What is being done through local government financial legislation to ensure that books are placed in Claire Staines' school and to ensure that her father is given the opportunity, because the community is prosperous, to work again? I do not think that anything is being done.

9.54 pm

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): It gives me great pleasure to follow the maiden speech of the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes). I know his constituency well, and I spent many hours of my courtship there with my wife. I was a native of Sheffield, and one of the nicest areas to go to was north-east Derbyshire.

Occasionally I travel to Bolsover, where I am president of the Conservative Association, and where I like to keep an eye on the activities of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). It is a very pleasant area——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Skinner's hole.

Mr. Favell: That is true. The hon. Member for Bolsover tells me that none of his predecessors lived in my house, but I have my doubts.

I am glad to be speaking this evening because the subject for debate was chosen by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn). I have connections with that area because I have been a ratepayer in that constituency for the past 20 years, and during that time I have seen the city steadily decline.

The hon. Gentleman said that there were problems with Sheffield's industrial base. Those problems have been largely self-inflicted by the Socialist council that has ruled the city for more than 40 years.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the steel industry. When the Minister replies to the debate, he might comment on the fact that there is no major steel producer in Sheffield. Most of the steel producing in south Yorkshire is carried out in Rotherham. That is due to the fact that the rates in Rotherham are lower than those in Sheffield. Four years ago a manager of British Steel in Sheffield was complaining that it was costing him £1,000 per employee in rates per annum. It is no wonder that he has chosen to move to Rotherham rather than stay in Sheffield.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): What the hon. Gentleman is saying is untrue. If he looks at the history of the steelworks and of Sheffield he will discover that the older parts of the steelworks disappeared. He will discover that due to the recession, not because of a lack of demand for steel, they disappeared. The Steel Peach and Tozer steelworks have always been in Rotherham. They did not move from Sheffield to Rotherham.

Mr. Favell: I am suggesting not that Steel Peach and Tozer has moved from Sheffield to Rotherham, but that it is still open, whereas all the major steel producing plants in Sheffield are shut.

Mr. McKay: The hon. Gentleman should get his facts right. The reason why Steel Peach and Tozer is there is Concast. The investment at Steel Peach and Tozer made it one of the best plants in Europe. The reason for Samuel Fox remaining at Stocksbridge is exactly the same.

Mr. Favell: The fact remains that there is no major steel producer in the city of steel, Sheffield. That is largely due to the fact that rates are higher in Sheffield than in Rotherham.

Why have industrial cities such as Sheffield been destroying their industrial and commercial base? It is because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) said, only 18 million out of 35 million adults in this country pay rates. Of the 18 million who are liable to pay rates, only 12 million pay full rates. In places such as Sheffield, Manchester, Liverpool, Newcastle and Leicester the figure is lower because of housing benefit.

Rate rebates were introduced not that long ago because certain councils were spending more money than ratepayers could afford. It was a modest provision to start with, but now 40 per cent. of people receive rebates. That is obviously nonsense. They receive rebates because the cities and towns in which they live spend more money than the people can afford to pay for. The wonderful point about the community charge is that it will mean that the people receiving the services will largely be able to afford to pay for them. This returns democracy to the towns and the cities, and not before time.

If we continue with the present system, there is no doubt that it will destroy our industrial cities. The simple reason is that there are no votes in saving money. At the moment the votes are in spending money. Only a quarter of the people in Manchester, Liverpool, Sheffield, Newcastle—all our great industrial cities—pay rates. It is not in the interests of people for whom they vote to save money. The interest is only in spending money.

Three or four years ago I discussed the matter with Birmingham Members—it is interesting to see my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) here—and they said, "My goodness, the Conservative party will do well in Birmingham." I said, "No, it will not, because there are no votes in saving money." The Conservative group on Birmingham council was a low-spending group, but it was voted out because there were no votes in saving money, as the group found to its cost.

Not so long ago, before the introduction of rate rebates, Socialist councils tried to hold rates down, simply because the lads as well as those who indulged in commerce and industry had to pay rates. That no longer happens. In my view, having spent my whole working life in a northern industrial city, this long-awaited, long-sought reform will be their salvation. It is a sledgehammer, but we need one to crack the nuts. It is not before time. It is welcome and I heartily endorse it. I cannot wait to vote for it.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes), who made his maiden speech today, on his felicitous references to our late friend and colleague Tom Swain and his successor Ray Ellis. I shall always remember Tom Swain with affection. He was a picturesque colleague and brave in what he said. Indeed, every hon. Member will remember how Tom Swain reacted when some kind of missile—he could not know what it was—was thrown down from the Strangers Gallery.

I pay tribute also to my Scottish colleague the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell), who has been a personal friend of my family for many years. I should like to follow what he said about the poll tax.

My contribution is precise. It refers to an interview given on "The World This Weekend" on the Sunday before last by the director of finance for the Lothian region, David Chynowith, to Gordon Clough. Clough said:

"there's one group of people for whom the community charge will be a universal headache, the local authority finance directors who'll have to put the will of Parliament into practice. They'll have to reorganise their systems to assess and collect a tax, levied not on houses, which stay put, but on people, who don't. In Scotland, of course, they've already started work preparing for that day two years hence, when the rates overnight turn into the community charge."

Earlier today, in a remarkable speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) made a point with characteristic embellishment. Michael Ancram lost his seat. The Secretary of State for Defence nearly lost his. Another Scottish Minister lost his. The basic reason was the immediacy of the poll tax. My hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North said in his sparkling speech that there should be a piper's lament for the election results for Michael Ancram and the other Conservatives, including John MacKay. I pay tribute to

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

John MacKay. He was a decent Minister in our personal dealings with him. The Scottish election result was as much about the poll tax as it was about anything.

David Chynowith is the director of finance for Lothian region. He is also the chairman of an ad hoc committee of Scottish finance directors who are grappling with gestation problems. He said that he had been recalling what some of the problems were:

"Well, the main difficulties at the moment are trying to analyse the various systems which we'll need to set up before 1989 . . . we've only got until April 1989 to get everything up and running and the first major job of course is that the assessor has to set up the community charge register and once he's done that, we've then got to sort out the means of collection from the very many more people that we'll have to collect for as compared to the domestic rate charge."

He was asked:

"What about the business of setting up a community charge register . . . That isn't exactly the same as it is the electoral register."

Chynowith replied:

"No, indeed it isn't and it's a running register as compared with the electoral register which is set on one day in the year. It has to be kept up-to-date continuously and must at all times record all the people who are aged over 18 and who are staying in this area."

Is the director of finance for Lothian region and the chairman of the ad hoc committee in Scotland right or wrong to say that the register has to be kept up to date continuously each month? Is that so, or is it not?

Clough then said:

"Well, that's to say it's got to be updated pretty well monthly has it, because you have to collect in 12 monthly instalments?"

Chynowith replied:

"That's correct. It has to be updated continuously, yes and so each month it must be correct for each of the residents in the area."

Will the Minister tell me whether that is right or wrong? He can get the information from his officials in the Box, because the Box had better have thought about these things. Is it true that the register has to be updated every month? Let it be put on the record that I give the Minister an opportunity to reply. The fact is that, like so many of the other things that I have seen in the last quarter of a century, the poll tax is ill thought out.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Hear, hear.

Mr. Dalyell: The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark), whom I hold in the highest regard, has repeatedly asked these questions both publicly and privately—he does not say anything in private that he would not say in public. It is no good dismissing him. After all, he has run one of the major committees in Birmingham, so he just might know something about this. I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I intend to make my small contribution when the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has finished.

Mr. Dalyell: Let me then warn the House that I think that it is correct that if the register is to work—we are not talking about equity here — there has to be an updating every month. If the Minister does not deny that, either he does not know the answer or I am right. It must be one or t'other.

Clough continues:

"So how is the assessor setting about this? Is he having to send out questionnaires to every household to say, who is going to be living in your house on April 5th 1989, who's over 18?"

I wish that the Minister had heard my hon. Friend in his maiden speech talking about aunties under the bed, because in the Dulwich question that he put so brilliantly my hon. Friend said exactly what would happen. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Provan (Mr. Wray) has gone on record time and again as saying that he now has 43,000 constituents but, by the time the poll tax is in operation, he will have only 10,000 because they will not register. How are people going to get them to register?

The director of finance answered:

"He will have to canvass every property in the area. It won't just be a postal canvas of course because there is not a complete response to any postal canvass one does and it will be necessary for him to employ staff to actually go around and knock on doors and stand on door steps, I'm afraid."

Clough said:

"What happens if someone who is initially registered on April 5th, let's say, decides to go away and live somewhere else . . . so he presumably doesn't . . . or he, she doesn't have to go on paying the community charge to Lothian but will presumably have to pay it somewhere else. Whose duty is it to tell whom about that?"

I suspect that the answer is a ministerial lemon, because the Minister does not know.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): That is not untypical.

Mr. Dalyell: My hon. Friend says that that is not untypical, but my hon. Friend and I know a good deal more about this than the Minister does, because with us it has been far more immediate. This is how the Secretary of State for Defence, who without any question is a good constituency Member, nearly lost the seat that has been held by the Tory party since the first Reform Bill. That requires some explanation. Edinburgh, South has been held by the Tory party since the first Reform Bill. I confess that the university of Edinburgh came into it and that other factors were at work there, but Ministers must ask themselves what will happen to their colleagues in 1991. I have a great deal of experience in the House, and I know that as soon as we start lifting up stones, creepy crawly things come out. It is wise for Governments to understand what those creepy crawly things are.

Chynowith says:

"Well, it's the responsibility of every individual to notify the authority they're leaving and also the authority that they're going to. So every single person over the age of 18 will have that duty and responsibility to ensure that the community charge register is kept up-to-date."

Will every family Cunninghame, North do that? I do not think that I can promise to deliver it in Linlithgow.

Clough says:

"It wouldn't be, I think, having too gloomy a view of human nature to suggest that some people might get lost on the Way?"

What happens if someone's son is lost in the Sahara? Does he pay? That is the Dulwich factor again. I do not wish to embellish the Dulwich question, because it is the property of my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North. I remember my hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden telling me that the West Lothian question was like the Schleswig-Holstein question. The Schleswig-Holstein question became very interesting and that is what may happen with the Dulwich question.

Mr. Ralph Howell (Norfolk, North): I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's comments about creepy crawlies that might come from under stones. Is it not true that, at the election, the creepy crawlies did not come out from under the stones and, therefore, the Labour party lost the election?

Mr. Dalyell: That is what I am trying to say. This is something that worries me greatly. One sees how blue the map is—with the exception of Oxford, East—south of a line that starts about 25 miles south of Derby. In Norfolk and East Anglia, there is only one red dot, for Norwich. I mourn greatly the loss of Ken Weetch in Ipswich. The hon. Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) can say that the Conservatives won the election in his area, but has it not occurred to him that, even with the huge Conservative majority of 102, there is not a single Conservative Member on the Greater Glasgow conurbation? Does that not create problems?

Mr. Howell indicated dissent.

Mr. Dalyell: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head. Thoughtful Conservatives might ask why it happened. What I am saying—not on the hustings—is that this has much to do with the fact that Scotland was being used as a guinea pig for the poll tax. That is a partial explanation for the remarkable discrepancies. If hon. Members were wise, they would challenge their Ministers on how this scheme would work. I do not think that the Minister has much of a clue, because he has not yet put his mind to it.

Chynowith says:

"I'm absolutely certain that they will because clearly if people move regularly, they may take the view that they'll wait for the local authority to catch up with them."

Where are all the local authority personnel going to come from for this? An enormous amount of staff are involved.

I will read into the record the question to which I received an answer today:

"Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many civil servants in all departments are currently involved in preparation for the implementation of the poll tax?

Mr. Michael Howard: 21 staff in the Department of the Environment, 10 in the Scottish Office and three in the Welsh Office are engaged full-time on all aspects of the reform of local government finance. A further 21 staff in the Department of the Environment and 36 staff in other central departments are involved, as part of their other duties, in contributing to this work."

Those 21 staff in the Department of the Environment had better be asked to bend their minds to the kind of question that the director of finance—the technical man, who is a careful accountant—is being asked.

Clough said:

"OK. So you've got to draw up a community charge register which is going to need extra staff. How many people are you going to have to take on, do you think, to do that?"

Chynowith said:

"Well I understand the assessor is estimating in Lothian that he'll need between 60 and 70 extra staff."

If 60 or 70 extra staff will be needed in Lothian, 120 to 140 staff will be needed in Strathclyde. How many one will need in the Western Isles I do not know. The physical cost of employing extra staff is very real. What kind of money will they be paid? Clough said:

"There is going to be . . . a difficulty isn't there, even in collecting the names because if people know that in admitting that there's going to be an 18 year old living in the house, they're going to have to pay whatever it might be . . . a great temptation not to register."

I ask the Minister to save time by reading carefully the maiden speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North, because he put it more graphically than I could. He said that people will be disappearing under the bed. That may be a flight of poetic language.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): The hon. Gentleman has advanced three arguments. The first is that it will be hard work for the finance officers. They would say that. I have never had any sympathy with local government officers who complain about changes in legislation because it means that they have to do more work, if it happens to be a better system. Secondly, he cast aspersions on the Scottish people by suggesting that there would be only 10,000 people left in one of his hon. Friend's constituencies. That suggests a very high rate of dishonesty among the Scottish people, which I am sure is not true. The third suggestion was that he was concerned about the Government losing seats. I am grateful to him for his concern about our electoral future, but when will he get to the main issue—equity? Is the community charge fair, because it increases the charge so that everybody who uses services pays towards their cost?

Mr. Dalyell: I am not casting any aspersions on the Scottish people. I am simply a little worldly wise. I know how people behave when asked to pay more money than they probably can pay in circumstances where the electoral register is not perfect. The hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) said how imperfect the electoral register was in his area. It means forming another register. The hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) dismissed the directors of finance, but when dealing with them and with actuaries I have learnt to be careful. One has to take them seriously. The man I am quoting is a careful accountant.

Chynowith added:

"Yes, I think there will be a temptation and especially for those people who . . . are itinerant, whose perhaps jobs change regularly or perhaps they're on the move . . . through their job and . . . I think that there will certainly be a great temptation on people not . . .to register."

Does the Minister accept that there will be this temptation?

Clough said:

"So are you then going to have to employ constantly people who will have right of entry to households to count the number of beds that have been slept in and whether they've got big shoes alongside them?"

Chynowith replied:

"We hope very much that we do not have to do that sort of thing. I don't think that the local authorities will relish that at all . . . it's not the sort of thing which we like to be doing.

CLOUGH: What about the problems of collection once you get that far?

CHYNOWITH: Yes, well, collection is going to be most difficult because we are going to be dealing with people who at the moment don't pay any form of domestic rates."

We now come to the question of equity. How does one justify, on the basis of equity, the fact that those who live in largish houses will be paying the same as those who are crowded into unsatisfactory houses?

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Surely, we are talking about the charge for local authority services. Houses do not borrow books, go swimming or use the roads. It is the individuals within the houses that use the services. We are talking about a charge on the individual for the use of those local authority services.

Mr. Dalyell: If that is going to be the argument, we can go back to Wat Tyler. I take the hon. Gentleman at face value and say that, if that is his view of life, there will be great trouble in the country.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Is my hon. Friend aware that the easy platitudes that we have heard from the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) are exactly the same sort of things we were hearing a couple of years ago in Scotland from people who looked at the superficialities of the matter and found it attractive but who increasingly found that there was an awful lot more to it than met the eye? Is my hon. Friend aware that the Government accept that the collection cost of the new tax in Scotland will be £21 million a year? That is how much it will cost to carry out the extraordinary shoe-measuring exercise and the rest that has been described. On a pro rata basis one would be talking about £210 million a year for the whole of the United Kingdom.

Is my hon. Friend aware that the evasion rate that the Government now accept as likely is somewhere in the region of 15 per cent., but more sceptical people, such as myself, think it will be in the region of 20 per cent? Therefore, in spite of the silly snipes about the dishonesty of the Scottish people, it is not a victimless crime, if crime it is, because inexorably it means that the more people evade, the higher the tax is for those who remain. The figures that are being quoted as a per capita tax in England and Wales are bogusly low because they do not take account of the evasion factor of at least 20 per cent.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): That is very succinct.

Mr. Dalyell: It was very much to the point. The House will learn to listen to my hon. Friend as I have for the past 10 years. He talks a great deal of sense and does not open his mouth without knowing what he is talking about.

My hon. Friend asked a question as to the origins of all this. I will explain the origins. The Prime Minister, like Henry Plantagenet in a fit of frustration, said, "Who will rid me of the rates?" There are junior Ministers who, like the knights who went to do away with St. Thomas à Becket at his own altar in Canterbury wanting to please the monarch, said, "We will get rid of the rates." One gets back to a sort of patronage system where there are junior Ministers—Michael Ancram was one—who were only too pleased to oblige. All I can say is that there are certain dangers in obliging monarchs who ask too much or ask that which is impossible, and Michael Ancram paid the price.

The Prime Minister made an unwise promise. She decided that the evidence to the Layfield committee on local income tax was overwhelming. She found that there was a refusal from the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who had more political nous and would not do it. The former Member of Parliament for Wanstead and Woodford, Mr. Patrick Jenkin, would not do it, but the present Secretary of State for the Environment, for reasons that fit in with his character, undertook to do it and then shuffled it off on other people.

If the Minister is dealing with the poll tax, he has been handed a poisoned chalice.

Chynowith said:

"They're fully rebated and they will be coming due to pay at least part of the community charge because everybody has to pay 20 per cent. at least and that in itself is a major headache because we're going to be trying to collect relatively small amounts of money— perhaps something of the order of £10 or less a month and a lot of these people just will not have the wherewithal to pay it."

That brings us to the viability of the cost of collection. What is the Government's answer to the sheer cost of trying to get 20 per cent. or relatively small sums of money from itinerant people? The matter is mind-boggling.

Clough said:

"But the people on supplementary benefit as I understand it can help in paying even that 20 per cent. out pay by going to the office and getting the money and then sending it on to you."

The director of finance replied:

"Yes indeed. As I understand it, there will be provision under the supplementary benefit regulations for a payment to be made to individuals which would cover the 20 per cent. but it's not at all clear how that is going to be done and we obviously the regulations have still to be made."

Clough said:

"You're having to put into . . . operation a very complicated bit of legislation. As you work on it are you finding that there are areas which you have to deal with which aren't actually spelt out in the Act?"

Ministers had better note the reply:

"Yes indeed. We think at the moment there is something around 90 different issues which will have to be settled by some form of statutory instrument and they will have to laid fairly soon because of course we've got to develop the systems that will make this thing work."

There are 90 different issues — 90 statutory instruments. Has anybody told Mr. Speaker or the Government business managers about that? I have it from my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) that we are to spend hours on each one. We shall not let anything go through. Ninety times 90 is 8,100 minutes of parliamentary time.

Mr. Bennett: That was a promise made before the shadow Cabinet election.

Mr. Dalyell: Promises may have been made, but somehow we have experience of the matter. I am the man who, for 47 days — some of my colleagues did not approve — kept the House going in 1978-79 on devolution. We know how it can be done. Some hon. Members can talk even longer than I can. The Government business managers should take the matter on board. They should bear in mind the remarks of my hon. Friends the Members for Garscadden and for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton).

Mr. Wilson: People will miss their trains.

Mr. Dalyell: Yes, there will be missed trains. If we are to talk about the Scottish people, they will expect us to miss our trains because of this matter. The Government can set the business down for Thursday nights. The night sleeper will be less frequented, because we shall be here.

Clough went on:

"That does suggest—and I'm not asking you to make a political comment but it does suggest—that the Act wasn't properly thought through."

Chynowith replied:

"Well, I wouldn't say that. No, I think in fact in drawing up the Act, the civil servants who drew it up were well aware that there were a lot of gaps in it and they have made provision for statutory instruments to be made subsequent to the passing of the Act. But clearly, it was rushed through and there were a lot of last amendments to it . . . clearly it was an Act which was difficult to draft and is going to be even more difficult to implement."

Let not the Government say that they have not been warned.

I wish to raise one other local authority issue. In my constituency there has been a proposition that the village of Torphichen should have the first AIDS hospice or hostel in Europe. For 25 years I have always taken the view that it is not up to Members of Parliament to second-guess or try to overturn local authority decisions even though they may be decisions of local authorities that, as in my case, are not Labour-dominated. Local authorities have their place and must be treated with respect by hon. Members. Therefore, I do not wish to bother or concern the House with the direct issues of Torphichen.

I wish to ask the Minister — I do not expect an answer tonight, as that would be unreasonable—to what extent the Government are thinking about AIDS hospices and hostels? Such a development was one of the recommendations of the report of the Select Committee on Social Services. What is the Government's view — possibly this should be passed onto the Scottish Office, but other Government Departments should reflect upon it about placing AIDS hospices or hostels in small rural communities? I believe that a hospice is somewhere that the terminally ill can die with dignity and a hostel is where patients go with some hope of recovery. That recovery involves integration with the local community.

It is a delicate issue, and I leave it at that. Any reader of the Scottish press or viewer of television not only national television; the French and the West German television companies are also interested will be aware of its importance. It is something of a test case. I ask Ministers to reflect on the issues involved.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): There is no doubt that the Government have a mandate for change. There is also no doubt that for most people voting in the general election local government was an important issue. Many people are sick and tired of the present rating system.

A single person may live next door to a similar house where there are two, three or four income earners. That person may find that he pays exactly the same local tax — that is what rates are — as those four people. As a result, he feels hard done by.

There is no doubt that when it was first devised, the rating system was not intended to bear the huge and groaning burden that the present rating system must bear. It was devised to fill in potholes, to make sure that there was a road from one village to another and from one town to another, and to ensure that itinerants on the road were put into a home overnight and then moved on to another parish. Rates were meant to be a small burden on the community. However, as time has moved on the kind of sums that local government needs to raise have grown fast. The sums that local government spend today are between £26,000 million and £30,000 million. They are vast sums.

It is no good thinking that an outworn and overburdened system can bear such expenditure. There is a common feeling among people that the present system is unjust. There is no shadow of doubt but that the present system is unjust to many people. However, it is no good changing from one unjust system to another potentially unjust system or one that may be even more unjust. It is no good the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) talking about Thomas à Becket or saying, "Who will rid me of this pestilent tax?", without suggesting some better tax to put in its place.

One Parliament after another in this country has fiddled around with local government, and nearly always to local government's disadvantage. We have had one local government Bill after another, in which I have had some hand since I have had the great honour of being a representative in this House. Has local government improved? The answer is that it has not. We have tried one system after another. We abolished one type of council and put in the great urban and district councils. We had a West Midlands metropolitan council, and what a disaster that was. We have now decided to do away with such councils. We must find a better, more efficient and just way in which to raise money for local government expenditure for the needs of our local people. It can, of course, be done by taxation or by VAT. However, the people who say that the few pay for the many have some justice in their argument. There must be some accountability, but, if one is to change the basis of local taxation, there must be that one essential justice that runs throughout this ancient country's history—the ability to pay. That ability to pay is missing from the poll tax as it will be. Let us be quite blunt; call it what one will, it is a poll tax.

Mr. Ralph Howell: Surely the ability to pay should be taken care of by the tax and benefit system. Why should there be two tax and benefit systems?

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I am obliged to my hon. Friend. I shall come to that point. One could say that it should be done through national taxation. However, I am one of those people who, between the ages of 22 and 40 years, when I had the honour to come here was in local government. I believe in government, and I believe in it being local. I believe also that there should be a structure in government that accounts itself to local people and their needs. Therefore, there needs to be a local tax.

In a debate on one of the local government Bills, I suggested to Patrick Jenkin, the then Secretary of State for the Environment, that there was a need for change. I have not had any reason to change the system which I suggested back in 1983 and which I hope the Government will reconsider. It is quite simple. If we believe in a property-owning democracy as I do, that it is right to give between £2·5 million and £3 million of relief to people who own their own homes through mortgage tax relief, as I do, and that possibly the best investment that any person can make is in his own home—I believe that it is— then a property tax should form part of the basis of any form of collecting local revenue.

Therefore, I suggest that we need not to abolish the rating system, but to use the property tax in a rather different way. What we need to do — the Government could even do it—is to say that a property tax may not be increased by more than the rate of inflation without a Government edict. That would be fair. The same applies to the business rate. Because the business man is not represented directly by a local vote, he is represented by us. Therefore, the business rate should not be able to be increased by more than that same factor. In an inflation-proofed rating system that is above the rate support grant, one should get any extra expenditure from a poll tax. That poll tax should be based on nearly everybody except the most impecunious and poor. Everybody, except those people, should pay a poll tax, because it is right that everybody should be involved in, should bear some responsibility for and be willing to vote on what their local council does.

If the whole rating system is swept away and a poll tax is introduced, a vast and heavy burden will result. The system will not work, because it will not be just or based on the ability to pay. It is no good abolishing the whole of the property tax system; the problem will not go away. We are moving along the right lines in changing the system, but we must make it fairer and ensure that the tax can be borne by a greater number of people.

The Government will be out of their tiny mind if they think that they can abolish rates and transfer the burden without taking account of the ability to pay. As the Bill progresses, the Government will merely have to make one exception after another. I am told that London ratepayers cannot bear the full burden. Fine, we shall make an exception for them. Then there will be other exceptions. It is exceptions that make lousy legislation and bad, unjust laws.

Let us change the present system where it bears unfairly only on property owners and use all the benefits and systems of our modern society to ensure that the system is fairer than it is at present to a greater number of people. If we do this together we shall have a fairer system and more people will become involved in local government. Surely, that is what we want in the end.

It is no good any of us thinking that this is like a children's tea party, with everyone gaining. There is not a present for everybody. Some people who have not previously had to pay local taxes will have to pay, and so they should. In the end we want people to feel that, even if they do not like the system, it is just, because a just society is more united and happier than an unjust one. If the Government push through their proposals, the system will not be just, people will not be happy, and it will not work.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) because we have sat on many local government committees together and I hope that we shall sit together on many more. I shall read and analyse his speech carefully. Nobody would deny that the present rating system needs to be reviewed, but the Government's proposed rating system will be equally unfair, if not more so. The hon. Gentleman should note what happened in Scotland, because the poll tax had a great bearing on the election results there. There is great unrest about it throughout the country and among Conservative Members, and the Government should realise full well what is happening.

It is interesting to note that the hon. Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) intervened, because as a farmer he is one of the most privileged people in the country. Farmers do not pay rates. Every hon. Member present in the Chamber except the hon. Gentleman pays rates. His is a privileged position. But I shall not enter into the rates argument—I had that with my local branch of the National Farmers Union during the election. We agreed on many points regarding the necessity of rating and the problems of it for the farming community. The hon. Gentleman will know of those problems and somebody must pay for them.

Mr. Ralph Howell: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman recognises that if agricultural land was rated the price of food would have to rise considerably. That point must be accepted.

Mr. McKay: As well as land, we must consider buildings and other factors.

It would appear from some of the speeches made by Conservative Members today that no one will lose. We have heard about the old lady on her own and the young married couple who will not lose. We have also heard about industry and commerce, which will not lose. Who will pay, if no one is to lose? I am reminded of Paddy's donkey. Paddy had the bright idea that it was costing too much to feed his donkey. He decided that it would be more economical if he cut down on the donkey's food. He discovered that when the donkey reached the stage when it could do without food, it died. That is what will happen to local government. There will be so many cuts that eventually local government will be cut out altogether.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I shall try to help my hon. Friend. Of course we could rate farmers. That would help local authorities, because they could get back some of the £500 million to £1 billion net payments that have been made to the Common Market, most of which is recycled into the pockets of farmers for growing useless cereals or for storing them. It would actually be an advantage to rate the large cereal farmers.

Mr. McKay: I have taken that point up with the National Farmers Union and my local farmers, with whom I have a very good relationship. We are paying the farmers twice, once for growing the cereals, and then by subsiding them to put the crops into intervention. That is a crazy system.

How did the position in local government arise? Committees and Governments of various political persuasions have tried to find an alternative to the domestic rate for many years. They have not found an alternative that is as cheap or as easy to collect as the present system. There is no doubt that Government Committees have shied away from alternatives which were not as cheap or as easy.

The Government have now found a different method, but it will not be as cheap or as easy to collect as the present system. For more than 350 years the rates have been the principal source of local revenue. It will take a very strong case to justify the loss of that experience or the costs that will be incurred. The Government have not made such a case and we need more time to examine the proposals. We need more time than the Government are prepared to allow. Clearly, when the House reassembles in the autumn there will be a major Bill on the community charge, and no doubt that Bill will be in Committee after the Christmas recess.

We all know that there is a case against the present system. The single elderly woman who lives in a large house on her own and who is paying an enormous rate is often quoted. That is what the rate rebate system was brought into being for. Conservative Members go on about people not paying rates and about people receiving rate rebates. The reason why they receive rate rebates is that they simply do not earn sufficient, particularly in low-wage areas. Indeed, if they are earning at all in my area, they are extremely lucky.

We could equally make a case for a childless couple, asking why they should pay towards the education bill when they have no children and are not likely to have any. People with their own transport may ask why they should pay towards a transport system when they do not use or need it. We could go on and on citing reasons why people should not pay rates. People have made the point forcefully.

The problems with the rates have arisen because of the reduction in grant from central Government to local government, which has dropped from 61 to about 46·5 per cent. — and that has caused tremendous problems for local government — and because of the industrial depression.

I think that Conservative Members have got it the wrong way round. They say that industry moved out of areas because of high rates, but those high rates were caused by industries becoming depressed. They closed down; they went bankrupt; they were not earning. The old rateable base disappeared. The few industries that were left took on the burden of the rates that all the industries used to share.

A combination of those two factors — the loss of grant from central Government to local government, and the depression of industry — caused a rate problem, particularly in northern areas. The Government tell local government to cut back on its rate spending, but who are the so-called high-spending authorities, and what are they spending the money on? I do not want to hear about frivolous things such as newspapers. They take a very small percentage of what local authorities spend.

Local government has tried to take on the responsibilities abdicated by central Government. It has tried to take on board the loss of employment and to create employment. It has tried to take on board subsidies for housing, which has been sold off in some areas. Ironically, local government cannot touch that money either. It has been salted away in a bank and cannot be used. If it were released, some spending power would be released for the local authorities.

Those, then, are some of the problems that have been caused, not by local government or by the rating system, but by the deliberate policy of a Conservative Government who have cut back and depressed local areas. Businesses that had taken on the huge burden of industries that had closed called for help, and rightly so. The Government reduced interest rates, abolished the national insurance surcharge, reduced corporation tax and dispensed with wages councils, so wages were lowered. All that was done to help industry, but while that was happening the opposite was happening on the domestic side. Rents and rates were increasing. Now, the Government are trying to turn the burden back from industry and commerce on the on to the domestic ratepayer. Those ratepayers have already been hit, but the Government are saying, "You should help more."

There is little doubt that in my area industrial and commercial rates will be lower. I am not a betting man, but, if I were, I would put money on its not increasing prosperity, jobs or job opportunities. I know that in many cases industry in my area is running on a knife edge, not just because of the rates, but because of energy profits an energy prices. I can point to two firms in the area that are second to none. BXL plastics depends on the prices of oil and other commodities from abroad, and Shaw Carpets also depends considerably on oil produce, the price and the variance between the dollar and the pound. There is no doubt that the alteration in rate will lift the anxiety and the burden, but it will not increase the number of people employed. Only better sales.

Mr. Favell: One of the things that the Government have been trying to do is reduce energy prices—for example, by getting some sense into the coal industry. Reducing the number of people required to produce a ton of coal reduces energy costs. As the hon. Gentleman has suggested, lower energy costs help industry in his area. Why on earth will low rates not also help it? Will they not bring greater prosperity, and also jobs? Jobs, after all, are what we in the north want, not more people employed in the town hall. Where, for instance, is the sense in Manchester employing twice as many people as Stockport to empty a dustbin, when there is not the slightest difference between the two?

Mr. McKay: I cannot comment on what happens in Manchester and Stockport without examining the situation—no doubt there are good reasons for it—but what the hon. Member says about the mining industry and coal prices can be taken a bit further. The Government's policy has increased the rates burden in my area. Nine collieries have been closed. The area depended on the rates from those nine collieries, and the remaining businesses are now having to bear the burden of those closures. Furthermore, if the collieries are not producing coal, the spending power of the miners is also lost.

The domestic rate is now a political issue. Whether one is in or out of work, whether one is rich or poor, young or old, whether one lives in a bungalow or in a castle, everybody will pay the same rate. A person who lives in a bungalow will pay the same rate as somebody who lives in Wentworth Woodhouse. It is crazy to introduce such a system. As the hon. Member for Selly Oak said, we shall have to create exceptions. As soon as the Bill becomes an Act, statutory instruments will have to be introduced to cover those exceptions.

Whenever we alter the law relating to local government, we make it worse. A previous Government decided to abolish the small urban district councils, which were cheap to run and which provided an excellent service. That was when all our troubles began. How will the water and sewerage rates be calculated? The water supplies cannot be metered by next year when this measure is expected to reach the statute book. How, therefore, will water and sewerage rates be calculated? People are worried about this. They know what is to happen.

The poll tax will depress areas that are already depressed and it will place additional burdens on people who are already overburdened. The Bill will be discussed in Committee. The worst that we can do is to try to alter it. The best that we can do is to bury it.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): I thank the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) for initiating this debate. At a time when we can, we hope, still influence Government thinking, it provides us with an opportunity to discuss again the community charge. The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) last addressed the House immediately after I had spoken during the first day of debate on the Loyal Address. And surprise, surprise, we are discussing the same issue tonight. It is opportune to take it a stage further, because matters have moved on since then.

I shall concentrate on the few reasons that have been advanced by my right hon. Friends for introducing this charge. I make it clear, if I need to do so to any hon. Member, that I oppose its introduction. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, for whom I have considerable personal affection, said in a number of interviews that this charge should be introduced because there is no logic in all those who enjoy the same local government services not paying the same charge. It is an interesting theory and at first sight it has a certain superficial attraction.

The principle is that we should pay the same amount for education and social services, regardless of our resources, but why do we not do the same on defence or the Health Service? What is so specal about local government services that they should be funded by a flat rate charge when we are not proposing to extend the same benefit to nationally funded services? The more that one looks at the matter the more one sees the logic of the proposition that we should continue to draw on a property tax, as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) said. Broadly speaking, after income tax and VAT, a property tax is the natural third leg of the tripod. We can argue about the basis for a property tax and whether there should be a revaluation.

If there is not to be a revaluation, I should like to be the first to opt to pay my income tax on the basis of my 1973 earnings. In principle, a property tax is a perfectly reasonable suggestion and we should stick to it.

My experience so far is that not a few people who stand to benefit should the community charge be introduced are embarassed by it and consider it unfair. They have said to me, "It would be nice for me personally, but I do not think that I can justify it when I look at the nature of those who will be paying much more." It is a welcome, although not common, attitude. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary should be aware of that attitude, because it is important. I do not believe that the claim that we should pay an equal amount for the same service stands up, and it is not consistent with the provision of national services.

The residual claim that is increasingly being uttered —occasionally with a note of desperation— is that the community charge proposals were in the manifesto. I commend to hon. Members the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) who last week skilfully made clear his position on the theory of manifesto accountability. He said that he had never believed in it as a reasonable concept. I agree with him.

I was not consulted on the subject, but I opposed the introduction of the community charge in Scotland. My hon. Friends who were in the House before the election may remember how our attitude was conditioned by the approach of our Scottish colleagues, who argued strongly for the community charge in Scotland. I am the last person to deny hon. Members a tax or a piece of legislations that they are seeking, particularly if it does not affect me——

Mr. Caborn: What has happened to them?

Mr. Squire: The hon. Member asks a pertinent if embarrassing question which is not for me to answer but, as he rightly implies, some of my colleagues asked for it.

I am anxious that the political lessons — there is a political dimension in this matter — be learned by the Government before it is too late. Much of the doubt and questioning and many of the fears that have been expressed by Conservatives on this issue have been on the structure of the proposed tax, its innate fairness or unfairness and the relative ease of collection. I urge my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary to bear in mind that, as the weeks and months go by, the political dimension will become stronger.

Because of the nature of any major tax, a number of hon. Friends will be a little embarrassed about its impact. That will not go away. They may not now be involved in our discussions about the fairness or rectitude of such a tax relative to the present form, but they will be involved in its political impact. I judge that they will be involved in a way that will not increase support for the Government's proposals. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to think carefully about this measure.

We are pledged to introduce a fairer charge. I am happy to consider ways of improving the fairness of the payment for local government services. I suggest that, if we embark on the community charge course, there is little room for halfway measures. There are few compromises. There are few ways in which we can get a satisfactory answer if a number of people — perhaps a large number — object to the initial premise. My fear is that the majority of the people will not be convinced, whether in one year or five years, that it is fair for the man in his castle to pay the same as the man in his mid-terrace cottage. Because I believe that, I urge my Government to rethink.

11.6 pm

Mr. Ralph Howell (Norfolk, North): I have listened to many speeches on this subject. Many hon. Members have said that there will be gainers and losers. But there is a way in which we can all be gainers, and that is if local government reduces overmanning. In 1960, 2 million people were employed in local government. There are now 3 million. We argue about how these charges will be levied on the whole population, but we should concentrate our minds on economising in local government and getting value for money. There could be a million fewer people employed in local government. What are they doing? There are virtually no more children to educate or dustbins to empty than 1960; also, there are about five times as many planners as in 1974.

There is much to be said for thinking about the community charge in the way Professor Patrick Minford did in his article in the Daily Telegraph today. He said that, whether we are rich or poor, we pay the same amount for a Mars bar. I am not, however, convinced that the same applies to rates.

Mr. Favell: Why not?

Mr. Howell: I believe that there should be an element of property tax. It should not be charged entirely on property, as at present. I would prefer a halfway house between the two forms of charging. However, I am convinced that there should not be two systems which try to level out income. At present we have the income tax and benefits system to try to redistribute income and also rent rebates. The interaction of those two systems creates many anomalies. We should return to one simple system.

I hope that the Government realise that they will make a great mistake if there are two categories of ratepayers — those who pay 100 per cent. and those who pay 20 per cent. If that is how it will be, I should like my hon. Friend the Minister to tell me whether there will be any taper between 20 and 100 per cent. The publication, "Paying for Local Government", does not make it clear. Nor does it make clear how it is proposed to recover unpaid rates. It says:

> "It is envisaged that the system regulating such deductions will be a simplification of present arrangements for attaching earnings to pay family maintenance or court fines. It will apply to employees, but not to the unemployed, self-employed or retired."

I am self-employed. It is very odd that people in normal employed work will have to pay whereas the others — I should like to know how many they are, but I believe that they number about 13 million — will not pay the full amount.

Is the change worth it if we do not spread its effects across the board evenly and make adjustments for people who are unable to pay in one tax and benefit system?

Mr. Fallon: My hon. Friend is making a good point. If there is to be attachment of earnings on those in employment, why not have attachment of social security benefit for people who are not in employment?

Mr. Howell: The Government must consider that matter, or they run the risk of making a traumatic change and achieving little. If, as I believe will be the case, a vast number of people are left outside the scheme and are therefore not effectively charged, the object of the exercise will be destroyed.

Mr. Caborn: Would the hon. Gentleman like to comment on redistribution through taxation? One of the sources of concern to the north of England, especially in view of its declining industrial base, is the fact that block grant has declined substantially. It has always been argued in local government circles that block grant is a mechanism to redistribute wealth throughout the United Kingdom. One of the major difficulties for the north is the reduction of Government grants. As I tried to explain, the burden is now clearly lodged with the north whereas previously there was much fairer distribution. If it had not been for the reduction in Government assistance, there would not have been the fairly massive increases in rate contributions in the north.

Mr. Howell: I am afraid that I am unable to follow that argument. There has been too much support from the Government and not enough responsibility in local government. The north, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland have had a very good deal; it is the south-east, which creates all the wealth, which has had to pay the bill.

I should like clarification on how married and unmarried couples will be charged. Paragraph 46 of "Paying for Local Government" says:

> "The Government is therefore considering the suggestion that joint and several liability should apply to unmarried couples who live together."

It is about time that the Government knew what they were going to do; otherwise we will have a further attack on the family and married people. I hope that the Minister will be able to assure me that those who are married will not be disadvantaged compared to those who are not married.

11.14 pm

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): There are four people I need to congratulate. The first is my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), on having initiated the debate and, although he is the only person to have done so in the debate, on emphasising the cuts in capital expenditure by local authorities, the effects of which are now being seen more markedly on our council estates. They are starved of capital investment and starved of improvement and are often situated in those difficult areas of the inner city and out city estates. My hon. Friend underlined the extent to which the Government are turning up the fire under the inner-city cauldron by that form of neglect. He also does us a service by initiating not only a debate on the poll tax but a debate in which every speaker since his opening speech has concentrated on that subject. The hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) said that we will return to the subject time and time again. I expect that there is an enormous amount of truth in that.

Secondly, our congratulations go to my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West (Miss Boothroyd), whom we saw in the Chair tonight. I am sure that those congratulations have the endorsement of all hon. Members.

Thirdly, my congratulations go to the two hon. Members who made maiden speeches. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) is clearly a Member of great ability. I understand that he has a great reputation at the Bar and we can look forward to hearing from him again. He rightly turned his attention to the poll tax.

The final congratulations are to my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes), who spoke in an insistent regional accent about the problems of his constituency and about the predicament of a constituency where some of those facts are neither understood nor known to some Members on the Government Benches. He illustrated very well some of the absurd nature of local government finance when he dealt with the financial penalties that will be inflicted upon his council for dealing with the Dronfield fire. I hope that the Minister who is to wind up on the matter will say something about that.

The speeches of the hon. Members for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) and for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) are probably more authentic of the concern of Government Back Benchers than those from some other Government Members. It certainly looks as though the non-ratepaying farmer, the hon. Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell), also is a floating voter on the matter.

Mr. Ralph Howell: I am not sure whether I heard the hon. Gentleman correctly. I thought he said that I was a non-ratepaying farmer. That is not true, and perhaps he could withdraw that.

Mr. Fraser: Of course I withdraw if the hon. Gentleman is a ratepaying farmer. Perhaps many other farmers will now, in their enthusiasm to take part in this exercise of paying for the services which are received, join the hon. Gentleman in that activity.

A cinema in Baker street has become the centre of a cult movie called "The Blues Brothers". I heard somebody on the radio the other day say that they had seen the film over 100 times. The poll tax will achieve that kind of notoriety. The poll tax featured in the opening day of the debate on the Queen's Speech. It was the subject of a large part of the debate on 1 July. I sat through much of the Summer Adjournment debate today, of which the poll tax formed a fairly large element. It has also been adopted as the second debate in this series. I believe that that will be the pattern for the Session, if not for the entire Parliament. I believe that in adopting the poll tax the Government have adopted a legislative albatross that will fly behind them from the beginning to the end of the Parliament.

The case against the poll tax is not that it is a radical change in taxation. Many people would want to see a radical change in local taxation. I do not suppose one could argue, in principle, against the whole of that stated in the 1974 Conservative party manifesto. It said that rates should be replaced by a tax that is more broadly based and related to people's ability to pay. The trouble with the poll tax is that it remembers the first part of the 1974 manifesto but forgets the second.

This tax will be grossly unfair. It is certainly not based on people's ability to pay. The supreme example of that is the Dulwich case. I know it well because the Prime Minister's house is almost next door to the place where I play squash. It is interesting that the Prime Minister chose to move to Southwark. It shows that councils such as Southwark do not seem to act as that much of a disincentive. We find that the Prime Minister's rates, which will be around £3,000 a year, would fall under the poll tax to £1,136 a year. A family of five, living in a Lambeth or Southwark council home, would be paying £3,200 between them. Therefore, the sort of burden that would be borne by the Prime Minister and her husband at present in their Dulwich house would go down by almost £2,000 a year, but the burden borne by people living in a smaller, meaner council house would rise to almost the same figure as the Prime Minister is paying now.

There are many other examples of the tax being wholly unrelated to people's ability to pay. Presently rates are based on roughly on the size of a house and relate roughly — I do not say that the system is perfect — to the affluence of the occupier. However, that would be an even more accurate statement about the burden of rates if the present rateable value system were replaced by a system of valuation which was based on capital values, which is a much more realistic way of assessing the rateable value of property.

Mr. Favell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fraser: I am rather short of time. I mean no discourtesy to the hon. Gentleman, but I want to try to finish by 11.30 pm so that the Minister will have a chance to reply.

The present system has that degree of equity between the affluent and the poorer members of the community. Under the poll tax, four people living in an overcrowded pigsty will pay twice as much community charge as two people living in a palace. The dowager duchess who lives in a mansion will pay as much as the widow who is living in a basement. I realise that that is subject to rebate but, given that the widow is living in a basement is——

Mr. Tim Janman (Thurrock): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fraser: I would rather not. I do not have much time.

Almost invariably with the poll tax, the rich will pay less and the poor will pay more. The papers deposited in the Library showing the comparisons of average rates per household as against the new charge per person mask the inequity because average rates mask the fact that on the whole the rich tend to pay more in rates and the poor tend to pay less.

Apart from looking at it from an individual point of view, ability to pay will be ignored between one area and another.

Mr. Fallon: Has the hon. Gentleman not addressed his mind to the point that I and others have made, that the Prime Minister and her husband are paying tax at a rate much higher than the standard rate? The payment they make through tax is twice what they will be making through the community charge, so their contribution will be much greater than the family next door in the example given by the hon. Member.

Mr. Fraser: I certainly recognise that their tax contribution is high. I do not deny that. Equally, I do not think that the hon. Gentleman will deny that there will be an abrupt and hugely beneficial diminution in the amount of rate burden that they pay as a result of the introduction of the community charge, and that there will be a large increase in the total rate burden that will be borne by much poorer people than they. Let us bear in mind that the percentage of tax that is paid by ordinary working-class people has gone up hugely since the Tory Government got into office.

The next point that I argue is that the poll tax is not only inequitable as between one person and another but does not have regard to ability to pay between one area and another. Deprived areas would be defined as inner-city partnership areas. The definition does not lie for me to make; it is already defined by the Government. I shall gove the House the figures for London. On the Government's own figures, the average rates per head in Hackney, which is the most deprived borough in the country, would be up by £276 per adult. In Lambeth, an inner-city partnership area, the average per head would be up by £259 per person a year. In Islington, another inner-city partnership area, the burden would be up by £206 per head of the population against the average rates per head of the population at the moment. In Southwark, a newly created inner-city partnership area, rates would be up by £269 per head.

We must compare those figures with the most affluent areas of London. In Westminster, the figure would be down by £103 per head; in Barnet, it would be down by £71 per head; in Richmond, it would be down by £51 per head; and, in Bromley it would be down by £26. The House should be aware that the effect is not absolutely even as between rich and poor areas. For Brent's Labour council — it is not the flavour of the month with the Minister or the Government — rates per head will go down under the community charge by £51 per head.

In the local authority that is the flavour of the month —Wandsworth—community charge will lead to a rise of £217 per head per year in the burden of taxation. No wonder we read in this evening's edition of The London Daily News:

> "Local Government Minister Michael Howard is working on a scheme to slowly phase in big bills from ILEA so that Westminster and Wandsworth boroughs have time to opt out of the schooling system."

That was before they realised the huge burden that will fall upon them as a result of the proposals.

Of course, the community charge is equally undemocratic. It will certainly result in under-registration of votes, particularly in areas such as mine where there is already a great deal of under-registration, and the 20 per cent. minimum charge will make the poorest people in our communities hostage to their local authorities, and the charge will be twice as expensive to collect.

One or two hon. Members have referred to the problem of enforcement of the poll tax. I live in an area in which the population changeover in most of the wards is about 27 per cent. a year. I do not know how on earth it will be possible to compile a community charge register and to collect money in a borough that has unemployment running at one in four males. Since the only real sanction among poorer people against failure to pay the poll tax will be prison, I can imagine the Government declaring yet another amnesty in two or three years. They will make available several thousand places in prison for those who do not pay the community charge.

In introducing this measure, the Government have unleashed a spirit which will haunt them from the beginning to the end of this Parliament. My forecast is that the Government will drop the proposed community charge, but, if they do not, their victory on the community charge will, if nothing else happens, herald a defeat for them at the next election.

The Government have go away with actions against the homeless because the homeless are a minority; actions against the unemployed beeause the unemployed and a minority; and action against the poor because the poor are a minority. For the first time they have made the mistake of introducing a measure which has the ability to offend the majority, instead of simply penalising the minority. My view is that this measure is doomed to defeat. But, if I am wrong about that, the Government are doomed to defeat on this issue alone.

11.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Christopher Chope): I join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) on having secured this debate at a relatively reasonable hour. The debate has been notable for the excellent maiden speeches from the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) and the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes). I hope to have time to refer to them later in my speech.

This has been a serious debate about one of the central major reforms being brought forward in this Parliament — the future financing of local government, a system which consumes about one quarter of total public expenditure and touches the life of every citizen. It is not surprising that it warrants serious debate.

After listening to the debate, the question I ask is: do we want local government to have a future? I hope that all those who have participated in the debate would agree with me that we do, but I have to tell hon. Members that many outsiders are fed up with local government as it is now and would like to see it stripped of its revenue-raising powers, with local services adminstered more along the lines of health authorities. As recently as last Friday a letter published in the Financial Times advocated that course of action. It stated:

"So why on earth should local government have separate revenue-raising powers—whether by rates or otherwise? To ensure efficiency, councils should be cost centres with budget allocations made by central government, who in turn levy and collect tax revenue. Giving local authorities a set sum would concentrate their minds wonderfully on setting priorities and getting value for money. And it would quickly allow electors to judge which party could produce most for their money."

I do not agree with that recipe, because I do not believe in the centralisation of power and direction of local government in that way. Hon. Members continue to defend the indefensible in the way that the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) has just been doing. He ignored the fact that Hackney is overspending £513 per adult, referred to Wandsworth, but quietly omitted to refer to the fact that the figures he quoted take no account of the situation where ILEA is overspending by £250 per adult in inner London. That is the extent of overspending against assessed need. If the authorities spent in accordance with their assessed need on the exemplifications for the current year, the community charge would have to be only £178 per adult, and that would be subject to rebate in certain circumstances.

I submit to all true friends of local government that our fundamental reforms of the way in which local government is paid for offer the last hope of saving local government. That may sound dramatic, but it is meant to be. Our system of local government finance is in an advanced state of senility and decay. It is antiquated, arbitrary and incomprehensible.

In preparing for tonight's debate I asked officials to find out the last occasion on which the present system of local government finance received praise in the House. They have not yet come up with the answer, but it must have been many years ago. That is hardly surprising, especially to those of us who have tried to work with the system, either inside local government or in the Department of the Environment. But now that this radical, reforming Government come to change it, we see that the very injustices of the present system have thrown up pressure groups of vested interests prepared to defend those injustices because they are the beneficiaries of them. That is something to which we shall have to pay careful regard in considering how to deal with the issues raised in this very serious debate. It is important that the fact that Hackney is overspending to the massive extent that it is should be brought home to the general public.

I shall briefly remind the House of how the present system operates. It is based upon rateable values — a notional rental value placed upon property. I say "notional" because, with the decline in the private rent sector, it is far from easy to ascertain true rental values. It assumes that differences in rateable value reflect differences in ability to pay. As has already been pointed out, that is clearly a wrong assumption. It is designed to ensure that a standard rate poundage is charged by a local authority for a standard level of service. Therefore, two identical properties in different parts of the country with the same level of local authority service will pay rate bills proportionate to the rateable value.

Those three principles, upon which the present system is based, are flawed and unfair. That is because rateable values take no account of financial status of the householder. For example, the average rateable value of a three-bedroom semi-detached house in Elmbridge in Surrey is £547; in Craven, in north Yorkshire, the same house would have a rateable value of only £188. That means that if both areas provided the same level of local services with the same degree of efficiency, the Elmbridge ratepayer would face a bill three times as large as the person in Craven. There is no reason to believe that the owners of those two houses would have widely different incomes, as income variations across the country are much smaller than variations in rateable value. If the house in Elmbridge is occupied by a widow on her own and the house in Craven is ooccupied by two adult earners the Surrey widow's per capita rate bill is six times that of each adult earner in Craven.

It is clear, therefore, that ability to pay is not reflected in the present system. Those with the lowest incomes presently pay a higher proportion of their income in rates than those with higher incomes because many of the poorest households in this country are single-parent families or single pensioners.

Is the present system fair? I will give way to any hon. Member who thinks that it is.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Mr. Chope: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman, because he suggested, sotto voce, that he would not seek to intervene on the point on which I invited intervention. In the short time that I have left, I hope to deal with the points that he raised earlier.

If we go to a system of revaluation, which is the proposition of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) — and I admire him for his courage in putting it forward — and if that were to reflect the massive changes in turbulence in the capital values of houses currently taking place, there would be consequences for him and his constituents that I doubt he has fully considered. According to the recent Halifax Building Society house price index, house prices have risen nationally by 47·3 per cent. over the past four years, but they have risen by 95·6 per cent. in the Greater London area. Therefore, if there were the same system of equalisation of rate poundages, based upon a system of rateable values based on capital rating revaluation, it would result in massive increases in rate bills in the south-east and London and reductions in rate bills in the north. In the example that I quoted, I have shown that currently the system is loaded in favour of those in the north and against those in the south.

Mr. Squire: As a former chairman of the finance committee of a large local authority when the previous revaluation took place, I am aware of the impact of such a measure. I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that a revaluation is neutral and that the significant factor is what a council does with the revised poundage. It is possible to build in safety nets to prevent excessive increases in any one year.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry), in an excellent speech, anticipated my hon. Friend's intervention. My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury talked about the consequences of a revaluation in Scotland after only seven years, when the valuation of an ordinary house increased from £171 to £726. Opposition Members and some of my hon. Friends think that the electoral difficulties that the Conservative party experienced in Scotland were the result of the Government's proposals to introduce a community charge. At the time of the revaluation in Scotland the popularity of the Conservative party had declined to about 13 per cent., but by the time of the general election it had risen to about 24 per cent. I have little doubt that by the time the much fairer community charge comes into operation, our popularity in Scotland will have increased even more.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Chope: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman, because only a short time remains available to me to reply to the debate.

The present rating system is short on accountability. Councils have the power to increase spending without the responsibility of being properly accountable to those who pay. The non-domestic ratepayer — whether the huge multinational or the cornershop — provides more in rate income than all domestic ratepayers put together. If we add to that grants from national taxpayers, we find that about three quarters of local authority revenue comes from those with no local vote. The problem goes much deeper than that, because, of 35 million adults in England, only 18 million are heads of households directly liable to pay rates, of whom only 12 million pay rates in full. There are 3 million who receive partial assistance with their rates and the remaining 3 million receive full relief from their rates bill. In Liverpool, only one voter in four pays rates directly and in full. In Manchester the proportion is even less.

Those figures speak for themselves. A system has developed in which the majority of the electorate can vote for services which they will either not pay for or pay only a small contribution towards. The opportunity that the system presents for abuse is being exploited by the most irresponsible councils. By their actions, they have brought, and are bringing, local government into disrepute.

I shall refer briefly to the two maiden speeches this evening. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East paid a generous tribute to his predecessor, Barry Henderson, whose comradeship and company my right hon. and hon. Friends and I certainly miss. The hon. Gentleman's comments struck a chord with all those who enjoyed the time when Barry was a Member of this place. We look forward to his early return.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East referred to my old university and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon), whose excellent speech I have not had the time to take up and do justice to in replying to the debate. It is notable that the fine university of St. Andrew's, despite having a lower Government subsidy now, is doing better than ever before as a result of the long-established principle of self help. I agree with the hon. Member for Fife, North-East that the rating system is thoroughly discredited, but I cannot agree that the only fair system would be a local income tax. Such a tax would be a disaster. It would be fiendishly complicated to administer, there would be only 20 million taxpayers and there would have to be an extremely complicated register. I am informed that it would increase income tax by anything between 4p and 11p in the pound, thereby exacerbating unemployment and the poverty trap. It would drive those in work out of the inner cities and be a recipe for even greater dereliction and despair.

The hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East paid a fitting tribute to his predecessor, Ray Ellis. He referred to the mining industry and tantalised us by referring to three hon. Members who were his pupils when he was a school teacher. I hope that we shall be able to guess in due course who they are.

The hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East referred to Claire Staines and asked when her father would be able to get a job. If we bring in the unified business rate, rates in north-east Derbyshire will be reduced by almost 26 per cent., and that will provide a boost to employment opportunities in the area. I think that it is disappointing that the hon. Gentleman did not find time to include that in his speech.

Sadly, I do not have time to deal with all the other issues that have been raised in the debate.

Mr. Dalyell rose

Mr. Chope: I refer the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) to the yellow booklet, "Paying for Local Government: The Community Charge", published by the Department of the Environment and the Welsh Office. If the hon. Gentleman reads that carefully, he will discover that it contains most, if not all, of the answers to the questions that he raised in the debate tonight.

British Sugar Beet Quota

11.45 pm

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): It was with some relief that I learnt that the subject that I had chosen had come third in the batting order and we still had not reached midnight before we started this debate.

My purpose in raising the question of the United Kingdom sugar beet quota is to give strength to the elbow of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the next round of negotiations gets under way later this year for new quota levels. As my right hon. Friend was involved in the last set of negotiations, he will recall that quotas were fixed up until 1988 only so that developments in sugar consumption and distribution of producer levies could be assessed. As the Commission is expected to put forward its proposals in September and the House is about to adjourn for the summer, now is the appropriate time for the House to make its views known.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will be aware that the present distribution of quota reflects the negotiations between the original six members of the European Community. That quota has never been fully revised to take account of United Kingdom membership. It is also worth noting that major sugar exporters, such as Belgium and France, have quotas equivalent to twice their domestic consumption. The United Kingdom must make do with a quota equal to only half its consumption.

United Kingdom sugar beet growers also recall that, at the review in 1981, they lost the ability to grow beet to the extent of more than 182,000 tonnes of sugar — a reduction of 13·7 per cent. Although it is correct that until that time the United Kingdom sugar beet industry did not fulfil its quota, for a variety of reasons, the substantial investment made by the industry in the past 10 years has meant that the United Kingdom quota has been met in full every year since 1981. There is now capacity to produce 1·5 million tonnes. Moreover, British Sugar is arguably the most cost-efficient producer in Europe.

In the light of that and the geographical factor that British Sugar is located in one of the few countries in which there is likely to be a substantial increase in sugar usage by the chemical industry, surely it is right to argue for the introduction of a margin of flexibility in the quota system to allow for differing efficiencies and demand prospects, and to reflect British circumstances.

With regard to demand prospects, the United Kingdom has one of the largest chemical industries in Europe. It is a world leader in the development of biotechnology. I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that biotechnology is one of the leading edge technologies in which an advanced industrial nation such as Britain cannot afford to fall behind.

It is clear that the European Commission recognises the importance of encouraging biotechnology, from the introduction of its scheme to make sugar available at close to world prices for new chemical industry developments. As anticipated, the chemical industry has waited for the greatest price reductions before buying sugar in any quantity. That quantity is now starting to increase.

The European chemical industry forecasts a sixfold increase from the present sugar usage of 80,000 tonnes annually to a new level of 500,000 tonnes in the early 1990s. The Chemical Industries Association Limited has estimated that its current usage of 25,000 tonnes will increase to 150,000 during the same period.

I believe that ICI is investigating the feasibility of a plant in Britain to manufacture biodegradable plastic, and that Sturge is currently investing some £30 million in a new citric acid manufacturing facility at Selby in Yorkshire. Other plans for diversification by British Sugar, using sugar as a base, are as widespread as to include animal and food proteins, biodegradable plastics, polymer bulking agents, natural flavours, natural pharmaceuticals and substitutes for oil-based materials used in the production of polyurethane and bakelite.

As a major part of Europe's biotechnical research takes place within the United Kingdom, it will be especially galling if, as a consequence of there being no spare domestically produced sugar, the actual physical facility for making the product of that research is to end up being located other than in the United Kingdom. Given the size of the potential investment, the fear must be that the chemical industry will locate bulk manufacturing facilities on the continent, where there is a great deal of spare sugar. Apart from the high unit values low volume products, the industry will not be able to afford to transport sugar from the continent because of the significance of the sugar costs in the final pricing of the high volumes low unit value bulk products. Again, from a security of supply standpoint, the United Kingdom chemical industry would not want to be dependent on imported sugar when, by locating in France or Belgium, it can be assured of as much sugar as it will need.

On the distribution of producer levies, it is clear that the present position is grotesquely inequitable to the United Kingdom. As the United Kingdom does not export any of its domestically produced quota sugar, which attacts an export refund, the United Kingdom industry receives no rebate or return on its levy payments. Such exports as the United Kingdom industry makes are re-exports of sugar that has already been imported from the continent. Although statistically it has been needed for the United Kingdom sugar users, who themselves need to be assured of the continuity of supply. Therefore, in effect the United Kingdom's levy payments go to finance the export of surplus sugar by the Community's net sugar exporters, France, Belgium, Germany the Netherlands and Denmark.

Our United Kingdom levies represent a transfer from Britain, whose beet quota is equivalent to only half its consumption, to countries such as France and Belgium, whose quotas are twice their consumption. Britain does not contribute to the Community's surplus of quota sugar, but ends up paying some 9 per cent. of the levies raised from the EEC sugar industry, whereas Belgium, for example, produces 14·5 per cent. of the surplus, while paying only 7·5 per cent. of the producer levies. That is the basis of assessing the United Kingdom's position as being grotesque in respect of producer levies.

It is interesting to note the tight position of the United Kingdom's supply position for sugar. In recent years, as British Sugar has demonstrated its ability consistently to fulfil its production quotas, industrial sugar users have felt able to reduce their requirements for sugar imported from the rest of the continent and the Community. In the past five years that has halved to just over 80,000 tonnes, and over the same period there has been a dramatic reduction in the "free" sugar stocks in Britain, from almost 200,000 tonnes to an anticipated 49,000 tonnes at the end of this season. As a result, British Sugar tells me that it is operating with barely adequate stocks to cover normal demand before the new season's crop becomes available. To put that into context, that anticipated 49,000 tonnes is equivalent to about one week's sugar consumption. That is hardly an adequate safety margin.

What is boils down to is that the tightness of the United Kingdom's supply situation for sugar means that their is no scope for supplying new chemical industry demands from domestic production without taking sugar from existing users. This has to be an unacceptable position for the United Kingdom to be placed in.

Reasonable fears have been expressed that an increase in the United Kingdom sugar beet production would prejudice the position of African, Caribbean and Pacific sugar in the British market. While it is interesting to note that five of the 16 ACP states with current sugar quotas must import sugar from the world market in order to release their domesic product to fulfil their preferential quotas in the EEC, it is also the case that the ACP quota has been enshrined in the Lomé Convention and can be changed only by political decision by all signatories to the convention. It is also the case that the British beet quota is being fully filled by domestic production, with there being yet additional capacity.

However, it is important to point out that an increase in the United Kingdom quota to cater for the needs of the emerging bio-technical industries depends on the continuation of the ACP quota at its current level. If the quota decreases, any increase in the beet quota will have to be diverted to traditional sugar users to make up the shortfall, thus destroying the security of supply that the chemical industry will require if it is to set up plants in the United Kingdom in the first place.

British Sugar has assured the Government that it will export any new quota sugar for which the expected increase in chemical industry demand has not yet come through. It would not be placed on the British market so as to weaken the position of ACP sugar. British Sugar's track record on exports is encouraging, in that during the early 1980s a surplus in the United Kingdom market brought about by imports from the continent was successfully exported by British Sugar without disturbing the position of ACP sugar in the market.

The value of a comparatively small increase in the United Kingom sugar beet quota is considerable to the United Kingdom. In industrial terms, the bio-technology prize must not be allowed to slip away. In agricultural terms, sugar beet production is the second most profitable, large-scale arable crop and is the most consistent in its profitability. It forms an alternative to other crops, which is of inestimable value for the rural economy. Many hon. Members present have constituents such as mine which depend on the continued development of the sugar beet crop and they would welcome the ability to produce a little more.

In employment terms, it is interesting to note that the University of East Anglia estimates that for each job in British Sugar another seven jobs are supported in the rest of the economy, and that for every 100 tonnes included in the quota, three jobs will be created. That shows that if we could get a further 150,000 tonnes, another 4,500 jobs in the sugar industry would be created even before we consider the ramifications for the biotechnological industries.

In terms of fairness in respect of the levy position, the case for an increase is, again, strong. The decision in 1985 to fix quotas up to 1988 only has, in the light of developments both in the market and technology, been shown to have been right. Now is the time to ensure that the United Kingdom has a fair opportunity to share in these developments as they progress, and a relatively modest increase in quota will be helpful in achieving just that. I know that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary and our right hon. Friend the Minister will be determined to address this problem in the negotiations to come.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): I should like to stress the need for the extra quota of 150,000 tonnes to come to the United Kingdom. No hon. Member can be unaware of the problems facing agriculture in all sorts of ways or of the problems of surplus and the need for us to find alternative crops. Farmers desperately need to grow a crop which they can grow well, which is not in surplus and which has great potential. So far as I can see, sugar beet appears to fit the bill.

I am greatly concerned at the moment about agriculture in general, because I think that the industry has reached a point at which it will have to decide what direction it must take. I believe that all industries go forward or backward and they rarely stay in the same place for very long. Agriculture is now in grave danger. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) has explained, so much in the rural areas depends on agriculture, not just directly on farming, but on all the associated industries. It is crucial that farming should continue and it is no more crucial than in the area that I represent and in East Anglia where farmers are very worried about the direction which farming might take.

Agriculture has been an object lesson in efficiency and it stands comparison with any other industry. I want to refer to my experience in the sugar beet industry. I do not know how many other hon. Members share my experience, but I remember many years ago walking behind a sugar beet drill as the seeds were put in and the drill was drawn by a marvellous grey Percheron. Grey I may be, but I am not too old to remember that; indeed, it did not happen so long ago. That gives us some idea of the strides made by the industry, which is the most efficient in Europe and probably the most efficient in the world.

Like an efficient engine, I believe that the industry is now up against the buffers of the common agricultural policy and it badly needs new outlets and ideas. We cannot get away from the fact that the medium in which agriculture works is soil. Farmers must grow crops. Yes, there may be alternative enterprises such as forestry and woodland and nothing could be nearer to my heart with my experience and fondness for trees than for us to grow more trees in this country. That is a good idea, but it is a long-term prospect. Other enterprises must also be considered because farmers now must consider themselves as business men as well as farmers. They must apply themelves to other alternatives and I am sure that they are doing that. Unless large quantities of land are taken permanently out of agriculture for housing, which on any kind of scale would be extremely ill-advised, land must grow crops.

[Mr. Michael Lord]

The combination of the new biotechnology involving sugar capable of giving us biodegradable products is heaven-sent for those of us who care about the environment, commerce and jobs. The developments are extremely exciting for both those areas and we must grasp the opportunities with both hands.

I want to consider briefly the question of fairness. My hon. Friend the Member for Hereford drew the Minister's attention to the history of quotas and the present imbalances and inequalitities in the EEC. Nothing incenses our farmers more than a sense of injustice and that sense of injustice is all too often engendered by the machinations of the CAP. I understand the great difficulties facing the Minister, given the overall surplus of sugar in the EEC. I urge the Minister and his team to fight for our farmers, for fairness and for an increased quota when they go to Europe.

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): As far as I am aware, there are no sugar beet growers in Wales—although there may be a few. Many of us who farm in the Principality, however, are dependent on sugar beet to feed our sheep in the winter. It has proved a very successful method of feeding them during the hard months that we get on the hills.

My purpose in taking part in tonight's debate is to support the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd), who, I think, has made a very good plea on behalf of this country's sugar beet growers. I should like to ask the Minister a few probing questions. Many farmers in west Wales are very worried about the present milk quotas. They believe that British farmers are not competing on equal terms. I want to ask the Minister this question: do British sugar beet growers compete on equal terms with their counterparts in the EEC?

I believe that the Minister's negotiations and deliberations will succeed in persuading the other EEC Ministers to give British farmers an extra quota. But let me ask a question similar to those I have asked on milk before. If a young farmer in this country was very keen to start growing sugar beet, is there a quota that he could get from the British Sugar Corporation? I believe that there are many young entrants into farming, and that we should be able to help them. There should be an extra quota somewhere within the system to help youngsters who want to start on their own.

However, the main question is parity within the Community. I hope that, by saying a few words tonight, those of us who are far away from the sugar beet growing area of this country can help those who, one day, may in turn help the dairy farmers of west Wales when they too are in need.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) has correctly identified the problem that my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) so ably outlined in his excellent introductory speech. I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important debate.

We have had the opportunity from time to time to consider sugar beet production in this country, and I have had the privilege of addressing the house on the subject before. I now have interests to declare: the British Sugar Corporation factory in Brigg, which is the largest employer of labour in the town, and the large number of sugar beet farmers in my constituency. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford said, for every one person employed in a British Sugar Corporation factory, up to seven jobs have been derived in the country's sugar factories. Sugar beet farming is an important part of the rural economy for many of us who are here this evening.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North made a very important point. I have a table, of which my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary who, I am delighted to see, will respond to the debate will be aware. It is a simple chart showing EEC beet sugar production quotas as a proportion of consumption by member states. The figure that jumps out at me this is something that I have never been able to understand is the quota in the United Kingdom: 1,144,000 tonnes of white sugar. Yet United Kingdom consumption is 2,256,000 tonnes. Quota represents only 50·7 per cent. of consumption. I am referring to beet sugar. However, as a percentage of consumption, the quota is 222 per cent. In France it is 199·5 per cent. Therefore, the case for a fair deal for the British sugar producer, sugar beet farmer and sugar factories is overwhelming. Britain is producing only 50 per cent. of its sugar quota. Therefore, equity demands that British Ministers should speak up for the British sugar beet industry in the European Community. When the United Kingdom quota is renegotiated, it is imperative that British Ministers should bang the table hard for the United Kingdom sugar producer and the beet farmer.

My hon. Friends have already said that the sugar beet industry's request is for a modest increase of 150,000 tonnes in the United Kingdom quota. Ministers should put such a reasonable and modest demand before the Council of Ministers on the ground that, in equity, the imbalance in the United Kingdom's quota, compared with the rest of Europe, should be rectified. Indeed, it is vital that Ministers should do so because the United Kingdom is the only major European Community country whose sugar beet production quota is less than its sugar consumption.

Even allowing for imports of ACP sugar, the United Kingdom is barely self-sufficient at the existing levels of sugar consumption. However, the United Kingdom is facing an important increase in sugar consumption, because of the needs of the chemical industry, based on its European leadership in biotechnology. I enjoy the privilege of having an ICI subsidiary factory in my constituency. Together with other chemical industries in this country, ICI wants to play a leading role in biotechnology. However, it must know that beet sugar will be available so that it may make the long-term investment that is required. The United Kingdom has been denied the marginal increase in its sugar quota that it needs to meet this genuine new demand, while other EEC countries, whose needs are not so great, had major surpluses of quota sugar which had to be exported. The United Kingdom was obliged to fund those exports through its producer levy contributions.

The United Kingdom sugar beet industry is looking for fair treatment in Europe so that it is not denied the opportunity to create a new chemical industry, based on biotechnology at home. I join my hon. friends and the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North in asking the Minister, who is a first-rate Minister, and his colleagues in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who have done a superb job on behalf of British agriculture in the past, to ask for a modest quota increase of 150,000 tonnes to cater for this new use.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) declared his interest, largely in a sugar beet refinery. As a constituency Member, I must declare mine. The cane sugar refinery at Silvertown in Newham, east London, refines no fewer than 1 million tonnes of cane sugar a year, which is nearly equivalent to the whole of the beet sugar production, approximately 1.2 million tonnes.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), who represents the only other cane sugar refinery in the United Kingdom, would have been here tonight, but unfortunately he is unwell. His case would have been similar to mine.

The hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) asked why we produce only half the sugar that we consume. The answer is that historically – and I believe rightly – there has been a national policy since the early 1930s to produce sugar in this country from sugar beet instead of relying wholly, as we did, on Commonwealth imports. That balanced arrangement continued successfully until 1974, when, having entered the EEC the year before, the Commonwealth sugar arrangement fell and new arrangements had to be made. The quota arrangements, of which Conservative Members have made some justifiable criticisms, came into vogue at that time.

I shall now make a point with which I am sure Conservative Members will agree. Britain is the only country in the EEC that imports large quantities of cane sugar. France imports only a small amount from its Departement Outre Mer, which for fixing purposes is part of domestic France, although that is the West Indies. We do that for a number of reasons. First, we do it as a moral responsibility to our overseas partners in the Commonwealth and the Third world. That is recognised throughout the EEC, and I am glad to see Conservative Members nodding in agreement. It is an undertaking on behalf of the EEC, although we have a part to play in it.

Employment in the cane sugar refining industry in the ports has been reinforced by two resolutions of the House: first, on 11 November 1974; and secondly in December 1985. The first resolution emphasised:

"The continued existence of and employment in the port sugar refining industry of the United Kingdom, or for securing long-term supplies of domestically refined cane sugar at a fair price to consumer and producer."

That was reinforced by a resolution of the House on 2 December 1985 in an amendment that was moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow to "take account of the interests of both producers and users of the products concerned and fulfil the objectives set out in the Resolution of the House relating to sugar supplies of 11 November 1974."

The hon. Member for Hereford dwelt on this matter and rightly reminded the House that part of the Lomé arrangement – it is an adjunct to the renewable treaty – is the arrangement to which I have referred.

The problem with what Conservative Members have said is that there appears to be a statistical imbalance between what is open to British agriculture and what is open to the French in particular. The problem is compounded by the figures. As I understand it, EEC production of beet sugar is about 13.6 million tonnes in white sugar equivalents, but the consumption, including that of the United Kingdom, is only 10.6 tonnes. In other words, there is a surplus production of about 3 million tonnes, which is just under three times the amount of imported cane sugar. While there is criticism from some European beet farmers of cane imports, it is a relatively small proportion, not only of the consumption of the EEC but of the total available surplus.

The problem is how to maintain our moral responsibility and the long-term agreement to which we are all committed; provide pricing arrangements for the refiner's margin and the extra cost of shipping the cane from places such as Fiji, Mauritius, Jamaica and other Commonwealth friends, and at the same time make that sugar marketable at a price that is comparable to the beet price in European and United Kingdom markets. That is one of the other aspects of the matter that the Minister will have to see to. Not only is he battling for greater beet quotas; he is having to follow that resolution of the House and the moral responsibility to which the EEC agrees to ensure the refiner's margin. The Minister is aware of that, and the debate is not specifically about cane sugar, so I shall not pursue that matter. I am sure that the Minister will renew the Government's commitment to maintain that margin so that the structure continues.

Conservative Members who represent beet-growing areas put the case fairly in some respects. We must recognise that there is a certain resistance, perhaps from those who ultimately pay or consume, to increasing the amount of beet sugar that goes into chemical stock above the present surplus. Some people might think that it is not good policy, especially in the northern parts of Europe, where there is less sunshine, to grow beet sugar that is refined, at some expense, and then becomes chemical feedstock. This is a little unusual from the point of view of conservation and, ultimately, of the good use of land. I know that there are surpluses, but Conservative Members face the problem of persuading our continental "partners" that it is their surplus that should be used for that burgeoning chemical use about which we have all heard, and that they should voluntarily transfer some of their surplus beet production to the United Kingdom.

Why would those continental countries give up any of their existing national quotas to increase United Kingdom acreage when they already have a surplus? In equity, of course, they should, but I suppose that equity is the United Kingdom's strongest argument. The EEC is on a ratchet. The answer to the questions aked by some Conservative Members lies in the fact that, even before Britain became a member of the EEC, the Agriculture Ministers built in a surplus when the beet quotas were agreed. Instead of each national arrangement balancing out, as the United Kingdom's wisely did under the Williams arrangements from the 1930s, other countries, especially France, had a surplus that was built in by a political arrangement. I believe that the facts will show that that is so. It is at least an argument why, in equity, British beet producers should share in the ill-distribution made at the beginning, especially as we are discharging our responsibility, and wish to continue to do so, to the Third world and our Commonwealth colleagues.

The moral commitment to the Third world is shared by us all. The pricing arrangements to assure the margin for cane sugar refiners at the ports and the price paid to our Commonwealth producers so that they can continue to produce must be viable. It is no use having a quota of 1·3 million tonnes if the price prevents our Commonwealth colleagues from producing. At the same time, we should promote an agricultural regime that is equitable in the sense that I have outlined. I hope that in Brussels the Minister will respond to his hon. Friend's requests and ensure that the refiners' margin and the price paid, not only in this quinquennium but in those that follow, enable the resolutions of the House to be fulfilled.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): This is a splendid opportunity to get over the point about biotechnology and the need to increase quotas. We are all here to support our industry, to back Britain and to ensure that, where there is inequity, it is overcome. We know that there are historical reasons for it, but Belgium and France seem to have huge production quotas in proportion to demand which seems unfair.

I was interested to hear what the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) said about the increase in demand from biotechnology, which uses sugar for chemical non-food processes. I hope that developments proceed successfully in Britain. I wonder whether there is too much optimism about biotechnology as the EC proposals amount to only 300,000 tonnes by 1992, which is a tiny increase. There are problems to overcome in biotechnology, but I am glad to hear that we have a British company doing research.

Although the rate of development might not be as rapid as many people expect, the opportunity for job creation is important and welcome. I wondered whether there was some devious motive behind the debate, but the hon. Member for Hereford made a straightforward case. I am anxious that there should not be pressure on ACP imports of cane sugar in the negotiations.

The ACP countries depend on exports of about 1.1 million tonnes of cane to the EC for a considerable amount of foreign exchange. They are principally the West Indies, Fiji and Mauritius. I should like the Minister to give a commitment that nothing in the negotiations could lead to that figure being reduced. I appreciate that the levels were established under Lomé, but I should like an assurance that the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the EC are not thinking along those lines.

Mr. Michael Brown: I can probably reassure the hon. Gentleman. He will probably realise that the Lomé convention can be changed only with the agreement of all the signatories to the convention. That may give him the reassurance that he seeks.

Mr. Randall: I appreciate that that is the mechanism, but all things can be changed. I ask the Minister for an assurance that that sort of activity, or the lifting of the foundation stones, will not take place because of the inequities that exist and, therefore, the pressures from our own industry. My main concern is for the ACPs, the poorer countries of the Third world, and whether we are being optimistic about the effect of biotechnology and of those small quota arrangements.

British Sugar has had a superb opportunity to put its case. A company does not usually have the opportunity of having a one-and-a-half hour debate on a matter of this sort. Obviously everyone except myself has been briefed up to the eyeballs. The important thing is to make sure that we back our own industry and that opportunities are created for developing it. The Opposition will be supporting it.

12.30 am

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): We all share the concern voiced by the hon. Members for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) and for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) about the ACP or Third-world countries. We realise that there is a moral and legal obligation towards them, but one thing that stands out sharply, which was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd), is that, of the 16 ACP countries, five have to import sugar from the world market to match their share of EC quota. That is outrageous and something ought to be done about it. When the Minister winds up, I hope that he will be able to deal with that. Why are we being so weak and pathetic over that matter? It is costing many jobs in this country. We obviously have that moral obligation. No one here wants to sabotage the Lomé convention. We realise the importance of it, particularly so far as jobs in Newham, South are concerned. I have a sugar factory in my constituency, and I was interested to hear the figures given by the hon. Member for Newham, South.

I join my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford on securing the debate.

I do not think that we have been briefed up to the eyeballs. I certainly have not been briefed at all. I do not know where the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West got the idea that it was all a put-up job. Certainly the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford made about the number of jobs being created being a factor of seven for every job in British Sugar would mean that in my constituency British Sugar either directly or indirectly in the past 20 years or so, has created more than 1,400 jobs, which is a very considerable input into the local economy. That shows how important the whole area is to Norfolk, and to west Norfolk in particular where many small farmers at the moment rely to a large extent on sugar beet. I am talking about the smaller farmers because the larger farmers certainly have more of a cushion to survive difficult times. People seem to think of Norfolk as being a county of large farmers, but there are many small farmers who rely to a considerable degree on sugar beet. If they could be allowed to grow just a little bit more, it would make a tremendous difference.

We had an interesting tour de force by my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord), who took us down memory lane. My memory does not extend that far, although the grey hairs are coming. It was a thoughtful and penetrating speech that reflected the concern of many of us on the Government side of the House for farmers in our constituencies, who are the fabric of rural constituencies, and for jobs in rural areas. Even in Norfolk where there are many light manufacturing industries and where there is a big growth in the service and tourist sectors, a large number of jobs are still totally dependent on agriculture. We have heard of many different schemes and ideas. My hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central mentioned some of the ideas put forward by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. One thing that it could do that would make a profound difference to the confidence of farmers throughout the country especially in areas where a lot of sugar beet is grown would be to increase, even modestly the United Kingdom quota. I hope that the Minister will take that on board. At one stroke he could achieve an enormous amount. In that one small stroke he could achieve more than would be achieved by any number of set asides, schemes to encourage forestry or schemes to encourage amenity and small businesses in rural areas, laudable though those schemes may be. I urge that on him to a great extent.

The case is strong. One has to bear in mind the points that have been made already about where the United Kingdom stands in relation to other European countries. My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes quoted an interesting set of figures. I do not know where he got the table from. He must be the only one who came here with a brief. The figures show the disadvantage at which the United Kingdom finds itself. We must bear in mind the fact that in 1981 the United Kingdom suffered a cut on the most spurious of grounds. I have never quite been able to work out why the United Kingdom suffered that cut. However, it was manifestly unfair, and surely now the time has come to reverse that.

The hon. Member for Newham, South mentioned the dilemma in which the EEC finds itself in terms of equity and how it would be equitable for European farmers to give up quota to the United Kingdom. That is probably pie in the sky. However, if there is an increase in quotas overall it will not cost the EEC anything at all. Of all the agricultural regimes in the common agricultural policy, the one that is totally self-financing is the sugar beet regime. Therefore, a small increase for the United Kingdom, and perhaps a small increase for other EEC countries, would not cost the national taxpayer or the EEC taxpayer one penny. The regime has been cleverly tailored so that it is entirely self-financing.

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Gentleman may be correct, but I understood that there was a storage levy. If there is greater production of beet in the whole Community, the levy for overall storage from one campaign to the next might will go up. I may be wrong about that. I am willing to concede that in terms of export restitution it is different, but there is quite a bit of public money involved if one looks at the matter in overall terms.

Mr. Bellingham: I do not know the exact answer to that. The Minister may be able to put us right but my understanding is that, given the situation raised by the hon. Member for Newham, South, it would be British Sugar that would be paying more. It would greatly reduce its overall profit.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): It is a producer levy.

Mr. Bellingham: My hon. Friend is right. The taxpayer would not have to dip into his pocket any more if there was an increase in quota.

The points about the chemical and biochemical industry have been made clearly. There is a great opportunity for the United Kingdom in biotechnology. If plants were located away from the United Kingdom in Europe on account of that fact that there was not a ready supply of sugar available on the doorsteps of the plants that would be a tragedy. I understand that the United Kingdom Chemical Industries Association has predicted a six-fold increase in the need for sugar from roughly 15,000 tonnes to getting on for over 125,000 tonnes per year by 1991. That is a big increase.

On all those points we have a strong case. I join hon. Members in urging the Minister to push the United Kingdom case as hard as possible. He should kick over traces, sit on the table—not break it—and do his best to put the case for the United Kingdom farmer. He should bear in mind that he could do more good by a modest increase in the United Kingdom beet quota than a whole panoply of other measures. I hope that he takes that on board.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): I begin my remarks by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) on introducing the debate, on his timing and on the substance of his speech. It is appropriate that we should encourage the Government to address such matters in good time before the negotiations take place and before the Commission makes its proposals. I, too, say to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) that the House has no interest in creating a conflict of interest between beet growers and the cane industry. It is essential to proceed on the basis of mutual interest.

As to who was or was not briefed, there may have been certain domestic difficulties to be sorted out amongst Opposition Members. I do not know whether that had anything to do with the matter. My basic interest derives from some years back through my having worked with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food as its special advisor. Some hon. Members will know that I am also a farmer, but I am not a beet farmer. My family gave up beet farming roughly at the time when my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) was plodding behind his Percheron. We cut the beet tops off by hand, but we gave it up a long time ago.

I hope that it reinforces the points that need to be made if I tell the House that we in Daventry have a virtually insignificant constituency interest in beet growing, lying as we do between the eastern factories of Peterborough and the west midlands. Little beet is grown at any one time in my patch. Nevertheless, for many reasons, we have a proper interest in the subject of the debate. The first reason, as some hon. Members have said, relates to employment, which affects us all. The second reason is the importance of creating and sustaining as many hectares of arable land for alternative uses to cereal production as we possibly can. That goes to the heart of the need to expand our beet quota when we can do so.

There are two specific points. The first was eloquently touched upon by the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells). He mentioned the benefits to the farming and livestock industry, which is of interest to me also, in having a supply of beet pulp. British Sugar is the third largest manufacturer of animal feedstuffs in the country—that fact surprised me—and about 85 per cent. of its total production now goes outside beet growers to other livestock farmers. It is as important to my farmers as it is for people in the eastern counties that as much feed as possible should be available. It is an excellent feed.

It is important for the whole industry to draw on the example of plants such as the ABR chemicals plant at Corby, which is just outside my constituency. That plant, is able to use modern technology to separate wheat feedstock, make the best product and add value to it. That is highly relevant to increasing farmers' returns and the saleability of their product. As in Corby, modern developments in biotechnology in beet production, sugar and related products are highly relevant to the tenor of agriculture.

There is an unfortunate background to the negotiations. At the time of the 1980 negotiations and the 1981 quota quinquennium, this was the worst possible background against which to conduct a European negotiation. There were two reasons: first, we tended to decline as a producing country during the immediately preceding years, and we threw away one of our negotiating counters. Secondly, at that time and since, a high proportion of the European beet crop had to be exported. Therefore, it was a natural ploy that was carried out, to deprive us of a proportion of our quota. The industry has not yet recovered from that blow.

In the meanwhile, we have two major encouraging changes in the situation. First, the British beet industry and sugar industry have had good performances over the past quinquennium in fulfilling their quota, increasing their productivity and reducing their costs. The second change, which we should take back to Europe, is that we now find the potential for an enlargement of the whole market.

When I was in MAFF I was worried about the impact of concern about diet and health on the consumption of raw sugar. It now seems to have stabilised in a healthy way and there is the possibility of an additional demand for new uses. Europe recognised the new situation to some extent by the introduction last year of provisions for chemical sugar, which recognises the principle that new industries based on new technology should, wherever possible, take place and be founded within the Community, rather than abroad, exporting products into the Community.

We are asking the Government to work on behalf of the industry to see that Britain gets its proper share of the action of these new developments. Nobody can be certain of the exact level or timing of them—it may well be that quotas will have to be adjusted or modified as they develop. We cannot anticipate how far they will go. If they go slowly, there must be some scope for modulation, but the principle must be established that we need to go forward as the European sugar industry goes forward.

We have two powerful moral claims on that. First, we are not talking about increasing over our historic quota level; we are talking about working towards a re-establishment of our historic quota. We lost 182,000 tonnes, and the British Sugar Corporation is not indenting for more than 150,000 tonnes, so we are in no sense going above our historic quota. The second point, which has been commented upon inadequately, is that the British consumption of sugar is the largest in the Community. We are significant users of sugar and we have a strong base on which to make our claim.

My hon. Friend the Minister and his colleagues must go in to bat on our behalf on the sugar quota. We have a similar kind of European negotiation on a smaller scale and in microcosm to the issues which have been tackled on a wider scale in relation to the European budget by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. She fought both for the equity of the situation and within the context of realism. We are asking the Minister to undertake to go in and understand the reality of the situation and to understand that we did lose ground, but there is now the possibility of the market widening so that we can make a claim to gain more ground, or to regain ground. We must put these points firmly, together with the compelling point of fairness and to stand up for the British industry, which has a rightful claim.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Donald Thompson): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) on initiating the debate and I congratulate everybody who has taken part in it. It is flattering to me to see that they are all still in the House, and it must be of great satisfaction to the sugar industry, which is delighted that my hon. Friend has raised the subject tonight.

British sugar beet growers and British Sugar, which processes their beet, have a legitimate interest in maximising production and marketing of this profitable crop for our domestic market. The Government fully share the desire of the House to have a strong and prosperous British sugar beet industry, and we will continue to work for that. My hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham), in his usual forthright manner, urged me to work for that, and I can assure him that that is what we will do.

However, that is not the only interest that the Government have to consider. We also take pride in ensuring fulfilment of our long-standing Community commitment to import cane sugar from producers in African, Caribbean and Pacific countries — ACP countries. The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), who apologised for the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) — we wish him a speedy recovery — made a strong speech on behalf of the ACP countries, to which I will refer as I go through the speech I wrote before I heard the speeches tonight. Fortunately—touch wood—it fits fairly well. The House is going to get it—it fits, and that is better than usual from either this or the other side of the House.

We need a viable cane refining industry, and that industry is itself an important source of employment and revenue, as the hon. Member for Newham, South said. We must also have regard to the interests of British food manufacturers and consumers in supplies of sugar at competitive prices. Finally, we need to take account of the concern of sugar producers throughout the world — mostly in developing countries, including those who do not enjoy privileged access to the Community — at the volume of supplies on the world market. Clearly, the Government's policy on the EEC sugar regime must strike a fair balance between those interests, and that is what we have striven to do in the past.

I wish to say a word about someone who has not been mentioned often tonight — the consumer. Two weeks ago, we finally reached agreement on CAP support prices for 1987-88. For sugar beet, common prices were frozen for the fourth successive year. Over the same four-year period, there has been an increase of just over 1 per cent. in the effective common support price for white sugar. In real terms, the support price for white sugar in the United Kingdom has fallen by more than 10 per cent. since July 1983. That is, of course, less satisfactory to growers. However, even my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), who is always keen to ensure that his constituents are well rewarded, is not complaining about the income of sugar beet growers. The consumer must be very pleased that the price has remained steady. Sugar remains a relatively profitable crop with available quota keenly sought after, and growers will now have the benefit of the green pound devaluation.

There is to be a review of the Community regime in the autumn, as a direct result of this Government's pressure. Specifically, the Community will need to determine in the review both the A and B quotas for the period 1988-89 and 1990-91 inclusive and the incidence of the various production levies, which are designed to recoup from growers and processors the cost of supporting the Community sugar market. We do not know at this stage, and may not know for some months, what proposals the Commission will put forward on those and other relevant issues. Clearly, therefore, I am in no position to set out the Government's policy on the review. However, I will try to give some indications of our attitude on a number of the points raised tonight.

First, we should consider the balance of supply and demand in the Community of 12 as a whole. Production within both A and B quotas, together with the committed supplies from ACP countries, far outstrips the market available within the Community. The EEC is having to export about 3 million tonnes of quota sugar a year, and these exports can be made only with the aid of large subsidies. The export subsidy has averaged nearly £300 per tonne in the past year, which is about two and a half times the world price. It is true that the Community beet growers and processors themselves meet most of the cost of these exports through the levy system, and it occurred to me as the hon. Member for Newham, South was speaking that they may have done that originally because they knew that they would be in surplus and that it might be a good way of getting rid of surpluses. I am not sure that that is true and, as I have said, it was merely a thought that occurred to me as I was listening to the hon. Gentleman.

Community sugar exports amount to about a fifth of the free world sugar market, which is the market not covered by special arrangements such as the ACP countries enjoy in the Community or by bilateral contracts. We cannot ignore the effect of these exports on world markets.

Against this background there can clearly be no case for any increase in the overall Community sugar quotas. Indeed, there is a case that these quotas should be reduced, and at the previous review in 1985 we proposed that the overall quotas should be reduced. British Sugar pressed for an increase in its quota but that was not negotiated because, among other things, of the serious position of the sugar market. Quotas for all member states were therefore left unchanged for two years. In addition, an elimination levy was introduced to clear the deficit on the export refund levy account that had built up from 1981 to 1986, and this was shared among member states to our basic advantage. That brings us to the 1987 review and this debate.

At the 1985 review we proposed that overall quotas should be reduced and that this should be achieved by means of a more equitable allocation of B quotas on a standard percentage of the A quotas for all member states in place of the present allocation, which ranges from 10 per cent. for some member states, including the United Kingdom, up to 30 per cent. for others. The Commission and most other member states, however, were strongly opposed to any reallocation of quotas. I have no reason to believe that they will change their minds despite what has been said during this debate, including the wise words of my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell). My hon. Friend has made two successive speeches in the Chamber without interruption, and that must be a record. His first contribution was, of course, a maiden speech. The Government will do their best to ensure that the allocation is changed.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) asked about the United Kingdom's position. When quotas were last reallocated in 1981, the changes were made on the basis of past production. Our production in the base period had been adversely affected by climate and other factors, so our quota, especially our B quota, is less than it might otherwise have been. As a result, although we are fully producing our A and B quotas, there is little if any surplus in the United Kingdom over our domestic requirements.

I have been asked whether the machinery of the sugar quota operates differently from the milk quota, and to the best of my knowledge it does.

When a sugar beet farm goes out of production British Sugar takes it back and then reallocates it. That reallocation may lead to new entrants into farming or new entrants into sugar beet production.

Although we are fully producing our A and B quotas, there is little, if any, surplus in the United Kingdom over our domestic requirements. At present, beet sugar production within quotas of 1·144 million tonnes, together with supplies of imported ACP cane sugar of 1·15 million, roughly matches domestic consumption of 2·25 million to 2·3 million tonnes. Taking one year with another, we import about 120,000 tonnes of white sugar from other member states and export slightly more 150,000 tonnes to 200,000 tonnes of domestically produced white sugar to third countries.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry has already said, there is little likelihood of any increase in domestic demand, but, as mentioned by all hon. Members, there is a growing interest in biotechnology and the biotechnological use of sugar in other products. The hon. Member Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) comes from a part of the world which is accustomed to biotechnology and such chemical plants. We are aware that such industry is found on the north-east side of England. We would like to see the development of this aspect of the chemical industry in the country and especially in the north-east. It is important that, if biotechnology is extended through the use of sugar, we should push as hard as possible for an extra quota to meet that increasing demand.

At present there is no evidence to suggest that the figure covered by the review will exceed 50,000 to 100,000 tonnes a year. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford discussed a level of usage far higher than that.

The level of national quotas is inseparable from that of the level of the production levy. Under current arrangements, the basic A quota is subject to a maximum levy of 2 per cent. of the intervention price, the B quota to a maximum additional levy of 37½ per cent. This seems appropriate since it is the additional production represented by the B quota which has to be exported and therefore provides the main additional expenditure. The Government continue to attach importance to maintaining this distinction between the levies applying to the quotas.

My hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord), who backed his Suffolk horses into the buffers at one time—that will make an interesting mixed metaphor in Hansard—called for an increase in quota. Our quota represents 9 per cent. of EC quota production and we contribute under 6 per cent. of levy. In some ways, that is reassuring.

We must also continue to maintain a reasonable balance between cane and beet producers in the United Kingdom to ensure a secure market for ACP cane sugar. I share the belief of the hon. Member for Newham, south that we must protect the ACP and the jobs that are created by that body.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful for the Minister's reassertion of the principle already reasserted by other hon. Members tonight.

I believe that the quotas for producers were introduced in 1981. Cm.167, the Intervention Board report for 1986, showed that the United Kingdom got no less than £86 million from the funds. The hon. Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) mentioned storage and that report shows that there was a £24 million contribution to the storage levy. Later, I hope that the Minister will check whether all that £86 million comes from the producers' levy, the percentage of which he has just given.

Mr. Thompson: If it was four minutes past one o'clock in a Committee room and the hon. Gentleman started talking about Cm. 167 and going into such details, I would be terrified, but as it is I shall write to him.

We have it very much in mind that ensuring a secure market entails more than ensuring that there remains a place for ACP sugar on the United Kindgom market. In the long term there will be a market in the United Kingdom for ACP sugar only if the Community regime also provides a sufficient margin to enable this raw sugar to be refined. Last year, at United Kingdom insistence, the Commission undertook to carry out a review of that margin and it has yet to submit a report on it to the Council of Ministers. I am glad to say, however, that as part of the price-fixing settlement secured a week ago, the Council formally recognised the need to take measures rapidly to resolve the problem of the refining margin for cane sugar and the Commission undertook to submit proposals to this end. The Government will continue to press for a speedy and satisfactory solution in the interests of the United Kingdom industry and the ACP suppliers.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West asked me about that commitment and I have made that commitment. Hon. Members have said that things change and, of course, the Portuguese entry has changed the entire nature of sugar and sugar refining in the EEC. Nothing stays still and in the machinations of EEC committees, it may be that Portugal's entry will give us a window whereby we may get various adjustments to our satisfaction. I do not know.

I end by assuring the House that I have noted the various points made in this debate; and that the Government will have them very much in their mind when we come to the review of the regime in the autumn. It will continue to be our objective to maintain a fair balance between cane and beet supplies in the United Kingdom—and to secure a fair deal for each in the Community, within the limitations imposed by the Community sugar regime and by the stark fact of a substantial Community—and world—surplus of sugar.

Nuclear Arms Control

1.6 am

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I am pleased to have obtained this debate on the nuclear arms control negotiations. The current negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union are certainly the most important international negotiations taking place at present. I welcome them and want them to result in a deal that will see a large number of nuclear weapons on the scrap heap. Such a deal, if achieved, looks likely to be only a small step towards ending the nuclear threat that hangs over mankind. It is important that a deal should be achieved and that Britain should work for its achievement. However, beyond that, it is crucial that all our efforts are directed to carrying on the impetus further to reduce and then eliminate nuclear weapons from the world.

Nuclear weapons are a threat to the very existence of mankind. However, that is still not fully understood by some of the Colonel Blimps who are in political and military positions around the world. Among them, I am afraid, is the Prime Minister. The message has still not got across to them that, unlike pre-atomic weapons systems, nuclear weapons have the potential to destroy or blight all life on earth. They leave little opportunity for controlling the situation or for second thoughts.

Mr. Gorbachev, in his February address to the Moscow Forum, said:

"The development and subsequent stockpiling of nuclear weapons and of their delivery vehicles beyond all reasonable bounds have made man technically capable of terminating his own existence. The simultaneous accumulation of explosive social material in the world, and attempts to continue tackling forcefully, with stone-age methods, the products of problems of a cardinally altered world make catastrophe highly likely in political terms as well. The militarisation of mentality and of the way of life weakens and even removes altogether any moral inhibitions with regard to nuclear suicide.

We have no right to forget that the first step, which is always the most risky, has already been made. Nuclear weapons have been used against human beings, and used twice. There are dozens—I repeat dozens—of recorded and acknowledged moments when the possibility of using such weapons against other countries was seriously considered . . . The question stands like this: either political mentality is geared to the requirements of the times or civilisation and life itself on Earth may perish."

The author, Martin Amis, in his "A Blast against the Bomb" essay, published in The Observer on 19 April 1987, put it in an even more startling and brilliant way. He said:

"Nuclear war is seven minutes away, and might be over in an afternoon. How far away is nuclear disarmament? We are waiting. And the weapons are waiting.

What is the only provocation that could bring about the use of nuclear weapons? Nuclear weapons. What is the priority target for nuclear weapons? Nuclear weapons. What is the only established defence against nuclear weapons? Nuclear weapons. How do we prevent the use of nuclear weapons? By threatening to use nuclear weapons. And we can't get rid of nuclear weapons, because of nuclear weapons. The intransigence, it seems, is a function of the weapons themselves. Nuclear weapons can kill a human being a dozen times over in a dozen different ways; and, before death—like certain spiders, like the headlights of cars—they seem to paralyse."

We must break that paralysis. That is what the people of the world want. The circumstances and the arguments have changed.

In the same article Amis compared his and his father's view—his father representing the outdated Tory notions still prevalent in his House. He states:

"My father regards nuclear weapons as an unbudgeable given. They will always be necessary because the Soviets will always have them and the Soviets will always want to enslave the West. Arms agreements are no good because the Soviets will always cheat. Unilateral disarmament equals surrender. And, anyway, it isn't a case of 'red or dead.' The Communist world is itself nuclear-armed and deeply divided: so it is a case of 'red and dead.'

Well, Dead, at any rate, is what this prescription seems to me to promise. Nuclear weapons, my father reminds me, have deterred war for 40 wars. I remind him that no global abattoir presided over the century-long peace that followed Napoleon's discomfiture in 1815. And the trouble with deterrence is that it can't last out the necessary timespan, which is roughly between now and the death of the sun. Already it is falling apart, from within.

When I say that America is as much of a threat as the Soviet Union my father categories me as somone who takes democracy lightly, who takes freedom lightly. But of course it is the weapons themselves that are the threat."

The deterrent myth has also been hammered. Nuclear weapons have not deterred conventional attacks from Vietnam to the Falklands. They could not be used in such circumstances without wreaking enormous destruction and loss of life and without risking a chain reaction which could lead to nuclear retaliation, invoking the Chernobyl effect of mass radiation affecting the whole world—as someone crudely put it, "Peeing into the wind as the effects return to plague all of us."

Mr. Gorbachev has hammered the deterrent myth. He pointed out that the viewpoint which underlies the doctrine of nuclear deterrence was "an evil necessary to prevent a greater evil—war . . . First, even if we stick to this doctrine, we would have to admit that the 'nuclear safeguard' is not 100 per cent. effective and not termless. It may any time become a death sentence to mankind. The bigger the nuclear arsenals, the less chance they will be kept 'obedient'. Proliferation; increasingly sophisticated nuclear weapons systems, a greater transportation scale and the constant risk of technical error, human failure of malice are all chance factors on which the survival of mankind depends . . . deterrence . . . is, in fact, a policy based on intimidation . . . When threat is a political means, the natural wish is that each such threat should be taken seriously. For that, one has to always back up threats by definite action . . .In a historical context that does not reduce the risk of military conflict. In fact, it further increases the risk . . . the more nuclear weapons there are, the greater risk of a fatal malfunction."

That is the new realism in the Soviet Union based on the need to act now to avoid a nuclear holocaust in future. Because of that new realism, a deal seems possible at least to lessen the overkill and make a start on a downturn in the nuclear arsenals rather than crazy expansion. Arms control negotiations are very slow and easily get bogged down. They require a serious political will. It is source of sadness and of concern that there has been no deal in President Reagan's period of office or during the Prime Minister's eight years on the central issue of achieving nuclear arms reductions.

An opportunity for an agreement exists now. That has arisen not from strength, but more from glut. There are 50,000 nuclear warheads with 1 million times the power of the Hiroshima bomb. The Gorbachev initiative provides the opportunity. I hope that the deal will not be thwarted deliberately by some dinosaur-thinking, pro-nuclear vested interest. Such potential deals have been sabotaged before. The House of Commons Library briefing paper put it succinctly:

"Arms control, because of its emotive aspects, is always vulnerable to political abuse, when Governments use the forum of Arms Control to pursue other aims or distract attention from actual deployment programmes."

[Mr. Harry Cohen]

There must be no political abuse in this case. On the contrary, the deal should be nurtured as top priority. That should be the British Government's insistence. The deal must also not be used as a cover or excuse to expand under the guise of modernising nuclear weapons in the categories outside the deal. There are signs that that could happen. The Government do not appear to have clean hands in that respect. The Government and some NATO dinosaurs appear to me to be in the process of trying to cheat on the deal, even before it has been agreed. I will refer to that later.

The deal will almost certainly be limited. It is called zero-zero, but that is a misnomer. That does not mean zero nuclear weapons on both sides. It is unlikely even to meet Mr. Gorbachev's aim, proclaimed before the Reykjavik summit, of zero European theatre nuclear weapons in five to eight years, excluding the British and French capability. That exclusion alone would not have meant zero. For a start, that deal would be restricted to Europe. Secondly, British and French submarine long-range nuclear weapons would be untouched. The deal will cover only intermediate nuclear weapons—the shorter-range intermediate forces in the range of 500 km to 1,000 km and longer-range intermediate nuclear forces in the range of 1,000 km to 5,500 km. Missiles outside those ranges will not be included in the agreement. Battlefield nuclear artillery, air-drop nuclear weapons and short-range missiles up to the 5,000 km range are not included. Strategic intercontinental weapons over the 5,500 km range are not included and space nuclear weapons—star wars—are not included. A lot is not included. However, even within the intermediate nuclear weapons range, the West German Government have been screaming for the exclusion of Pershing 1A missiles. They have a range of 740 km, right in the middle of the shorter-range intermediate nuclear forces category which is supposed to be zero. Those missiles are German, with United States warheads, under a dual-key arrangement.

The NATO Foreign Ministers, at their meeting which culminated on 12 June, sought their exemption. They said that the agreement should apply to all United States and Soviet land-based short-range intermediate nuclear forces missiles. The reference to the United States provides for the exclusion of Pershing 1A, because that missile is nominally West German. But the limitation to land-based missiles opens up a huge loophole which, in my view, would subvert an effective agreement. The exemption, if in the agreement, would not mean "zero" in intermediate nuclear forces. In fact, it presents the opportunity to expand sea and air-launched nuclear weapons as a replacement for the land-based ones. The restriction suggested by the Foreign Ministers actually clears the way to the modernisation and increasing of nuclear weaponry. It means a new generation of nuclear weapons replacing the old lot.

The Government have been preparing for this. The Defence Secretary has already talked of moving cruise to Holy Loch and converting it to be sea-launched. Other cruise weapons may well be air-launched, as more F111 and B52 nuclear bombers are brought into Britain. More emphasis is being placed on battlefield nuclear weapons below the 500 km range. The United States has been reported as giving consideration to converting Pershing 2 into shorter-range missiles. There has also been talk of replacing NATO's Lance missiles with new longer-range ones, of expanding the nuclear weaponry over the 5,500 km range and of placing yet more emphasis—along with British involvement—on the star wars programme.

Those developments could seriously undermine the opportunities opened up by an INF deal for a permanent reduction in the number of nuclear weapons. What assurances will the Government give that, if an INF deal is achieved, they will not use it simply to deploy more nuclear weapons in a different category? The Government seem to have been very active in this respect, planning for loopholes and for the replacement of missiles which have to leave Britain. I understand that the official parlance is "compensatory measures". The Government proclaim themselves as being one of the main architects of the deal. That is a falsehood. They are still busy expanding Britain's nuclear weaponry, particularly outside the range of a likely deal. They are introducing a new generation of battlefield nuclear weapons—nuclear cels, with a neutron bomb capacity; and purchasing Trident, which represents a huge upgrading of Britain's strategic nuclear arsenal. The number of warheads on each submarine is boosted by two and a half times, from 48 to 128, with a capacity for expansion to 224 per submarine.

This is at a time when a 50 per cent. cut in strategic offensive weapons is one of the Government's proclaimed aims, mentioned in the Queen's Speech. That seems to be interpreted as cuts in everyone else's missiles, but not in our own. Trident is a hindrance to a deal between the two superpowers, especially one to achieve a nuclear-free Europe. It also prejudices the climate for disarmament. Furthermore, it undermines the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. Along with the Prime Minister's notorious Moscow statement that nuclear weapons are the only means of allowing a small country to stand up to a big one, it gives the green light to proliferation—to every small country obtaining a nuclear bomb.

The Tory record, when examined for substance rather than rhetoric, is quite thin on achievement. The Prime Minister's "nuclearphilia", as the Russians called it, puts nuclear disarmament in Europe out of reach. The Prime Minister is very much a part of the problem; she is no part of the answer to it.

Britain should be doing much more. A high profile in international diplomacy, especially for general election purposes, is no substitute for the achievement of real nuclear disarmament. Britain should be prepared to close the loopholes and to renounce expansion. Britain should be prepared to make a bilateral deal with the Soviet Union, whatever the outcome of the INF negotiations. We should join the call for a nuclear-free Europe.

Zero-zero is not what it pretends to be. It is a misnomer. It is a step forward, but only a first step. There are many others, and the Government should be using the Gorbachev impetus to place them on the agenda. For example, battlefield nuclear weapons should be drawn in to the deal. It should be made into a triple-zero option. The Government should be pressing for a longer-range nuclear weapons agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union and for the scrapping of many of those missiles.

The Government should also ensure that a comprehensive test ban treaty is put back on the agenda. The Soviet Union's self-imposed moratorium was wasted. Britain still objects, on the basis of inadequate verification. The United States has dropped that objection, but wants tests to continue so that new nuclear weapons can be developed.

We should be backing a new test ban treaty. We should not do anything and we certainly should not encourage anything that breaches the ABM treaty. Outside Europe, we should stop stalling. We should sign the 1985 Rarotonga treaty, which aims to restrict the testing, deployment and use of nuclear weapons in the south Pacific. Britain should withdraw from the star wars programme. Its alleged rationale as a shield against all ballistic missiles is obviously flawed. Its potential is much more offensive than defensive, and it has a massive first strike capacity. It will reduce stability between the superpowers.

Britain should also refuse to accept chemical weapons on its soil. We should seek their complete elimination worldwide, and also a reduction in conventional weapons. Britain should grasp the opportunities that an INF deal would provide. We should not invent ways to circumvent it. For the future of the world, we must not lose this opportunity.

1.27 am

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on drawing this place in the debate, even though I do not agree with much that he said.

As always, our aim must be peace, but not peace at any price. It must be peace with freedom. If we want peace with freedom, we must be prepared to defend ourselves not with a minimal capacity but with a credible deterrence capacity.

Approximately 5·2 per cent. of our gross domestic product is devoted to defence. It acts as an insurance policy against aggression. This level of spending is a little lower than that in the United States, where it is between 6·5 and 7 per cent. However, we depend critically upon alliances. We must be careful not to make any moves on nuclear arms control that would split those alliances. They are an essential part of our defence strategy.

The result of the defence policies of the last 40 years under both Labour and Conservative Governments has been peace within NATO. This 40 years of peace within NATO has not been in a peaceful world. There have been hundreds of conflicts since 1945. That is what makes the peace within NATO so special. The hon. Member for Leyton referred to the Falklands battle. It did not escalate because of the nuclear deterrent and the super-power balance. We have enjoyed a period of peace and we now have the highest degree of freedom and human rights in history. It is not a bad bargain; it is something about which we should be pleased and we should look for the reasons for that success.

In all of our policies we must continually re-evaluate and examine the sectors in which the world is moving and adapt accordingly. We must not gamble our national survival on mere whims or vague assumptions. We have empirical evidence and a track record from which to draw. We must not gamble on unchecked proposals on nuclear disarmament, for example, from the Soviet bloc. We must check because those proposals are not always what they appear to be on the front cover. When one looks at the details one finds that a different nuance is thrown upon them.

We must be creative and flexible and push for peace with balanced disarmament. However, to maintain peace we must be vigilant and always look for substance in the reaction to proposals. We owe it to our citizens, not only those who are alive today but to future generations, to ensure that verification is as certain as it can be and that any reductions are balanced, not only in nuclear forces but in biochemical and conventional forces. Defence should be looked at as a completely integrated system. It would be wrong to allow even a balanced reduction in one arm of defence that leaves us more exposed in another. In other words, it would be wrong if we had a reduction to zero in nuclear weapons but left ourselves with a deficit in biochemical weapons. That would be to leave ourselves wide open and it would not be in the best interests of either our country or of world peace.

We should remember the Carthaginian wars when, in the interest of trade, Carthage suggested disarmament and unilaterally disarmed. Today, historians argue about the location of Carthage, and that was before the days of gunpowder. There was a complete annihilation by Rome, the side that did not disarm.

The outlook today is exciting. There are great economic prospects. One only has to look at what is happening in agriculture. There are also great financial and social prospects as well as those for peace and disarmament. There are prospects of turning the dream of nuclear disarmament into reality. We are at that threshold, but we should not take options at their face value. It is vital important for our leaders and politicians to look at the details. There will be a need for that in the future unless we are to create a catastrophe in terms of peace with freedom.

A bright future is in prospect and that has been arrived at not by weakness in the western position but as a result of strength. It is also due to other pressures on the Soviet Union.

The Soviet Union has enormous economic problems. They are more understandable, if one compares the strengths and weaknesses of the free democracies and those of the totalitarian states. It is difficult for Governments of free democracies to sustain any form of hot war when there is no open threat to the mother country. The reverse is true of a totalitarian state. It has little chance of generating real wealth in relation to the enormous wealth generation in the free democracies. The Soviet Union faces that problem.

The Soviet Union's economy is still basically in the heavy industrial age. It has not progressed across the board into the light industrial, let alone technological, age. The Soviet Union has problems in generating the wealth necessary to maintain the trappings and influence of a super-power. It also faces tremendous internal challenges. Sixteen per cent. of GDP is spent on armaments. With interchanges with the free countries in the Western world, consumer demand is growing at the grassroots for what we consider basic products, such as jeans.

The Soviet Government also face problems with the technological revolution. The root of power in the totalitarian state is the control of information. How can a technological revolution be achieved without decontrol of information by the extension of the use of personal computers?

The Soviet Government must also face external challenges, of which China is one example. It was predicted that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister could not do a deal with a Communist leader over Hong Kong, but the deal was done. The Communist Chinese Government are not communising Hong Kong so much as capitalising China, with tremendous results in terms of economic growth and productivity. China is entering world markets as an exporter of rice and other goods, which it previously imported. That worries the Soviets, if only because of a possible challenge for the leadership of the communist world.

[Mr. John Browne]

Another external challenge comes from the other superpower, the United States. The Soviet Union is falling further and further behind in terms of wealth creation and the technological sophistication of weapons systems. It is losing the race, and the distance between the two nations is growing. The most graphic example is the strategic defence initiative, to which the hon. Member for Leyton alluded. This is a new aspect of defence in space, on which the Soviets had a monopoly in the 1960s and 1970s. The United States has now entered the arena. The entry ticket, just for research, is some $15 billion to $20 billion. The key element of the SDI is computer power, the ability to make some 40 million calculations a second. The Soviet Union is furthest behind the United States in terms of that industry and technology.

The SDI has had a tremendous impact on Soviet thinking. I was privileged to be a member of our delegation to the Inter-Parliamentary Union meeting in December 1984 and to escort Mr. and Mrs. Gorbachev to various functions, which included showing them around the House. The overriding impression I gained was that the Soviets are desperate to negotiate an end, or even a halt, to the SDI. The SDI has given the Western negotiators an ace card. It has brought the Soviets to the negotiating table for the first time in decades to talk seriously about negotiation on nuclear and conventional arms. That is a very important factor.

There has been a great change in the Soviet stance on arms control. We must ask how there could be such a change, bearing in mind the old pattern and the resistance of the Soviet elite or Nomlakatura to any form of change, and especially to any leader with charisma.

In the first day of debate on the Queen's Speech, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary mentioned the impact of Mr. Gorbachev. He was right to do so. The why and the how of Mr. Gorbachev's succession is intriguing and will occupy historians in interesting research for years to come.

As I have said, I met Mr. Gorbachev when he came here. Much has been written about him, which I will not repeat. However, certain of his characteristics are important with regard to arms control.

Mr. Gorbachev has obvious charisma, Western-style charisma which he is both able and anxious to exploit over our Western media. He does not pay for air time or coverage but still manages to get into every room with a television set and on the front page of major newspapers every day of the week. What a change that is from the previous style of Soviet leadership. It has had a tremendous impact on the Soviet Union and the rest of the world. It will have a tremendous effect on the motivation of work force and management within the Soviet Union. It will enable them to export in major markets for commodities of which they were previously huge importers. It will have an immense effect on commodity and financial markets and upon arms negotiations.

Mr. Gorbachev will increasingly use his charisma to talk to people in the free world over the heads of our leaders and negotiators. That provides new challenges for us when trying to keep our people behind our policies.

He is a formidable negotiator and will exploit potential rifts between the allies. The difference between zero-zero Europe and zero-zero global is just one example of this risk. He will be able to lull the West into a false sense of security and allow us to fall into the trap of unbalanced, unverifiable arms reductions. We must remain vigilant at all costs.

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): I am having some difficulty following the trend of the hon. Gentleman's logic. On what does the hon. Gentleman lay greater stress, the alleged superiority of the West in intermediate weapons, which I understood to be an inferiority of 9:1 and 6:1 in medium and longer-range intermediate nuclear weapons, or the charisma of Mr. Gorbachev? Which has been the critical factor which has brought the Soviet Union and the United States together?

Mr. Browne: I myself did not say that there is superiority. It is impossible to tell which is the more important. We must accept the facts, and the fact is that we have got where we are through strength—SDI is just one indication of that—but Mr. Gorbachev's influence is also important.

The third of his characteristics that is important is his self-confidence. It is based on a tremendous track record of his own promotion and his own proven ability. That leads to two interesting points. First, people with that sort of self confidence can afford to be more flexible, and with more flexible attitudes they are able to be more creative. This has an important impact in terms of nuclear arms negotiations because no longer is it exclusively the West that puts forward the initiative and is told "Nyet, nyet" by the Soviets. We saw a classic example of the Soviets putting forward royal cards at Reykjavik, for which the West had been negotiating for years, and suddenly the West walked away without accepting them. The Americans, the great public relations experts, were beaten to the post.

I know that the hon. Member for Leyton will not agree with me, but I think that President Reagan showed tremendous integrity in saying that he would not accept those royal cards on their face value and that there was a lot more to nuclear arms negotiations than just looking at the face of a card. He had the integrity to come back, having refused what looked like an irresistible offer. The Western press tried to make him out as the warmonger in those first two days.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Perhaps he is.

Mr. Browne: I do not believe that he is. One main point that I want to stress is the risk that the new Soviet style can make Western leaders appear to be warmongers. That is a great risk because it demands tremendous integrity and leadership on behalf of the Western negotiators.

Under Mr. Gorbachev the Soviet goals have not changed, but their style and methods have. Out goes the brutal Russian bear and in comes a reasonable, responsible, even a reassuring Russia—a nice bear that smiles when it shows its teeth; it does not growl. That change is difficult for Western leaders to convey. It is a real threat to the population as a whole. Soviet hands at the negotiating table are clean. All the activity is done under the table by surrogate nations, and that is something about which we must be well aware.

I welcome the new Soviet approach beause it creates a tremendous opportunity in terms of nuclear and other arms negotiations, and trade. However, it also presents tremendous risks.

One risk is unity. As I said, our deterrence policy is based on alliances. There is a risk of the splitting of Europe from the United States, or of Britain from France, in different interests, even in just the specific nuclear part of the arms control and arms negotiations. There are risks that we can be wrong-footed, as I think to some extent the West was when the Reykjavik talks took place. There is the risk that our leaders can come back from those talks and appear as the warmongers because the Soviet package looks so great. It is difficult to unravel the nitty gritty details of arms negotiations on television because it does not give one the space in which to do it.

It is a difficult new challenge that the Western leaders must meet. At the same time the Western leaders, will face tremendous temptations. There are enormous stakes to be played for, and the opportunity to come back as the so-called greatest peace-maker of the century will be difficult to resist. What a deal one could strike apparently on the surface, but what a selling short could result for the West and for world peace if one took only the popular decisions. For example, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned, there is the zero-zero Europe option which allows for 100 residual missiles on each side, not able to strike each other because they would be removed from the West of the Urals and not be deployed in Alaska on the American side. However, the Soviet SS20s are relatively small misssiles on mobile launchers with a reload capacity and are able to strike into Europe.

Why is it not zero-zero global? The zero-zero Europe option means that down the road the European interests become different from the American interests, thereby decoupling the key alliance of our defence and of our peace and freedom. Therefore, zero-zero Europe is a very different thing from zero-zero global. Yet, in the newspapers it is just referred to as zero-zero. When one starts unravelling the details it is a very different thing.

I would like to ask my hon. Friend the Minister, who is being very patient, whether he would update us on the nuclear planning group, the spring meeting of the NATO defence Ministers and the EEC Foreign Ministers with regard to nuclear arms reduction, just to put us in the picture more than we were before the election campaign and more than we have been over the past two months. It is a fascinating subject and I would be grateful to him for that.

Will my hon. Friend the Minister urge my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and fellow Members of the Government to persevere with their patience because it will take enormous patience both to negotiate with the Soviet Union and to explain the real details and the effects of those details to our own people? Will he urge them to persevere with the vigilance that was stated by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary, to consider the details in terms of substance and to ensure that our Government and other Governments know the importance of integrity in terms of accepting the risk of appearing to be the warmonger? They should not accept at face value superficial royal cards on the other side that would mean the dissolution of one arm or another of our integrated defence system. We must accept the need for change, for updating and the need for arms negotiations. I would strongly welcome such negotiations. In fact, it would be obscene to go on if we could think of a way of not spending all that money and of not putting the world at such risk. At the same time we must be vigilant and ensure that arms reductions are genuine. Let us hope that the peace we have enjoyed for the past 40 years will progress for 40 years in the future and beyond. I wish my hon. Friend the Minister well in that tough endeavour.

1.52 am

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The House should be grateful to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) for putting this subject on our agenda, although at a late hour, which is not the hour of his choosing. It is time that we had some discussion on this subject, albeit a fairly brief one.

I share many of the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Leyton and some of his conclusions, although not all of them and not all the direction of his argument. I parted company with him when he said—giving the game away as to the difference between his standpoint and mine—that it might be possible or necessary to have a bilateral deal between Britain and the Soviet Union if the current global discussions broke down. That is the point at which we would be abandoning any attempt to have a NATO strategy and deciding that we can simply negotiate some minor adjustment in Soviet weaponry to compensate for the removal of all the nuclear weaponry that is in the United Kingdom. I watched the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) making such an offer to Mr. Gorbachev when he and I and the noble lord Lord Whitelaw were in Moscow. Mr. Gorbachev was, understandably, most receptive and offered reductions in strategic weaponry and changes in the targeting of Soviet weaponry if the policy of the removal of all American bases from Britain and the removal of the British deterrent could be accomplished.

That is not the way in which we will make Europe secure at the same time as reducing the total of nuclear weapons in the world. For those two objectives to be accomplished, we need an agreement that draws together NATO and the Warsaw pact. I am adamant in my determination that that should be achieved by NATO acting as an alliance. It cannot be achieved bilaterally.

Nuclear weapons exist and cannot be disinvented or removed from the scene without negotiation between countries. We do the world no service if we merely detach ourselves from the system by which we are defended in a gesture that may marginally reduce the total of nuclear weapons in the world but threatens the security of the West and does not achieve those major reductions for which so many people are looking.

As the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) pointed out, this is a time of great promise for global arms negotiation prospects. We have seen a much more realistic approach from the Soviet Union, coupled with a recognition by the United States President of the value of an agreement, although we sometimes wonder whether the United States President remains in control of United States foreign policy. Perhaps we shall know tomorrow, when Admiral Poindexter takes the stand, just how much the President knows or does not know. It must be a matter of genuine concern that there should be doubt as to who precisely is running United States foreign policy. There is no doubt that the President has become convinced of the desirability of reaching agreement and has some personal commitment to it.

What should the British Government's contribution be in the circumstances? Surely it should be to facilitate and to urge on the reaching of an agreement. The Prime Minister is fond of saying that it is all because of cruise, Polaris and Trident that the Soviet Union is coming to the negotiating table. But, of course, for decades the West has been strong relative to the Soviet Union at any given time. We have had areas of strength, and there have been areas in which we have been concerned that the Warsaw pact was stronger than we were, but our overall position has been one of defensive strength.

The Soviet Union did not then come to the negotiating table in the same spirit as it does now. It is obvious that the change in the Soviet leadership and its perceptions has changed the climate. One may speculate as to the reasons for that change. They are a balance of two factors: first, the economic factor to which the hon. Member for Winchester referred—the mounting cost that would be involved in the Soviet Union matching anything like the American strategic defence initiative, particularly in its offensive capabilities; the impossibility of meeting the legitimate demands of the Soviet people for a better standard of living, against a background of higher and higher arms expenditure. That is clearly a major factor.

Secondly, General Secretary Gorbachev has a keen appreciation of the dangers of nuclear war and a genuine desire to achieve peace. That is a harder matter to assess. Like any Soviet leader, he will not do that at the expense of what he sees as Soviet security. Perhaps it is more prudent to place reliance upon economic motivation for the stand that he is now taking. Either way, he is taking a more realistic position about the need for global nuclear disarmament than any previous Soviet leader did.

In recent months, Britain has too often been seen as holding back the superpowers from arriving at a deal, with apparent opposition to an INF agreement, and apparent hesitation at almost every stage. Indeed, it was only in the immediate prelude to the general election that it seemed to become clear that the British Government were supporting a deal on the lines that seemed to be in prospect and were no longer placing obstacles in its way. I take that now to be the case. I make no quarrel about the circumstances in which it arose. If the election influenced it, that is well and good. That is what elections are for. The Government may have sensed the general desire among British people to see progress towards multilateral arms negotiations. Indeed, some British people are suspicious of one-sided disarmament but are anxious to secure multilateral disarmament.

The Government cannot at one and the same time appeal to the opposition to one-sided disarmament and fail to meet aspirations for effective moves to multilateral disarmament.

Mr. John Browne rose—

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman took quite a long time to make his speech. Other hon. Members wish to speak. Whereas I would readily give way, I feel constrained by that fact. I wish to put some questions to the Minister who is to reply.

What is the United Kingdom Government's attitude now to Pershing IAs in West Germany? Do the Government see them as a potentially insuperable obstacle to the achievement of an arms deal? Do the Government reflect upon the divisions that exist in the West German Government about an issue which is of understandable importance to many people in West Germany but is much more important for its political significance than for the real defence value of the weapons about which we are speaking? What is the United Kingdom view of the suggestion referred to by the hon. Member for Winchester that the remaining 100 missiles on either side should be removed because it would make verification so much easier? Do the British Government have a view on the total zero-zero option?

Has the Prime Minister abandoned the view she expressed at one stage that Europe might have to increase its short-range missiles to match those of the Soviet Union? It is difficult to see the point of such an exercise, as many of these missiles, by their very nature—certainly those stationed in the United Kingdom—could only be fired at our European allies.

These matters can be resolved. There are real prospects of agreement on the zero-zero option, but other issues must be debated, such as battlefield nuclear weapons, which present the dangerous prospect of easy escalation into nuclear war. We must make more strenuous efforts to control and limit those weapons and remove them from a significant sector of any potential European battlefield.

There is a need to press ahead for a comprehensive test ban treaty and to continue towards limitation of strategic missiles, which has implications for Trident. It remains possible that we could reach the stage in this Parliament that the weapons system the Government have chosen might fall within the limits which the super-powers want to set on strategic missiles.

The strategic defence initiative seems to carry the United Kingdom Government's support against all the evidence and all the sensible arguments. Nobody I have talked to from the United States really believes that it can work as a total defensive shell, the leak-proof astrodome of President Reagan's dreams. If it does not work in that way, it becomes potentially a very large offensive capacity, but one which offers no real protection to Europe at all.

If Britain is protecting Europe's interests in this argument, it is difficult to see why it should be offering any support to SDI at all. I say to all Ministers, particularly the Minister who is new to his responsibilities, that they should go back and read the speech of the Foreign Secretary, which gave 18 different reasons to doubt the viability and value of the SDI project. That speech remains as sound as it was when it was first made.

The Government are currently addressing the issue of a chemical weapons treaty. We send our good wishes to the negotiations in which the hon. Gentleman's colleague, the Minister of State, is engaged today. I welcome the fact that the Government are taking an initiative in this field. We are reminded of the dangers involved and some of the frightening aspects of it by the current publicity given to the experiments involving servicemen at Porton, testing our ability to deal with any kind of chemical attack. They are extremely worrying instances—although they are not the hon. Gentleman's ministerial responsibility—and are a reminder of the terrifying evil of chemical weapons and the urgent need for a proper international ban on them.

Successful arms control must mean that each side feels that it will be secure under the agreement that is being arrived at. No arms control agreement which leaves one side feeling insecure offers any sound prospects for the future. That must be the basis for any sensible multilateral agreement. But to reach that position involves both sides making adjustments of old ideas of what constitutes effective security. It has happened on the Soviet side and it must happen on the Western side. It involves constant assessment of the implications of new technology, and questioning of our old assumptions of what we depend upon for our security.

At the end of the day, both sides must feel that the agreement leaves them secure from any realistically imaginable threat they could face. It is possible to retain that dimension of practicality while having the vision to press ahead to the kind of arms agreement which so many people want to see.

The determination of people to prevent the awful cataclysmic destruction of our civilisation by a nuclear war is there and it is the responsibility of Governments to give it practical expression. Governments which are found wanting in doing so will have to answer not just for the fate of the people of this country but also for that of future generations throughout the world.

2.5 am

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on initiating the debate and on his efforts in raising, in this House and elsewhere, the questions of arms control and peace. Those matters should be at the forefront of our debate rather than, as we hear from Conservative Members, the eternal search for conflict and war. They maintain that there is the possibility, even the likelihood, of a war, and that, therefore, it is necessary to arm to prevent that. Frankly, I reject that philosophy. Anyone who believes that nuclear weapons provide any form of defence should look back to what happened in Japan in 1945, when Hiroshima and Nagasaki were devastated by nuclear bombs. In those areas people are still dying from cancers resulting from those bombs. They should also look at what is happening in western Europe at the moment, and recognise the increase in cancers that will result from the Chernobyl disaster a couple of years ago. They may then begin to realise that nuclear war knows no boundaries, frontiers or limitations.

As soon as a nuclear war begins, it is anhihilation, in one form or another, for both sides. It will be either instant death in the fire storm and nuclear winter that follows a nuclear attack, or slow, progressive cancer deaths for decades and decades. A number of excellent films on the subject show that a limited nuclear war conducted in Europe will result in what remains of life in this country being put back to medieval levels of production and living standards. Those would be the consequences of nuclear war.

Therefore, the search for peace and for freedom from nuclear weapons is important. However, also important is the search for peace and for freedom from war by conventional weapons. Hon. Members often claim that there has been peace in Europe for the past 40 years. There has not been an armed conflict, but I would not exactly say that the expenditure levels of both sides on arms, both nuclear and conventional, have maintained complete peace in Europe, not had an enormous effect on the social expenditures that could have taken place in Europe or have not been part of the export of war to other places.

I wish briefly to refer to the terrible conflict between Iran and Iraq, in which 500,000 people have already died. That conflict has been fuelled by arms sales and loans from western European and American banks, and chemical weapons are being used in that conventional war with all its horrors. There must be a search for peace. Those who say that arms expenditure by the superpowers does not have an effect on the rest of the world are, quite frankly, deluding themselves. One of the major reasons for the United States budget deficit is its vast level of arms expenditure. Estimates are given for the levels of expenditure by one side or the other, but there are also hidden levels of expenditure. Education expenditure in universities in the USA goes, to some extent, on military research. A large degree of corporate expenditure, in one form or another, also goes on military research. There are large areas of so-called civilian expenditure in the USA and this country which, in reality, go on military expenditure.

The question worldwide of the consequences of the arms race must be examined. The real danger of nuclear proliferation way beyond those countries that hold nuclear weapons now, with the ability to manufacture nuclear weapons and delivery systems, is growing all the time. It is important that there is some positive contribution towards nuclear disarmament discussions. That is one of the reasons why this debate is so important.

When I hear generals pontificating about nuclear deterrents on one side or the other and mutally assured destruction—it is called madness by them and everyone else—it is time to think and call a halt to what is going on. There are enormous possibilities for a real reduction in and the removal of nuclear weapons.

I am unapologetically in favour of unilateral nuclear disarmament for the United Kingdom. If we were to remove all nuclear weapons and bases from this country, we would no longer be the nuclear aircraft carrier of the United States. That must be the first step. Our lead would be followed by other European countries. The peace movement would be invigorated in other places and that would assist the overall nuclear disarmament process.

Secondly, we must examine what has gone wrong and right in the peace negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union. Considerable progress was made at Geneva when the Soviet Union submitted a number of proposals. A communiqué was agreed and it was resolved to meet again. Eventually there was the meeting at Reykjavik, and the proposals advanced by the Soviet Union were, in essence, the ones that the United States arms negotiators had been asking for in the past.

Why did the Reykjavik proposals not come to fruition? Why did they not provide a springboard for a real reduction in nuclear weapons on both sides? The answer lies partly with the stubbornness of President Reagan, who refused to put back star wars research and to cancel some of the research programmes. The pressure that was put on him by political cronies in the arms manufacturing and high technology industries in the United States undoubtedly had a major effect on his decision not to interrupt any aspects of star wars. That decision was both bad and dangerous. It has meant that the star wars research programmes continue and that the likelihood of a computer-controlled war, or a computer-controlled nuclear attack, comes nearer, is more real and is ever more dangerous.

An enormous amount of money is being spent on star wars research. It is said that star wars is creating jobs when in reality it is destroying them and destroying hope and life. The claim is nonsense and it must be exposed. The idea that Britain is benefiting from star wars in some way is so ludicrous as to be barely believable. Conservative Members often talk about jobs that are being created in the defence industry, but I ask them to consider the loss of jobs that is caused by capital-intensive defence programmes and the development of research programmes in the United States. This part of the world is being treated as a sort of colony for the United States arms industry. If the Conservative party is seriously interested in creating jobs, it should consider socially useful expenditure and the problems that people face. Housing problems are not solved by star wars, nuclear weapons or the construction of more tanks. Education and Health Service shortages are not met by that activity. We must address ourselves urgently to decreasing all forms of military expenditure so that more money is available to spend on social programmes.

The role of the Government in stoking up nuclear arms race and supporting the United States is grossly underestimated. There are more cruise missiles destined for this country than for most others in western Europe. There are 30,000 American troops here, and we give them legal immunity through the Visiting Forces Act 1952. American troops are allowed to act with impunity when escorting cruise missiles around Salisbury plain and elesewhere. We allow the unacceptable denial of civil liberties to those in areas where cruise missiles are based and to those who seek to oppose their presence on the roads.

We accept all that because, apparently, we are prepared to accept that the United States can use this country as a nuclear aircraft carrier. We also apparently accept the expenditure of £10 million to buy Trident missiles for this country. Those missiles will mean that we have a whole new generation of nuclear destruction heading for our shores. Apparently we are happy to pay for those missiles. We are also prepared to say that we support President Reagan in not promoting peace between the United States and the Soviet Union.

The Government should carefully examine what has been put on offer by the Soviet Union. Those proposals include the zero-zero option, the withdrawal of missiles to more than 100 km from the frontier between east and west Germany. They also include proposals for the verification of the removal of those missiles. There is a whole host of proposals that could be considered and could lead to the possibility of the start of rapid disarmament.

We can go down the road of negotiation and peace or the road of massive expenditure on star wars, increasing expenditure on other forms of nuclear weapons, such as Trident, and the escalation of the military arms race. Do we want that? Do we want to look for peace?

The effect of the nuclear strategy is enormous. The Government's Defence Estimates for 1987, volume II, reveal that total defence expenditure from 1981-82 to 1987-88 has risen from £12·2 billion to £18·7 billion. The total defence budget has increased by about 50 per cent. during that period, but the nuclear strategic force expenditure has increased by 150 per cent. during that same period. That appears to be the trend that the Government wish to follow.

The House should consider the Camp David text that the Prime Minister agreed in November 1986 after the Reykjavik summit. That text said that priority should be given to an INF agreement and a 50 per cent. cut, over five years, in United States and Soviet Union strategic offensive weapons. It also said that an agreement had been reached on a proposal to ban chemical weapons.

However, that text did not specify that the main negotiating stumbling block is the obsession of the President of the United States and of the high technology and arms industries of the United States to develop a strategic defence initiative. That initiative will lead us to the horrors of nuclear war in outer space, a computer-controlled set off of nuclear destruction and the appalling prospect of total annihilation.

We have a choice before us. Either we go down the road of nuclear madness, nuclear war and nuclear annihilation —the obsession of some to spend greater resources on nuclear weapons will mean that poverty in the world will increase—or we can look in the direction of peace and clasp with both hands the possibility of reaching an agreement, rapidly and quickly.

I hope that the Government will seriously consider the possibility of getting genuine peace negotiations under way with the hope of obtaining nuclear reductions at the earliest opportunity.

2.17 am

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): It is customary to congratulate hon. Friends who have been fortunate enough to secure an opportunity to sponsor a debate. I am a wee bit dubious about congratulating people on having debates at this time in the morning. However, this is an important subject and it is one which, at any time of the day or night, should ensure that there are people interested enough to participate. I believe that we have heard a representative section of opinion this evening.

We must return to this subject because although it featured in the debate on the Gracious Speech events are continuing apace. It is important that we keep the subject under review. That is especially important because whenever there is a prospect of advance or the possibility of a coming together, the Government immediately try to open up the divisions once more.

It is a source of regret that, in a country where there is precious little common ground, certainly among the Opposition parties, there is a consensus—if I may use that word—in respect of seizing the opportunities that Reykjavik and the post-Reykjavik situation have afforded. Sadly, when we look around for the Prime Minister to enter into that consensus, we see her acting out a role that is not dissimilar to that of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), where other consensuses or confusions seem to be evident. It would appear that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has been endowed this evening with the full authority of whatever remains of that small alliance to express the views of his party.

Labour Members' view of the Government during the past eight years is that they have done precious little to promote nuclear arms control and disarmament, and much to hinder it. In fact, following Reykjavik we saw the Reagan and Gorbachev discussions inching closer together. However, no sooner had the discussions ended than the Prime Minister, who was not invited to Reykjavik – a testament, it would appear to the weakness and irrelevance of Britain – immediately tried to get into the act by going to Washington to attempt to weaken the resolve of the American Administration. It is certainly true to say that, had the full agreement been secured at Reykjavik, the prospect of the Prime Minister obtaining Trident and satisfying her lust for nuclear weapons would have been greatly restricted. It is almost certain that a wider agreement from Reykjavik would have prevented Britain from going down the road that we are presently travelling to secure about an 800 per cent. increase in the number of nuclear warheads that we would be able to train on potential enemies.

We know that the escalation in Britain's nuclear capability comes at a time when many people – in fact, the overwhelming proportion of the population, according to opinion polls and the like, about 79 per cent. favour a nuclear freeze. Therefore, Trident and the maintenance of the independent deterrent, fly in the face of those attitudes. The implications of almost any improvement in or upgrading of our nuclear deterrent would result in the contravention of the 1967 non-proliferation treaty.

It was significant that in what was a thoughtful speech the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed omitted any reference to his party's position — or rather his interpretation of his party's position — in respect of minimum deterrence or the upgrading of that deterrent and its consequences for any non-proliferation or test ban treaties to which he would wish to commit his party. It is clear that Britain's adoption of any forms of nuclear weaponry will require testing, if not by the United Kingdom, at least by someone producing such weapons. If that were to be by the French — perhaps the most enthusiastic testers of all — or by the Americans, either way we should have to benefit from what is clearly a violation of what has hitherto been, at least by Labour Members, regarded as an inviolable international agreement.

However, from the Government side, we have heard from the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) all the old chestnuts about the 40 years of peace and how that is attributable exclusively to nuclear weapons, and perhaps partially to NATO. The Government have yet to consider the negotiations towards an international convention which would forbid the use of nuclear weapons against a state which neither possessed them nor had them stationed on its territory. We have yet to see any expression from this Government of a willingness to accept the doctrine of no first use.

Certainly, the consideration of the use of nuclear weapons against another nuclear power in retaliation is still at the forefront of the British Government's thinking on deterrence. Certainly, it is somewhat unclear whether Britain would be prepared to come out firmly against the use of its nuclear weapons against non-nuclear states. Certainly, if we could get such a declaration it would provide assurance to those who are at present non-nuclear and who may consider the acquisition of such weapons.

One of the present problems is that many nations are on the verge of or capable of obtaining nuclear weapons and they must be discouraged from following that road. It is hypocrisy for a country such as Britain to say, "It's okay for Britain to have nuclear weapons, but not for any other country to have them." We must go further than simply hiding behind treaties which had some substance when they were first agreed but which in many respects over the past 20 years have become almost irrelevant, given the ease with which relatively poorly developed countries can now obtain nuclear power.

This evening we heard from the hon. Member for Winchester about the problems of securing a zero-zero agreement and we heard that such an agreement would be virtually unacceptable in any form to the Prime Minister. But we have since heard that perhaps it could be reached. The Government's approach seems to be to say, "We may support what is happening because at the end of the day we do not have much say in it", or, "We leave it to the Americans", or, "We have had a go at the NATO planning groups and elsewhere and at the end of the day the Americans will probably know best." They might say "Certainly, all the long-range nuclear weapons and, indeed, the short-range ones are American. They will be decommissioned when the Americans decide." At present the British Government take whatever line they wish so long as Britain can retain some sort of fig leaf.

We in the Opposition are not satisfied with the Government's arguments so far. We recognise that many opportunities may arise for the NATO powers and we urge the Government to seize those opportunities. We recognise that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary is present in place of the Minister of State; the hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), who is participating in talks on a chemical weapons ban. Certainly, we would welcome any agreement on that. I agree with the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed that there are many problems regarding chemical weapons, some of which were identified this weekend in the press. It is strange that a Government who claim always to adopt the role of peacemaker can at the same time test dreadful nerve gases on their own people in a form which no other member of the Alliance is prepared to do.

We live in times when there are tremendous opportunities for peace. We recognise that in their own confused ways, both the Soviet Union and the United States are beginning to appreciate that. On the one hand, we see the sophisticated Gorbachev and on the other the naive and confused Reagan. They are both coming to agreement, but on the sidelines this Government appear to be wilfully and maliciously trying to frustrate everything that those powers want to achieve. We hope that the Minister will give us some hope of a change of attitudes this evening and I ask him to give us the opportunity of seeing that hope meet reality tonight.

2.30 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar) rose

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The Minister may reply if he has the leave of the House.

Mr. Eggar: I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to reply. I also thank the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) for giving me at least a brief chance to respond to this interesting debate which in true form has been initiated by the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen). It was nice to be reassured by the presence of the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). I thought that I was to miss out on our debates that usually take place on central America, but I was delighted to see that he had his central American clothing with him even if he did not have the usual text. It was also nice to realise that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) can take some time off from his fratricidal strife to fight the battle on a wider canvas.

I apologise to my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne). I am afraid that my classical scholarship does not extend as far as his with regard to the Carthaginian wars, but I am sure that he will be able to take me aside after the next debate—as I will be seeking Mr. Deputy Speaker's permission to speak yet again—to give me the classical side of the story.

It is only to be expected that Opposition Members will criticise the Government for not doing enough in this area. However, it must be depressing for them to have to continue to play the old gramophone record which may represent a convenient concensus as the hon. Member for Clackmannan stated, but which is a gramophone record that was rejected and thrown into the wastepaper basket for the second general election running by the voters. It was clear on 11 June that the voters throughout the country supported the Government's policy on defence and not that put forward by any of the many opposition parties that have now reappeared.

One of the foundation stones for these policies is the recognition that arms control negotiations, and nuclear arms control in particular, are about preserving security, even if we seek to do that by reducing the number of weapons on both sides. This Government will not compromise on that basic point. We do not believe in arms control which does not meet that basic criterion of reinforcing security. If that means that progress in arms control negotiations at times seems slow, that may be an inevitable consequence of the complexity of the issues with which we are dealing. To call for greater speed in the negotiations ignores the very real need to understand fully what is involved before committing ourselves to an agreement which is binding on the Alliance.

Another of the foundation stones of this Government's approach to arms control is the commitment to full consultations within the Alliance. I remind the House that we do not participate in the main nuclear arms control negotiations, the Geneva nuclear and space talks. Those are bilateral negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union, but in recognition of the consequences that nuclear arms reductions agreements will have for the security of the European Members of the Alliance, the United States has engaged in the most exemplary process of consultations within the Alliance. I remind the House that NATO is a free association of 16 democratic nations. We must all be given the opportunity to express our views on the conduct of the negotiations affecting our security.

Some may attempt to portray those consultations as European obstructionism, or European blocking of major agreements. Let me say frankly that it far better to resolve all the difficulties within the Alliance before the agreement is signed than to try to do so afterwards. That is what the consultation process is designed to achieve.

The Alliance is wholly committed to achieving an INF agreement, and in that context it continually assesses its nuclear capabilities. It does what is necessary to maintain deterrence. The United Kingdom is not holding back an INF agreement; on the contrary, we are a principal architect of such an agreement.

The House is rightly concerned about nuclear arms control. However, we should not forget the massive threat from Soviet chemical weapons—a threat that has built up despite the United Kingdom's unilateral renunciation of its own chemical warfare capability in the 1950s, and the unilateral United States moratorium since 1969. The dangers from those weapons are spreading. As two hon. Gentlemen have mentioned, my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, is currently in Geneva, and will be making major new proposals to move the negotiations forward with the practical steps that are necessary to make a chemical ban effective. I am delighted that we have received support from both sides of the House for what is a major British arms initiative.

Finally, the British Government——

In accordance with MR. SPEAKER'S ruling — (Official Report, 31 January 1983: Vol. 36, c. 19) the debate was concluded.

Overseas Civil Servants (Pensions)

2.36 am

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): I must first declare an interest. I served in the Colonial Service in Nigeria, and I derive a pension from my service there. Also I was a service man in the Royal Air Force during the war. I would therefore be a beneficiary of any change of policy that the Government might make as a result of the claim about which I intend to speak.

I welcome my hon. Friend the Minister to the debate. The subject has been raised before in the House—on 1 May last year—and I am fully aware of the official replies to the points that I intend to make. I have no quarrel with my hon. Friend. In the past, the claim has been raised at the highest level—Cabinet level—where it has been refused because, it is said, the money simply cannot be found to satisfy it. I believe, and I hope to persuade the House, that the Cabinet should be ashamed of its attitude.

All branches of the public service of this country, except one, are entitled to include war service in the computation of members' pensions when they retire. That provision was made to allow for the many people who, during the war, were taken on by the Home Civil Service. So that their position would not be prejudiced, members of the Civil Service who were called up were taken on as non-established staff without pension rights. Immediately after the war, it was decided that those with war service should be entitled to count half of it towards their total service for pension purposes, just as those who had non-established service were entitled to count half of theirs. That was seen as equality of treatment between civil servants who had done war service and those who had remained at home.

The principle was adopted in other branches of the public service, particularly in the 1970s, when it was extended to the police, local government, teachers and others. The Colonial Service, which is now called the Overseas Civil Service, was never included in that movement. Credit for war service that had been performed before the first appointment to the Colonial Service has never been given.

The question, therefore, is: why was the Overseas Civil Service excluded from this privilege, which had been given to every other civil and public servant? There are three possible reasons, and in dealing with the claim we may take our choice.

First, there was the legal fiction that a colonial officer was recruited in this country by the Secretary of State for the Colonies and to some extent trained here but that then he was sent to a colony which then, through its Government, employed him and were responsible for his conditions of service thereafter. Therefore, the British Government, not being the employer of colonial officers, never felt that they were responsible for the pensions of those officers. The colonial Governments, even when they became the Governments of independent Commonwealth territories, respected the pension rights of their expatriate staff, but they did not accept—at independence, at least—responsibility for war service that had been performed before the individual concerned joined their own service.

The Colonial Service officer was therefore denied the benefit of a privilege that, by the 1970s, had been extended to every other public servant. Naturally, independent Commonwealth Governments could not be asked to take responsibility for periods of time when their expatriate staff were not working for them. The British Government rested on the notion that they were not the employers and that the people concerned would therefore have to look elsewhere. That is inherently unjust, and that notion is no longer pursued by the Government.

The second line of argument is the one that I apprehend will be used by my hon. Friend the Minister: that the British Government cannot afford the cost. Cost is an element in this problem. The Overseas Development Administration is responsible for the pensions of 46,000 former Colonial Service officers. The additional money that would be required to pay for war service, together with other service, in the pensions of those people would have to be found from somewhere. One accepts that it should not be found from funds that are allocated to overseas aid. The Treasury would have to find the money. It is not overseas aid; it is a matter of honour.

The Overseas Development Administration believes that about 10 per cent. of the 46,000 officers had war service before their first appointment to the Colonial Service. Therefore, 4,600 officers might be entitled to claim an additional pension entitlement. A recent estimate of the cost was £3 million. However, on 1 May 1986 my hon. Friend, the then Minister of State, told me that the cost might be as much as £5 million, or even £6 million. There is no basis for his estimate, save for a glance at the files and the derivation of some evidence from individual cases. The cost element is exaggerated. We must remember that we are dealing with a declining number of people because they are mostly elderly.

The third argument that is somtimes advocated is that officers of the Overseas Civil Service, the old Colonial Service, do not deserve this privilege because of the special conditions that applied to them. Some say that they were so beneficial that they are not entitled to the privilege. Those reasons were touched on by the former Minister of State, who said that Colonial Service officers were entitled to retire earlier than Home Civil Service officers, at "55 rather than 60."—[Official Report, 1 May 1986; Vol. 96, c. 1187.]

He said nothing about the shorter careers for those who served in unfavourable climes, in particular, the notion that was well justified for a long time that west Africa was the white man's grave.

That is one alleged advantage. Another is that the commutation of pensions is possible with the Overseas Civil Service, particularly in places where the colony concerned is about to gain independence and the careers of the officers are brought to a premature end. That strikes me not as an advantage, but as a natural consequence of the British traditional policy of granting self-government and independence while ensuring that the pension interests of expatriate staff are respected.

A further argument is that those officers whose careers are brought to a premature end should be entitled to compensation for early retirement, which is not something that is generally accepted in the Home Civil Service. It was suggested by the then Minister of State that Colonial Service officers have the advantage of a second career, such as being a Member of Parliament.

It is true that there is a difference between the Overseas Civil Service and the rest of the public service, but the difference is that conditions overseas were inferior to almost every other branch of the service. It is not and was not an easy life. In general, low levels of pay applied because the salary scales were adjusted not to United Kingdom levels but to what the colony could afford. Therefore, that often being a matter of local negotiation, salaries tended to be rather low.

It was a short career and there were adverse climatic conditions, poor health services and few amenities. The typical colonial officer endured malaria, dysentery and typhoid as normal occupational hazards. I caught typhus when I was out in the bush and my wife saved my life by taking me to the hospital at the provincial headquarters. One night our house in the bush was burnt down by an arsonist who had a grudge against my predecessor. We endured plagues and suffered all manner of pestilence. Every colonial officer led a similar life and loved it because we had the satisfaction of working directly and personally to improve the conditions of life for the people among whom we worked.

We in the Colonial Service with our African friends spent our time digging deep concrete-lined wells to get pure water. We built bush roads to enable lorries to use them and so stimulate trade. We organised the schools. We improved farms. We talked to, trained and helped the people of the colonies to govern themselves. We gave no thought to things like pensions. Most of the people of whom I speak are now elderly, living in the United Kingdom on the pensions that they earned during their service. It is a matter of shame that they, who ruled the empire so well, should be denied the privilege allowed to the most junior clerk in a town hall. The amount of money involved, whatever it is, would make a small, but significant, difference to their lives. It is a matter not of affordability; it is a debt of honour. Why is it not paid?

2.50 am

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and the small remaining band of happy warriors look so comfortable at nearly three in the morning that I am sure you will be disappointed to hear that I shall be brief. I should like to follow up a few of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook). I start by declaring an indirect interest. Most of my mother's relations were overseas servants with the Colonial Service and its sister services and at least one would be a beneficiary of the proposed measure, were it ever to be adopted.

I have little to add to my hon. Friend's eloquent points. It is appropriate that we should debate this matter here. One of the principal aims, perhaps the principal one, of the Colonial Service was to bring this sort of democracy to many parts of the world. This Chamber has been duplicated in some 40 or 50 countries as a result of the work of the Colonial Service.

Life in the Colonial Service was tough. I pay particular tribute to the section to which my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington belonged. He worked in west Africa. To show how tough conditions were, I should like to give an example of an organisation that did not draw on the public purse. Recently, I heard a talk by a missionary from west Africa who told me that, in the part of Africa in which he served, none of the first missionaries to start work in the 1920s, not so long ago, survived for more than 18 months. The oldest was 36. It was, indeed, a hard life.

The war service of many overseas pensioners was not easy. It is an extraordinary anomaly that these people who gave the best part of their lives to serving their country should lose up to a quarter of their pension rights because they chose to spend part of that time serving in our armed forces.

I shall not labour the point. The hour is late. The Government have a good record in war service matters. For examply, it is this Government who, for the first time in 40 years, took the firm decision that war widows' pensions would be paid tax-free and this Government who have taken a number of steps to give much better treatment to members of the armed forces, regular and territorial, who while serving in uniform suffer injuries caused by enemy forces or accident. With this good record, it is sad that this one anomaly has been allowed to continue. I urge the Government to look at it again.

2.54 am

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): There are many anomalies in public sector pay and pensions rather than the single one to which the hon. and new Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), who opposes the Channel tunnel, referred.

There are considerable anomalies in the pay of temporary civil servants. I know from personal experience. In the 1960s, I was invited to advise a Prime Minister for pay equivalent to a student grant. When I took the matter up with the establishment officer, I was told that many people would regard it as a privilege to advise the Prime Minister. I said that it was, but that I could not afford to subsidise the experience. That attitude seems to have persisted in certain sectors of the Civil Service. It is regarded as a privilege to serve one's country and bad luck if one's pension is not properly funded.

I can think of other anomalies. Ministers have Departments and several thousand staff. Shadow Ministers, if they are lucky, have one, or half of one, research assistant. The Minister is able to travel on the approval of his superiors and take private staff. The shadow Minister has no budget on which to travel. Shadow Ministers for foreign affairs or overseas development cannot even get public funding for a telephone on which to make overseas calls. They cannot even get a postage stamp.

There are many people who gave war service—and were taken from their jobs to do it — and whose pensions were not funded for that period. Many fought through the war without gaining any public sector pension. Others gave their lives. I appreciate the point about war widows' pensions. That was an outstanding anomaly.

There is an anomaly here, however, which previous Governments probably should have addressed. It is a matter of diminishing and not major cost, and the Government should consider meeting at least in part, the claims concerned. I had to leave the Chamber briefly while the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) was speaking, so I do not know whether he referred to hardship cases, but the Government should address that matter.

Many of the colonies may not have appreciated that they were enjoying what the hon. Member for Orpington called progress towards democracy. Rather, they saw their natural resources being extracted and exported at prices which were not reflected in the pay of those who drew them from the ground. Often, as a condition of independence, those countries had to pay pensions to former civil servants. That is quite wrong, as some of those countries now face falling commodity prices and heavy debt burdens.

I agree with the hon. Member for Orpington that any funds that might be forthcoming should not be regarded as part of the aid budget.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I take it that the Minister has the leave of the House to speak again.

2.59 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) on raising yet again this topic. I remember some years ago attending a meeting when he first raised the issue privately with my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison), who was at that time the Minister for Overseas Development. My hon. Friend has again argued eloquently and forcefully the case that post-war entrants to the Colonial Service should be able, like other British civil service groups, to reckon half of their military service for pension purposes.

As the House knows, this is a somewhat specialised and narrow issue and sadly, but inevitably, we are bound to traverse much of the same ground, as my hon. Friend predicted, that was covered in the Adjournment debate on 1 May last year. My right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury replied to that debate and attempted to put the issue into historical context. It would be helpful if I recapitulated some of the points made on that occasion because I believe that the background is rather more complex than has been presented tonight.

First, it is important to recall why the concession on war service for pension purposes was introduced. The Superannuation Act 1935 provided that the unestablished services staff who subsequently became established without a break in service should reckon at one half its length for superannuation purposes. Recruitment to the Home Civil Service during the second world war was on an unestablished basis. The concession introduced for the Home Civil Service in 1946, therefore, was to remove an anomaly that would otherwise have arisen between wartime and post-war entrants to the service. Recruitment to the Colonial Service during the second world war was on a much smaller scale but generally continued along "normal lines". In other words, unlike the Home Civil Service, appointments could be made on pensionable terms. Although no hard and fast conclusions can be drawn, it appeared that the anomaly in the Home Civil Service that needed to be corrected by the 1946 concession did not arise in the Colonial Service.

It has been suggested that the Colonial Office, which retained control over pension matters until a colony achieved independence, may have overlooked the need to ask colonies to amend their legislation to allow war service to count as pensionable service. I think this scenario unlikely. The recruitment literature at the time gave details of a salary scheme for war service that stated quite specifically that war service before appointment to the Colonial Service would not count as colonial service for purposes of a pension. Post-war entrants to the Colonial Service thus had no expectation at the time of their appointment that war service would count towards their pension. I cannot accept the argument therefore that, by withholding the concession, the Government are defaulting on their obligations.

Expectations among this group of pensioners may have changed because of developments in the 1970s. However, those circumstances are not identical. The public service groups to whom the war service concession was extended during the 1970s – teachers, health workers and so on – have contributory pension schemes. Beneficiaries were required to make a contribution to the cost of implementing the concession. Colonial Service pensions, for officers at least, were non-contributory. Additional public expenditure resources have to be found, therefore, if the war service concession is to be extended to this group of pensioners.

I do not believe that it is sensible to characterise the public services as a single amorphous body. The Home Civil Service and other United Kingdom public services, the Indian Civil Service, the Sudan Service, the Diplomatic Service and the Colonial Service are distinct entities. Conditions of service differ in all kinds of ways, as do superannuation arrangements. In some respects, the arrangements for the colonial service were more advantageous than those of the Home Civil Service. For instance, colonial pension accrual rates were higher and retirement ages were lower. Admittedly, as my hon. Friend made clear, this was in part a reflection of the harsh conditions in tropical areas, but in many respects the post-war years saw steady improvements in those conditions.

Colonial service pensions are index-linked from the age of 55 rather than from the age of 60. Many officers retired at independence, some with immediate payment of pension, while still at an age to begin successful second careers, even if all could not follow my hon. Friend. It is difficult to argue, therefore, that, as a group, Colonial Service pensioners have fared significantly worse than their peers in the United Kingdom public services. Similarly, there is no case for treating them automatically as on all fours with those groups in superannuation arrangements.

The case for granting war service credit to Colonial Service officers in the immediate post-war years, therefore, was clearly not considered self-evident. Extending that concession now to that group of pensioners would, as my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington has admitted, hold an additional public expenditure commitment, unlike the United Kingdom public service groups, to whom it was extended during the 1970s. I am afraid that we do not accept that the cost of the extension of the concession is trivial, even though it may be trivial to the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland), to whom an amount between £3 million and £6 million, to accept my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington's estimate of the cost, must pale into insignificance compared with the £34 billion extra spending commitment that was made during the election campaign by his party.

Mr. Stuart Holland rose

Mr. Eggar: On the basis of a sample survey of almost 1,000 personal files completed last year

Mr. Holland rose

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister is not giving way.

Mr. Holland rose

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is clear that the Minister is not giving way.

Mr. Eggar: —we estimate that perhaps 5,000 to 6,000 pensioners could be eligible at a cost of about £5 million to £6 million. That is our best estimate. Information on war service in a significant number of cases was either incomplete or lacking so the estimate is subject to a wide margin of error.

I know, as my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington is aware, that the Overseas Service Pensioners Association is not persuaded that the cost would be so high and argues that a figure of £3 million a year is more realistic. Nevertheless we are satisfied that our sample survey, which gives the figure of £5 million to £6 million, gives an adequate order of magnitude that is sufficiently accurate for present purposes.

Mr. Holland: Had the Minister left me alone I would not have intervened. However, he has been saying that there is an anomaly here and an anomaly there and that certain things are not self-evident. What is quite evident is that the Government will not address the quite reasonable claim that is being made and are not prepared to come forward with the funding when it is inconsistent with the rest of what has happened. As to whether £3 million is sizeable or not, the Minister may recollect that I said that, although it may not be the case that that should be met in full, it certainly seems that there is an anomaly. That is evident but the Minister simply wants to avoid the point.

Mr. Eggar: The whole point of what I was saying is that it is not possible to compare directly the Colonial Service with service in the other public services. There are a great number of differences, to some of which I have drawn attention.

With regard to the question as to whether £3 million or £5 million to £6 million, which is our estimate, is a significant sum, I am interested that the hon. Gentleman suggests that part payment should be made without telling the House how he would go about deciding which part. Would he select specific pensioners for special treatment or would he pay only a quarter of war service credits? He cannot get away with an airy fairy assertion that he would try to be reasonably prudent. He was coming out with almost an alliance-type policy. I would have expected a more robust and clearer statement from the Opposition Front Bench. [Interruption.] The only alliance Member who has been around has spoken once so, unfortunately, is unable to contribute to our debate. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) wanted an evening off from his fratricidal strife and he has to come in to address the House on the question of nuclear weapon controls.

The claim, which has been argued so forcefully by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington, has been considered carefully in previous public expenditure survey discussions. So far, the Government have not felt able to accommodate the extra commitment. That remains the position, although, as my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington knows, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and my hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development are keeping the matter under close review. I am sure that the points that were raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Orpington and for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) will be given due consideration. However, I regret that I cannot give any undertaking as to whether or when the Government might be prepared to allow the reckoning of war service for pension purposes for former members of the Colonial Service.

Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act 1987

3.10 am

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate the poll tax once again. I deliberately call the tax a poll tax, in spite of the Government calling it a community charge, because that is how it is known north of the border. The more it is debated in England and Wales, the more well known it is as a poll tax. In fact, the Prime Minister gave it that description not so long ago.

I clearly recall the debate on Second Reading on 9 December 1986 when there was no shortage of Tory Members who supported the poll tax. In fact, Michael Ancram delivered the winding-up speech. He steered the legislation through Committee. He was supported by Michael Hirst, who represented Strathkelvin and Bearsden, Alex Fletcher from Edinburgh, Central, Barry Henderson, Gerald Malone, John MacKay, Albert McQuarrie, Alexander Pollock, John Corrie, and Peter Fraser. All those former Members welcomed the tax. They said that it was the greatest thing since sliced bread and that the people of Scotland would queue up to vote for the Government. Two reasons why those people no longer represent constituencies are the destruction of our industrial base in traditional industries in Scotland and the high level of unemployment, particularly among the young, that is hitting the people of Scotland. Another reason must be the poll tax. In places such as Edinburgh and Strathkelvin and Bearsden, people realised just what the Tories were going to foist on them. The guinea pig was to be not the whole of the United Kingdom, but Scotland. Voters were queueing up to vote for Labour candidates.

Even some present Conservative Members did not do too well. They all sang the praises of the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth), who is not here to defend the poll tax for which he campaigned before other Tories in Scotland even thought about it. He did not do too well either. At the 1983 election, he had a 5,000 majority, but that fell to 900 at the last election. The Secretary of State for Defence, the right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger), did not do too well. A few more votes for Labour and he would have been out. The only thing that saved him was the fact that, for many years, he has played the role of the perfect gentleman. Certainly, the poll tax did not help him. Even the Secretary of State for Scotland did not do too well. The arrogance that the Government displayed throughout Second Reading and in Committee was such that the people of Scotland considered that the legislation was the final blow to them. It was a final attack on their standards of living. I am surprised by that.

The reason why I am here at this time of the morning is to put on record that we are now getting English Conservative Members of Parliament saying that there will be a revolt of Tory Back Benchers against the poll tax. I note that the Whip is nodding his head and saying that that is not true, but the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and a former Cabinet Minister are on record as saying that they do not like the poll tax. In fact, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) stated that on two occasions within Cabinet and argued against such a tax. Even the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) got into the act.

I am glad to see that there are converts to the argument that the Opposition have been putting forward, but it is a pity that some of the former Members I mentioned went through the Division Lobby in support of the Scottish Tories to impose the tax in Scotland. Their credibility and standing in the community would have been far better had they been prepared to say at that time that they were not interested in seeing the tax imposed in any part of the United Kingdom.

It is shameful that the Tories who are against the tax should say, "Why don't we let it be tried in Scotland?". I take exception to the community that I represent and the people of Scotland being used as guinea pigs. If the Government are putting forward the argument that the tax is much better than rates, it should be implemented throughout the United Kingdom at the same time.

The hardship it will cause is such that people in local government, who are not elected to take part in our political arguments here, are now coming out and saying that this will cause hardship in Scotland, and in England and Wales, if it is implemented in England and Wales.

The director of finance for the Glasgow district council, Mr. William English, who is respected in local government circles throughout the country, has said about the rating crisis in Glasgow that if the poll tax were introduced tomorrow it would mean that every person over the age of 18 would have to find £292. Many households in my constituency contain at least five adults and they would each have to pay £292, which means that one household would be required to pay £1,460 a year, not including any rates rises imposed. That would impose a great deal of hardship on many families.

This will apply in housing estates, where the people are among the poorest, but I know that the Minister will say that housing estates are the responsibility of the authority. I do not want him marking any part of my constituency, because the part of Glasgow in which I was brought up as a boy was mentioned as a deprived area so often that the place got a bad name. I have no intention of giving any place a bad name. I mean no disrespect to the people of Possilpark in my constituency, but the area was built in the period between the wars. The people were taken out of the worst slums in Glasgow. They were so poor that the old Glasgow corporation had to give them furniture. They did not have beds, tables or chairs. Those problems of generations ago still exist in Possilpark. When I was in that area during the election, I found that, although there was a good community spirit, the people were the first to admit that there were many problems. The poorest people in Scotland reside in that community, yet the Minister is expecting some families to pay £1,460 in poll tax. That is neither right nor fair. There are not many hon. Members in the Chamber this morning. However, I hope that when hon. Members read Hansard they will recognise that hardship will be imposed on many families.

The Minister will no doubt say that the Government will take care of low-income families and that provision will be made for those on supplementary benefit. However, we have not heard the full story of what will happen to those on low incomes—those in the catering, retail and garment industries, where the Government have abolished the wages councils that protected the workers. Some people are working in sweated conditions and are being exploited day by day. More and more the story is coming out that people are hired one day and sacked the next. They are on very low incomes; some are lucky to earn £70 a week gross. The Government keep repeating the magical figure of 20 per cent. as being all that they will have to pay. The Government are distorting the picture because it is a minimum of 20 per cent. Some people on low incomes will be required to pay up to 95 per cent. of the poll tax because of the sliding scale. I want to put on record that the 20 per cent. that the Government keep mentioning is not the full picture.

[Mr. Michael J. Martin]

As I have often mentioned in the House, my area used to have a booming railway industry. It was once the finest railway engineering construction site in the country, and it was famous throughout the world for its expertise. Many people were pensioned off from that industry, and I know that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, are familiar with such pensioners. They were labourers in the workshops and did not earn big money, but they got a bit of a pension. That was compulsory. They retired with two pensions, and they live with dignity and respect because of that extra income. Under the poll tax, they will not pay the minimum of 20 per cent. That bit of extra pension will be taken into consideration and some of them will be required to pay more than the 20 per cent. that the Government quote. There will be difficulties in communities throughout the land. I hope that the Minister will consider these matters seriously, as they were not properly debated in Committee. It will be the downfall of the Tories in Scotland.

The effect on local government is devastating. The Government say that high-spending local authorities will have the most to complain about and that those that are prudent and behave themselves have nothing to fear from the poll tax. That is nonsense. As I have said, Mr. William English, who is highly regarded as Glasgow's director of finance, has put the facts and figures to CoSLA, to various local authorities throughout the country and to Ministers, and, as I understand it, his figures have not been contradicted. I should explain that Mr. English is extremely worried.

The Secretary of State for Scotland, in his first speech in the House after the general election, congratulated Glasgow on the good work that it was doing. In his position of Secretary of State he took credit for what had taken place. He cannot say that irresponsible local authorities have the most to worry about and then congratulate Glasgow when he knows that Glasgow is complaining about the tax. However, he has congratulated the city on its housing initiatives, its garden festival and other projects. The right hon. and learned Gentleman talks about irresponsible authorities, but he is on record as saying that Glasgow is not irresponsible.

The bureaucracy in my native city of Glasgow will be a nightmare. The rates system, with all its faults, was a property tax that was relatively simple to collect. A tax was imposed on every building or house. Glasgow officials now have to start worrying about second homes, for example, because they will attract a different tax from that levied on first homes. If hon. Members are fortunate enough to have accommodation in London and a second home in Glasgow, difficulties will be created for local government officials. There are not many hon. Members in that position, but the issue of first and second homes will worry officials.

In Glasgow, 560,000 people will be required to pay the poll tax. Only half that number are paying rates. The population in a city such as Glasgow is constantly on the move, and that is also the situation in Dundee. In Aberdeen, with the oil industry, the movement must cause an even greater headache for local government officials. The poll tax will be easily avoidable, and there will be those who are on the move who will avoid it. There will be those who forget to register and others who move and forget to register at their new home, for example. There will be those who avoid the tax deliberately and others who overlook registration. It is calculated that in our major cities about 20 per cent. of the tax will not be collected as a result of unemployment and associated difficulties.

About 80 per cent. of local government expenditure will come under the control of central Government. The rate support grant, which is one of the main sources of income for local authorities, and all other grants will be controlled by the Government. That will mean that the remaining 20 per cent. will be the only area in which local authorities will be entitled to implement a rise.

Critics of the Labour party will say that local authorities should have thought about increases, but time and again the Secretary of State has said that he will make allowances for inflation. However, this year, with the manual workers' pay increase and the teachers' pay award, we are aware that the allowances made by the Secretary of State have resulted in a shortfall in local government finance. Once the poll tax has been introduced, the increased demands on local government finance will be put on the domestic rate. The local authorities will not be allowed to put the increase—an increase caused through no fault of the authorities—on to the non-domestic rate. The poll tax will place an unfair burden on local authorities.

I envisage that families will be split up because of the poll tax. Those who want to stay together—most do—will face intolerable pressure. That pressure will result from the fact that, as a result of the poll tax, each boy or girl over the age of 18 will be expected to fork out about £300. There will be terrible pressure on parents to ask their sons or daughters to leave home.

The poll tax will bring back the days of the depression. I have no memory of those days, but my parents have bitter memories. I clearly recall my mother and father telling me stories about old communities where, because people's means-test money was being cut, young boys and girls were asked ot leave home so that some extra money from the parish could be allowed into the house.

Because families will face a charge of £300 per person, young boys and girls will be asked to move out. Some responsible young people, who will say that they do not want their parents to be burdened with their problems, will leave home. That already occurs because of unemployment, and the Government are putting more pressure on the poorer families.

In Committee we heard talk of summary warrants. Such warrants will be discussed again and again as more and more people do not and cannot pay up. Because of the problems in our society we have witnessed the welcome sight of lawyers moving their offices from the city centres to the main streets of housing estates. However, in Glasgow and other cities we have seen the establishment of offices for people who are messengers-at-arms and sheriff officers. I have no desire to see sheriff officers moving into premises in a housing estate. However, the poll tax will encourage that development.

I can also envisage that some local authorities, which support the Government at the moment, will offer rewards to neighbours to tell on those neighbours whose sons and daughters are staying at home and who are, therefore, not paying enough poll tax. At the moment we have detector vans going round to find out whether people are watching television without a licence. Will we see detector vans going round our cities and rural areas finding out if there are more people living in a house than there are paying the poll tax?

The Minister should go back to his boss, the Secretary of State, and tell him that the people of Scotland have rejected the policies of the Tory party, including the poll tax, and that this legislation should be taken away, forgotten about and buried, along with the Tory candidates who lost their seats at the recent election.

3.34 am

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): The most remarkable aspect of the poll tax was that the Tories thought that it would be a vote winner in Scotland. They told 2 million voters that if the Tories won the election, they would have to pay a tax that they had never paid before, and then they were astonished when those people voted Labour. I ask the two Conservative Members who are present to reflect carefully on that, not only to save their colleagues' skins on a future polling day but to consider how far out of touch the Conservative party must have been with Scottish public opinion. They went on to force the legislation through despite all the warnings from opinion polls in Scotland, from the Scottish media and the advice of all the professional bodies that are involved in rating valuation and local government accountancy.

It was with some bitter amusement that earlier tonight I sat here and listened to Conservative Members raise all sorts of questions about the poll tax as it would apply to England and Wales. Clearly, they did not think too strenously about those points before they voted last May to apply them to Scotland. Nevertheless, if they are having second thoughts now, I hope sincerely that they will be big enough to recognise that if it is wrong for England and Wales it is wrong for Scotland also.

However, I fear that those Conservative Members who are conscience-striken are struck merely by the size of the Tory defeat in Scotland. They will be outweighed by the number who do not understand local government finance but who are prepared to toe the line, and by those who understand very well that the entire idea is not about fairness but is, in reality, about enforcing lower council spending, cutting jobs and services and making Labour councils take stick from their electorate for implementing Tory policies.

Conservative Members have argued that the rating system is unfair. Nobody ever said that it was more than rough justice, but the price of one's dwelling is a rough and ready guide to one's wealth. If fairness were truly the problem, why did the Government come up with a scheme that is so monstrously unfair? If simplicity were the aim, why devise a scheme that the local government accountants have described as an administrative nightmare? If this is a supposedly simple alternative to rates, there are difficulties that Conservative Members representing seats in England and Wales may not yet have considered. People who move in and out of institutions will end up paying their own community charge and a contribution to the institution's collective charge. What about the separated spouse who finds his or herself "jointly and severally" responsible for the ex-partner's bill? What happened to the idea of every individual being liable for his or her own tax?

I wonder whether the Minister has considered the impracticability of enforcing the responsibilities of the designated responsible person on a household because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) mentioned earlier, people who are accustomed to the present system of an annually updated voters' roll will not — if they think about it at all — realise that the new register is a rolling one. Such a person will perhaps not notify the council, but the council will discover that that person is there and he will be presented with a bill for the full backdated amount, plus interest, plus £50 penalty or a penalty of 30 per cent. of the debt if that is more than £50. People with no intention of evading, and who are no more disorganised than the average Member of Parliament, will end up with substantial debts.

Can the House imagine a local authority pursuing all the small debts that will arise? I shall outline briefly some of the possible cases. They may include claimants and pensioners who have not paid the few pounds that they owe under the 20 per cent. rule, people who are homeless or who move from place to place frequently, young people with no independent income of their own, or carers who will be forced to take responsibility for their dependants' financial affairs.

Chasing up such people will cost a disproportionate amount of money and create public criticism of the council, not of the Government, who created the mess in the first place. It is a highly ingenious scheme and I give full marks to the Machiavellian who thought it up. Either the council will chase up those debts and receive public odium for its pains, or it will do without and either increase the poll tax of those who do pay, or of course, be forced to cut services and jobs when it was elected to protect them.

Another possibility is that all this administrative chaos will be avoided by having a comprehensive national register with computers keeping tracks of everyone's whereabouts. If hon. Members think that that is far-fetched, the Institute of Cost and Management Accountants has already warned of the need for a supplementary national register if the poll tax is to work. Where do we end up next? with identity cards for one and all.

Conservative Members have claimed that individual poll taxes will be high only if allegedly profligate Labour-controlled councils impose too high a level of spending, but the facts contradict them. Glasgow district council, of which I was until recently a member and on which I spent four years as deputy convenor of finance, held its rates steady for three years and this year declared a small reduction. The average rate bill is £514 and notice that I said "bill", not "rateable value". The former seemed to confuse Conservative Members on a previous occasion. The city accountants calculate that the poll tax will be £292 per head, so a two adult household will pay more than before and where there is a third adult a further £292 will be payable.

The national business rate has not yet been mentioned. If the plight of carers, young people without an independent income, the mentally handicapped and the homeless does not make an impact on Conservative

[Mrs. Maria Fyfe]

Members, perhaps the pleas of small businessmen will. The standard business rate will penalise businesses in the lower-rated, mainly rural areas. According to the National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses, it would mean 50 per cent. increases in local tax bills. That would remove one of the few incentives that many rural councils can offer to businesses to encourage them into their patch. There will be a loss of business to those trades, fewer jobs and rural local economies will be further run down.

Many English and Welsh Conservative Members will have voted for the Act in Scotland in ignorance of its impact on our country. They must be presumed to have acted in ignorance of its electoral impact on Scotland. Last week a Government spokesman said that the poll tax had not made the Tories any more unpopular than they already were from the revaluation exercise. Indeed, he though the detected a minimal increase in support by the time the election came round. He should chew on the poll figures for himself and not rely on being bottle fed by a civil servant's not too well researched brief.

I ask Tory Members whether they want all these problems in England and Wales too. Does not the scale of their Scottish defeat create just a niggle of doubt about their own safety? Would they have believed it if anyone had told them before the election that the right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger), the Secretary of State for Defence, would have his majority reduced to less than 200? Will they not accept that if they persist in treating Scotland as a laboratory for their experiments before trying out proposals in England they can hardly claim with any credibility that they believe in the concept of a United Kingdom?

The Government should support the contention of my hon. Friend the Member for Springburn and be prepared to withdraw the Act and start again on local government financing in a way which takes account of the needs and views of the people who elected us and who also elected local authorities to govern locally, not merely to act as administrative outposts of the regime in power at Westminster today.

3.47 am

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): There can be little doubt that the concept of imposing a poll tax in Scotland proved to be one of the most unpopular acts of the previous Government, and the results of that were seen at the general election. As a candidate during the campaign I was aware that the poll tax, as it has become known, was a major issue at public meetings, on doorsteps and at every workplace that I visited. The public as a whole has responded angrily to the concept put forward by the Government.

In a parliamentary reply only last Wednesday the Minister indicated that the Secretary of State had received 966 individual responses and 240 responses from organisations about the proposals. The Minister declined to break those figures down to who was in favour and who was against, but it is widely known that the vast majority of the responses were hostile. Certainly those responses recorded in the press showed that many of the major organisations in Scotland from COSLA to the Association of Assessors were very dubious about the Government's plans.

Opposition to the proposal did not come simply from the supporters of Opposition parties in the general election campaign. Many Conservative supporters expressed concern, doubts and antagonism over the proposals. It is insulting for the Government to assume that all Tory voters cast their votes on the issue of greed. Many Tory voters were conscience stricken and horrified by the implications of the tax as it was proposed. The poll tax flies against the whole idea of a tax based on the ability to pay.

During the election campaign in the constituency of Moray — a seat previously held by a member of the Committee on the poll tax Bill — we analysed three different areas in the main town of Elgin to assess the implications of the poll tax. We considered three different areas — a leafy suburb with large detached villas, a section dominated by terraced houses in th centre of town representing the kind of house which is often the first home of a married couple, and finally we considered a section of the council estates. We found that those in council houses would suffer most under the new arrangements, the people in terraced houses would suffer next and very few in the leafy suburbs would benefit. The analysis was based on the electoral register and on those registered within the community to vote and therefore eligible to pay tax. It seemed that virtually everyone would suffer, but the penalty would fall most severely on those least able to pay — those who lived on council estates. That analysis is true of all sections in Scotland. This regressive tax is alien to the whole concept and psyche of the Scottish people. The Minister should take it away and rethink it.

Will the Minister tell us how he intends to respond to the Church of Scotland and to other churches about their concern over the poll tax? In a written answer last week it was revealed that 32 churches had written to the Minister. They asked what had happened to the original promise given during the debate in the last Parliament and in the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government," to preserve the benefit of the existing rate relief for charities in the form of a discount from collective community charges. They view with dismay the failure of the Government to honour the undertaking in the Abolition of Domestic Rates etc. (Scotland) Act 1987. The churches have been active on this issue and they wrote to the Minister. In his reply, he said that the present reliefs available to churches in respect of non-domestic rates will continue. Will the Minister spell out explicitly what that means? He has not given a straight answer to the request to know whether the initial promise in the Green Paper has been observed by the Government.

I want the Minister to comment briefly on the non-domestic rates and their implications for Scotland. At present, rates are still based on rateable values. The Government admitted in the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" that business rates in Scotland were paid at a generally higher level than elsewhere. No concession has been made in the interim, although the Government accepted and conceded the argument when the sports clubs stated that they were placed in an unenviable position because they were expected to pay at a higher level. Has the Minister considered the possibility of granting some interim relief to the many small businesses in Scotland which are now in a perilous position?

There has been no effective response from the Government to the pleas of small businesses that the uniform rate envisaged in the Abolition of Domestic Rates

Etc. (Scotland) Act will be a disadvantage to the rural communities. In Moray, many businesses are concerned that they will be unable to sustain the uniform rate applicable throughout the length and breadth of the country because those businesses do not have access to the larger markets experienced by their counterparts in larger cities. That would be a gross disadvantage to rural communities, and it would lead yet again to rural clearances and the rundown of the rural economy.

As the daughter of a ploughman, I also wonder what thought has been given to how farm workers are expected to pay the community charge. Can we expect farmers to give each farm worker an additional £250 for every member of his family living in the tied cottage who is eligible for rates? It would be nice to think that they would, but I suspect that farm workers will be expected to find the money out of their wages, which are still appallingly low in comparison with those of most other workers.

What will happen to the crofting communities of Scotland, which have previously received 50 per cent. exemption from paying rates? What concession will be made to them? Are we to expect yet another highland clearance?

Those are all major points on which the Minister must come clean if he is intent on pursuing the folly of ensuring that the poll tax is imposed in Scotland.

The Scottish National party has always argued that the funding of local government should come through a local income tax. That would ensure that taxation was related to people's ability to pay. It seems ludicrous to me that the Government did not even consider a feasibility study on how local income tax could be implemented. Some European nations operate such a system. Are we so different that we cannot implement it?

The Labour party—at least, according to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) — is determined to stand

"on the plank of retaining rates." — [Official Report, 25 June 1987; Vol. 118, c. 124.]

I believe that most people understand the anomalies that were abhorrent in the previous system. In my view, the poll tax is a much worse system. Surely we want to eradicate the anomalies of the previous system and bring forward a much more positive and radical approach to the funding of local government.

Finally, let me say to the Minister that the people of Scotland object very strongly to the idea that they should be used as guinea pigs in this exercise. Over the past two weeks, I have been appalled to read many reports from senior members of the Conservative party, both inside and outside the House, arguing that the poll tax should not be implemented south of the border until there has been an opportunity to examine how it has operated in Scotland. That is surely an arrogant attitude to take towards the people of Scotland. The Act of Union of 1707 stated that they would be taxed equally with their neighbours south of the border, but we now have unequal taxation, which brings into disrepute the Act of Union to which the Minister so loyally adheres.

More appropriately, if the Government had any concern for the well-being of the community of Scotland, they would take away this ridiculous legislation and bring forward the local income tax concept of other European nations. They would ensure that the people of Scotland were given a system that enabled them to pay for the local government that they wish, without penalising the poorest sections of society.

3.53 am

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Let me first thank my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) for raising this important issue, and congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) and the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) on their contributions. I also congratulate the Minister first on his promotion, and secondly—perhaps more important—on being one of the few Scottish Tories to survive the general election. He must be proud of the fact that his position was not as seriously eroded as were those of most of his Scottish colleagues.

When we debate the abolition of domestic rates in Scotland we have to examine the failure of the Scottish Conservative party. My hon. Friends have already said that this was the Act that was to save the Tory party in Scotland and bring about its revival. It was the major plank of the Tories' election campaign. Except for his election address, the only leaflet that was distributed by my Conservative opponent in Cathcart dealt with the poll tax. That was true of most Scottish constituencies. Leaflets drew attention to the benefits of the poll tax and the horrors of the rating system.

Despite the claim that everybody would benefit from the poll tax, the people of Scotland firmly rejected it. My hon. Friend the Member for Springburn read out the roll of dishonour. He referred to those who had lost their seats. It was right that he should do so. However, my hon. Friend did not mention that seven of the 10 or 11 Tories who were members of the Standing Committee that dealt with the Bill lost their seats. Mr. Michael Ancram, the lead Minister, the man who staked his political career on the poll tax, lost his seat. The Whip, Mr. Malone, who guided the Bill through its Committee stage, also lost his seat. Now there is a "Scottish" Whip who does not even represent a Scottish constituency. Mr. Michael Hirst, one of the most vociferous supporters of the poll tax, lost his seat. Strathkelvin and Bearsden has the highest average domestic rate bill in the United Kingdom. If any area in Scotland stood to benefit from the poll tax, it was Bearsden, but Mr. Hirst lost his seat.

When this Government put the poll tax up front in their election campaign, the Scottish people told them what to do with it. It is an insult to democracy and to the people of Scotland to allow the poll tax to continue. When she answered a question that I put to her last Thursday, the Prime Minister asked me whether I was proud to be a Member of the United Kingdom Parliament. The implication was that the United Kingdom Parliament passed the Bill and that therefore everything was all right, was it not? I am not proud to be a Member of a United Kingdom Parliament when the Government so obviously ignore the democratic wishes of a major nation that forms part of the United Kingdom. "The United Kingdom" means three or four kingdoms that are united. Scotland is one of those kingdoms.

If the Government had had any morality or any sense of democracy they would have said in the Queen's Speech that they intended to introduce a limited Bill to repeal the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act 1987. If they do not do so, they will face enormous problems—for example, over the register. I do not intend to rehearse all the arguments about the fairness or unfairness of the rating system. I disagree with the hon. Member for Moray about local income tax. Most countries have some form of property tax. That is what rates are. The point that rates are grossly unfair does not stand up to close scrutiny. The Government have completely misinterpreted the figures for the number of people who pay. They can get down to their figure of 21 per cent. of people who do not pay rates only by using the people who received rebates, partial rebates or by using those instances where husbands or wives are the ratepayers. The number of people in Scotland who are liable to pay rates, if husbands and wives are included, is about 79 per cent. of the population. Only 21 per cent. of the population is not liable to pay anything towards the rates, assuming that a young adult who is living with his parents makes no contribution towards the rate bill, which in many cases is unfair on the young person.

The present system of rates is not an unfair tax, but the poll tax will shift the rates burden from those who are better off to those who are poor. The Government say that it is unfair for a widow who is living in a big house to pay the same as a family of five people. I have calculated some figures relating to my constituency. In Corrour road there are two adjacent properties. In one lives a widow who is paying £1,500 in rates. The Government would say that that is an unfair burden, but I know that she is a wealthy widow who has been left very well off and that she can afford to pay that amount. Next door is a family of five adults. They are also paying £1,500 in rates. If one calculates the sums involved, the widow will be over £20 a week better off under the poll tax. She will pay only some £290 instead of £1,500. But what about the family of five adults next door? They will be paying some £1,300 a year, which is less than they are paying now. The well-off large family will still be better-off. The widow will be much better-off, the family will be marginally better-off, but they will both be better-off.

Who will pay for the family and the widow to be better-off? It will be people such as another widow who lives in my constituency in Castlemilk. That widow will be worse off because whereas at the moment she pays nothing because she receives a full rates rebate she will now have to pay a minimum of 20 per cent. That 20 per cent. will have to make up for the wealthy widow being £20 a week better-off.

The widow in Castlemilk will conscientiously keep herself on the register, but it will be extremely difficult for local authorities to compile that register. During the election I knocked on a door in Hillpark in my constituency and the lady who answered the door said that she was voting for me. I looked at the register and asked whether her son was voting for me and she said, "Yes." I said, "What about Mr. and Mrs. Parker who live here?" She said, "No, they do not live here, they were the previous tenants and they moved to England three years ago." Yet they were still on the electoral register.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: Track them down.

Mr. Maxton: That may happen, but who will track them down?

Despite all the denials in Committee, there is no question but that the major source of information for the poll tax register will be the electoral register. The person who compiles the poll tax register will have to choose between employing large numbers of people or obtaining the information from the electoral register. Finance officers in the Lothian region say that a minimum of 50 people will be needed in that one region to go around continuously seeking information, doing a lot of prying into people's personal affairs and knocking on door after door.

The person compiling the register would have to search for the other couple who lived in the Hillpark house to ascertain whether they were living there. Will officials have the power to say, "You say that they moved to England three years ago, but we want proof. We want to come into your house. We want you to show us that they are not now living here." That is an intrusion into people's privacy and it is nonsense that authorities should be forced to spend time compiling the register.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) has asked Ministers a question about the register. They have admitted that the electoral register is faulty in many regards. It may be between 5 and 10 per cent. out when it is compiled. Once it has been running for six months, it may be up to 15 per cent. out. How will the poll tax register be compiled? It will not be feasible. If the electoral register becomes the major source of information, as inevitably it will, people will take themselves off it to try to evade payment of the tax.

The register will present a major problem. Some people will not pay the tax because there is a register. Others will not pay it because they will evade it. They will say, "We will not pay," or "We cannot afford to pay." In the past, I have given the example of the 80-year-old widow in the middle of February who lives alone in her damp house in a part of Glasgow and who will be given the choice—I agree that it will be her choice—as to whether she pays her electricity bill and keeps her house heated, or turns on the fires, knowing that she will not be able to pay the bill, or pays the poll tax. That is the choice that she may well have to face. To the Minister and, I admit, to me, it is only a few pounds and it does not mean very much, but, to a widow living alone on her old-age pension and perhaps supplementary benefit, it is a large sum. I wonder whether the Minister, when he hears of someone dying of hypothermia following the poll tax, will have the same sang-froid about this nasty business.

Young people will try to evade the poll tax. Other people will be forced to pay it. There will be the ludicrous sight of local authorities using the full rigours and whole panoply of the law, including warrant sales, to try to get back £50, £60 or perhaps even £20 or £25. The tax will be collected monthly and the authorities will say that they must ensure that it is collected within six months. The law officers will be chasing people for these paltry sums. In some cases, it will cost more to collect the debt than it is worth. Local authorities will eventually tell the Government, "It is just not on. We will not do it. We are not prepared to see young people harried from address to address to get the money. We are not prepared to put officers into an old-age pensioner's house to take away the television set to pay her poll tax. If you want to do that, you can, but we will not."

We are creating a nightmare to which Conservative Members seem to have woken up. They now realise that the proposed system is unfair, unworkable and undemocratic. The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) and the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), who was one of the leaders of the campaign and advocated the experiment in Scotland, have all come out against the poll tax, although most of them supported its introduction in Scotland. They realise that what happened to the Tory party in Scotland as a result of making the poll tax a major part of their campaign may well happen to them in the next general election. They realise that they may be wiped out just as the Scottish Tory party was.

Perhaps the Secretary of State for the Environment was right when he said on radio that but for the poll tax the Scottish Tories would have done considerably worse. Perhaps the Minister is delighted that the poll tax was introduced because he would have lost his seat without it. Although I would like to believe that that theory is correct, I believe that the poll tax lost the Conservatives votes in Scotland and that English Tory Back Benchers are afraid that the same will happen to them.

If there was any democratic justice, if the Government had any regard for Scotland and the wishes of the Scottish people, if they had any desire to have the wishes of the people of Scotland properly represented, they would withdraw the tax immediately. Whether they continue with their plan in England and Wales is up to them, but they have no mandate to continue with such an iniquitous tax in Scotland, and they should withdraw it.

4.12 am

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Mr. Ian Lang): I congratulate the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) on his success in the ballot and on his choice of subject for debate, although not on the timing of his success.

I was not sure whether the hon. Gentleman's theme would be whether or how the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act 1987 should be implemented, so I shall try to cover both. I should like to thank the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) for congratulating me on my promotion—and, I think, by implication, survival. We have debated this matter across the Committee Chamber at about this hour more than once, so this is familiar territory although I disagree with his assessment of why so many of my colleagues lost their seats at the last election.

The real issue which underlies the debate and which has not been touched on much is the fact that the present domestic rating system is discredited and that the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act 1987 contains the only workable package on offer for doing anything about it.

Mr. Maxton: I wonder how the Minister can claim that the rating system is discredited in Scotland when the only party that stood fair and square for it and made that clear was the Labour party, which gained nine seats.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The Opposition got no more seats than they did in 1979.

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman points out that the Labour party received fewer votes than it received not just in 1979 but I think in every election before that since the war. I do not agree with the hon. Member for Cathcart as to the effect of the issue on the electoral result, but I am interested that he confirms the continuing commitment of the Labour party to the rates system. That is a sad reflection on the lack of constructive thought in the Labour party on this important and fundamental issue.

I make no apology for reminding the House what is wrong with domestic rates. I shall do so briefly, because our proposals were debated at great length and in great detail last Session. We spent something like 125 hours in Committee alone.

First of all, domestic rates are unfair. The bulk of local authority services relate to people rather than property and payment for them through a property tax is therefore unrelated to the use that individuals make of those services. A good deal of time in our earlier debates was spent comparing the hypothetical single person with the hypothetical family of four adults in an identical house next door who pay the same amount in rates. The message which came across very clearly was that our opponents do not care about the predicament of single people in that position. They are also unfair because they are paid by too few people. Just under 50 per cent. of the population are ratepayers and, as the hon. Gentleman said only 29 per cent. pay full rates, while the balance have partial or full rebates. This means, quite simply, that the burden of local authority expenditure is unfairly placed on too few shoulders.

Secondly, domestic rates are illogical. They depend on a system of valuation which takes very careful account of the factors that may affect the rent that a particular property might command. But this has reached the absurd position where, for example, someone will pay more for local services—having their bin emptied and things such as that—if he has a double garage where the cars sit side by side compared with one where the cars have to be parked end on. This sort of thing simply has no relation to the question of paying for local government services.

Thirdly, the rating system inevitably means the turmoil of revaluation. We saw the effects of that in Scotland in 1985 when revaluation faced many Scottish householders with what were seen as quite arbitrary and unpredictable impositions. Over 100,000 householders faced increases of more than one third in their rate bills between 1984-85 and 1985-86.

It seems that our opponents have no answer to those problems. So far as one can discern what Labour party policy would be—and neither 125 hours in Committee nor the Scottish manifesto gave many clues in that area—it would involve the retention of rates on the basis of capital values. That would do nothing to remedy the unfairness or illogicality that I mentioned. The alliance, if we can still call it that, would like local income tax, as would the Scottish national party, as the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) mentioned, but it has never come forward with properly worked out proposals of its own. Again, after 125 hours of Committee, we still eagerly await the full details of its proposals.

The hon. Member for Springburn emphasised the circumstances of poor families and the pressures on young people to leave home, but the young will be eligible for rebates assessed on their own circumstances and not on a family or household basis.

During the course of the ADRES Bill through Parliament it was repeatedly made clear that the provision of a rebate scheme was an essential part of the community charge proposals, and provision is made for such a scheme in the Act. I confirm that a rebate scheme remains a key element of the Government's proposals.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: Will the Minister at this stage, before the poll tax is implemented, send out circulars or make them available in housing estates and libraries to explain what rebates those young people will receive?

Mr. Lang: It will be our intention to publicise widely the way in which the scheme operates when it is introduced and ahead of its introduction. Therefore, I feel certain that that point will be met as matters proceed from now on.

The Government remain committed to the essential philosophy of having a minimum contribution that will go some way to restoring a sense of local accountability, which is lacking at present. Equally, it is recognised that the minimum contribution means that many people will, for the first time, be making a contribution towards their rates. Thus, when the rates for income support are set in the autumn of this year—this meets the point raised by the hon. Member for Cathcart with his example of the widow and her heating difficulties—they will include the average amount that we expect householders who are income support claimants to have to meet as their minimum contribution to domestic rates. That means that claimants will be compensated for the average minimum payment that they will have to make but, at the same time, preserve the vital principle of local accountability.

Our intention with regard to rebates, therefore, gives the lie to the repeated claims that the community charge is unfair and takes no account of the ability to pay. It is remarkable that, after lengthy debate of the community charge proposals during the Bill's passage through Parliament, that point still has not got through.

The hon. Member for Moray mentioned ministers of religion. The personal community charge is a personal liability which does not depend on residence at a particular address or directly or indirectly on the nature of a person's employment. The Government do not, therefore, propose to replicate in the new system of community charges any equivalent of the tax concessions that are at present available in respect of payments made by employers towards the rate liabilities of employees who, like ministers of religion, are required to occupy particular domestic property as a condition of their employment. It is in a personal capacity that they will have liability and it is in a personal capacity that they, like others, will be eligible for rebates depending on their circumstances.

Mr. Maxton: The Minister said that the Government are not going to take account of people's professions. Surely it is true that the Government are going to take some account of those who are in the armed services and who, having been stationed in England or Wales, move to Scotland. Surely the Government are going to ensure that they get some extra payment in order to pay the poll tax. I understand that the idea is that they should be paid an overseas allowance for being stationed in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman is raising a different issue altogether. I was replying to the point raised by the hon. Member for Moray concerning ministers of religion.

The hon. Member for Moray raised some other specific cases on which I shall comment briefly. She mentioned crofters, whose circumstances were discussed extensively at all stages of the Bill. The circumstances of crofters are very diverse and there is no case for singling them out for special treatment under the new system of personal local taxation. Rebates will be available for those who need them. The hon. Lady also discussed farm workers; that will be a matter to be settled between employer and employee. It is not something on which the Government should attempt to give a hard and fast line. Payments made as part of contracts of employment will be a legitimate business expense; that was made plain during the passage of the Bill.

I shall now turn to the process of implementation. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has already made clear our intention to proceed with the implementation of the Act. The first step will be to make a commencement order under section 35. No parliamentary procedure is involved in this process. I envisage that a draft of the commencement order will shortly be the subject of consultation with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and, while I cannot yet give a firm date, I envisage that commencement will take effect before the end of August.

Bringing the Act into force will mean, for example, that assessors will then have the functions of community charges registration officers, whose functions are to prepare, maintain and keep up to date the register. We envisage that preparatory work will be carried out over the coming months, with the process of convassing beginning in spring or early summer of 1988. The detailed rules for the operation of the new system will be set out in a number of regulations to be made by my right hon. and learned Friend over the next few months. It may be helpful if I sketch out the main framework of these. We expect there to be about half a dozen main sets of regulations, of which the most significant are as follows.

First, there will be a set of regulations dealing with the definitions of domestic subjects, which are, of course, those on which no rates will be payable in future. The basic definition in the Act covers properties that are valued as houses at present, and the purpose of the regulations will be to include certain other premises, at present non-domestic, where people live. These will mainly comprise various forms of institutional accommodation such as halls of residence and nurses' homes. It was made clear during the passage of the Bill that residential care homes, nursing homes and hostels providing care on a similar basis would not be made domestic subjects, so that they would remain liable to rating and their residents would be exempt from the community charge.

The domestic subjects regulations will also have to deal with fairly complicated matters such as the definition of domestic garages to ensure fairness of treatment for those which are valued with dwellinghouses and those which are not. Again, the hon. Gentleman may recall echoes of that during our debates in Committee.

A second important set of regulations will be those relating to registration procedures. In sections 13 to 20 of the Act, there are a number of powers of prescription relating to the form and content of the register, the start of the canvass and the content of canvass forms, the notification to individuals of the contents of their register entry and the time limits within which they may appeal in various circumstances.

Thirdly, there will need to be regulations making definitions affecting the liability of certain groups. The most obvious example is students, who, by virtue of section 8 of the Act, will pay only a reduced percentage of the community charge. It has been made clear that this will be 20 per cent., in line with the minimum contribution which will be paid by those who are entitled to the maximum rebate. Other definitions will be required under section 30 to provide for the exemption of prisoners in custody and long-stay hospital patients.

A further set of regulations will be needed to lay out the timetable for setting community charges and non-domestic rates to replace the present rate-setting timetable. This will have to take account of the need for the system to be able to handle the issue of a greater number of bills, so the timetable for setting rates and community charges will probably be earlier than it is at present. The collection of community charges will also require regulations—for example, to set out the information which is to be shown on community charge bills.

There is a considerable list of regulations, but work is well advanced on the preparation of the necessary material as a basis for formal consultation in the fairly near future. To help the process of implementation, we have made arrangements for a study to be carried out to prepare a specification of computer system user requirements. We intend that this should be made available to local authorities next month, and wer are confident that it will be helpful to them in providing a basis on which to design their own systems.

Mr. Maxton: The House would be grateful if the Minister, in dealing with the regulations that he will have to put before the House, would give some idea of the time scale on which the regulations are likely to be placed before the House and also what parliamentary procedures they will be placed under. Will it be a positive or negative procedure in terms of statutory instruments? Obviously, Opposition Members are extremely concerned about that. We assume that each will be placed as a separate statutory instrument that can be prayed against or debated.

Mr. Lang: I have stated the number of regulations that will be required and which will embody a number of different provisions, as I have described them. As to the timetable, it will be in this Session of Parliament. I do not anticipate that any instrument will be laid before the House before we adjourn for the summer recess. My understanding and recollection is that they will be laid under the negative procedure.

I hope that this somewhat detailed explanation of the next step towards implementing the Act has been helpful to the House, particularly in demonstrating the extent to which progress is being made on the development of the detailed rules.

In recent days, much has been made of the proposition that the Government's proposals for England and Wales may be changed as they go through the House. Although it would be quite wrong of me to anticipate what may be done here or in another place, I am confident that the fundamentals of the reform already enacted for Scotland will in due course apply to England and Wales. Scotland is not a guinea pig, as the hon. Member for Moray said. Rather, Scotland is the trail blazer. Scotland is having the advantage of the provisions because the need for them in Scotland was made much greater during the course of the past year or so.

Mr. Wallace rose—

Mr. Lang: I would rather not give way. The hon. Gentleman was not involved in the debate.

But I can make it clear that, if refinements are made to the proposals, we will of course consider whether any parallel changes need to be made in Scotland. None of this is, however, in any sense a justification for delaying the timetable of implementation so clearly set out in the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act and so clearly approved by Parliament.

The debate has been valuable in enabling me to place the Government's position clearly on the record; first, to reaffirm our determination to abolish domestic rates and to demonstrate the fairness of our proposals, in contrast to the hopeless inadequacy of the position of the Opposition; and secondly, to make it clear that we will be proceeding with the implementation of the 1987 Act on the basis that we have always envisaged, so that the benefits of these changes can be enjoyed by the people of Scotland without further delay.

Lighthouse Service

4.30 am

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I welcome this opportunity to raise the issue of the lighthouse service in the United Kingdom, because it must be many years since there was a substantive debate on this important subject. This opportunity is timely, given the number of issues that have recently caused some public debate and controversy surrounding the cost and provision of lighthouse services.

The orders for increasing the light dues and extending them to cover fishing vessels over 10m in length have not yet been debated in the House, although they were debated in another place. That is regrettable, given that the motions praying against the orders have attracted a considerable amount of support; more than just the usual formal notice of opposition that one sometimes gets. Nevertheless, the orders increasing the level of light dues have attracted considerable opposition from those involved both in the shipping industry and in the ports.

It is widely accepted that our merchant fleet has been facing a worrying decline for many years. Although this is not the occasion to go into that, obviously there are concerns that the increase in light dues is a further imposition of a burden upon an already beleaguered industry. It will affect our ships more than it will affect foreign vessels, because British ships come into British ports more often than do foreign vessels and will more often have to face the increased charges.

I believe that the increase will make our ports less competitive, not least with those ports immediately across the Channel in western Europe. Of all the countries in the European Economic Community, only Greece and the Republic of Ireland—which to some extent is bracketed with the United Kingdom when we talk about lighthouse services and charges—have lighthouse charges.

It has been argued by the Department of Transport that only one-seventh of the difference in costs between a European port and a British port can be attributed to light dues. This does not appear to square with the figures put forward by the General Council of British Shipping, which suggests that in Antwerp the cost per container is about £25, yet in the United Kingdom that cost will be about £90 once the new light dues provisions are put into effect, £40 of that being attributable to light dues. The difference amounts to about £65, more than two-thirds of which would appear to be due to light dues.

I ask the Minister, in replying to the debate, to give an indication of how his Department arrived at such a relatively small proportion of the difference between the costs and charges of British ports and those with which we are in considerable competition in western Europe.

Looking forward, we would like to see our ports, not least on the west coast, being able to take up some of the advantage of having a Channel tunnel, once it is built, and to become the terminal ports for western Europe for traffic from North America. It would be regrettable if a further increase in light dues were to put them at a competitive disadvantage and not allow them to take the opportunities that may open up for them in the next 10 years.

The extension of light dues to fishing vessels is viewed by the industry as being exceptionally unfair. They were imposed with little or no consultation. Admittedly, once the previous Secretary of State said that he intended to do it he consulted, but prior to that there was little or no consultation with the industry. They have been imposed on fishing vessels over a certain length, and do not relate to their activities or to their ability to pay. Not taking into account the ability of individual vessels to pay the dues could be said to be the fishing industry's version of the poll tax. It has caused considerable resentment in the industry.

This is another burden on our fishing fleet that is not borne by those with which it is in most competition. I think especially of Danish and Norwegian fishing vessels, which do not have to pay the charge. Our fishing fleet will have to pay it at a time when so much effort is being made to bring European nations into line. We are putting our fishing fleet at a deliberate disadvantage by expecting it to pay that additional amount.

The argument for imposing dues on the fishing fleet has not been convincing. In fact, it is riddled with inconsistencies. On the face of it there is some logic in saying that the user must pay, but not by any stretch of the imagination has that been taken to its logical conclusion. There is no provision for yachts to pay. I can well understand the great practical difficulties involved, as there is not a register of yachts as there is for fishing vessels. Nevertheless, if the charge is to be imposed on the logic of user pays, immediate resentment is caused if we cannot fully follow through the logical consequences of that policy.

I understand that there is no charge on the Royal Navy, although it uses the Racal-Decca navigator system. Whereas previously it paid an estimated £800,000 per annum to Racal-Decca for the system, that charge is now being imposed on the general lighthouse fund. The Royal Navy is being relieved of that cost and it is being imposed on those who have to pay light dues. That is not the proper way to resolve any problems in the defence budget. It brings home to us the basic unfairness of the system as a whole.

When writing to the fishermen's associations, Mr. Battersby — the assistant secretary of the marine directorate at the Department of Transport—said, when referring to general lighthouse authorities:

> "The navigational aids they superintend and manage (which now include Navigator) are used by a great variety of shipping, much of it passing our coasts and not calling at our ports."

He is quite right. The general lighthouse authorities are providing services to shipping that goes around our coasts but does not come into our ports and does not pay. It is a fundamental problem, because people are using but not paying. The Government must face that problem. If, for understandable reasons, they are not prepared to accept the logical consequences of their policy, they should be prepared, out of general taxation, to make at least some contribution to the lighthouse authorities to help them to fund their services and to ensure that the whole burden is not placed on relatively few people. If other EEC countries can do that, with the exception of Greece and the Republic of Ireland, perhaps it is time that we consider that option.

As the orders have now taken effect, does it follow that by extending the charge of fishing vessels representatives of the fishermen's associations are now automatically to be included on the Lights Advisory Committee? The Department of Transport should be taking steps towards encouraging the setting up of a users' consultative committee. That was recommended in Arthur Young's report of 1984. I understand that the Northern Lighthouse

Board consults far more widely than those who pay, and that would be a good example to follow. It is my impression and understanding that over the past three or four years the Department of Transport has been reluctant to extend the ambit for consultation, taking the view that it is only those who pay who should be consulted. The Northern Lighthouse Board's view is that all users have an interest, regardless of whether they pay, and that as consumers they have a worthwhile contribution to make when the subject of navigational aids are under discussion. By including only those who are paying, the general lighthouse authorities are subjected only to the views of those whose prime objective is to keep down expenditure. I am not necessarily criticising that approach, but that seems to be the sole thrust of the views of those to whom the GLAs are expected to listen.

I understand that the British Ports Association is invited to the consultations, even though it does not have a direct interest. It would be encouraging if the Minister were to say that the scope of discussion and consultation is to be extended far beyond those who come within the category of payers, to those who are also users.

The reduction of expenditure is uppermost in the minds of many, not least the General Council of British Shipping. There seems to be a notion that with the advancement of technological aids the need for the type of safety aids that are provided by LHAs is diminishing substantially. A report was commissioned by the Lights Advisory Committee and undertaken by Dr. Strange, who, having made studies and examined the passage of certain ships between Portland Bill and the Thames estuary, suggested that if ships were fitted with modern electronic position fixing equipment there was scope for a significant reduction in the number of aids provided by the lighthouse authorities. I am not sure what status that report has, and I do not know what credence will be given to it, but it has some clear limitations. It cannot be assumed that all foreign vessels will use the Decca navigator system. It cannot be assumed either that ships under 500 tonnes will be similarly equipped. The report does not take account of occasions when equipment breaks down or of the position of yachtsmen and lifeboats.

Despite the provision of electronic aids, a number of ships have collided this year. In late January, or early February, in fog off Felixstowe there was a collision between Townsend Thoresen's Nordic Ferry and a Spanish cargo ship. On 1 May there was a collision off Dover in poor visibility between the Cambridge Ferry and a French operated vessel the St. Eloi. On 30 May, in the Channel in fog, there was a collision between the Skyron, a Liberian tanker, and a Polish cargo ship, the HEL. Despite the great advancement of modern technological equipment, collisions still take place. We are not able to say that we can dispense or readily reduce the visible aids that the lighthouse authorities have been providing over many years.

In a report on navigational aids by Dr. D. Kieley, which was published this year, reference is made to the numerous people who still rely on such aids. The Royal Navy has said that reliable and proven methods of visible fixing are always used whenever possible and the Scottish fishermen say that even the most modern electronic and technical devices can fail from time to time for unaccountable reasons and that as not all vessels are new, it seems clear that any future system of navigational aids should retain much of the existing shore-based facilities. I hope that there will be recognition of the fact that, albeit that technology advances, for some time to come there will be an important reliance on the more traditional types of aid that have been provided effectively over many years by the Commissioners of Irish Lights, the Northern Lighthouse Board and Trinity House.

Another area of recent dispute is that relating to sound fog signals. Following a resolution of the International Association of Lighthouse Authorities that sound fog signals were no longer a general requirement, steps have been taken to discontinue a number of sound fog signals around our coasts. Indeed, a number of assistant lighthouse keepers in my constituency have recently received their redundancy notices.

I believe that there has been too much haste and anxiety in trying to follow the IALA policy decision. I have studied the roll call of nations that supported that decision and I suspect that many of them have not had to contend with the problems of fog – at times thick fog – with which we have to contend around our coasts. In pursuing that policy decision I believe that insufficient account has been taken of the apparent proviso in that policy:

"Some low power fog signals may still be required to assist fishing and pleasure craft."

What consultations took place before the IALA reached that decision? What consultations took place with the various industries and users involved? Since that policy decision, what consultation has there been with the fishing industry and those who might be using pleasure craft about the consequences of the discontinuance of sound fog signals?

As an example, I think particularly of North Ronaldsay, an island in my constituency. It is basically a crofting island, with many transport problems. It has a small population, but it has a lighthouse. That lighthouse is an important source of employment. The island also has a very small fishing industry – a number of local people fish in the local waters. Indeed, one of the few opportunities for increased employment is in fishing. The fishermen of the island wrote to the Northern Lighthouse Board protesting about the proposals to discontinue the sound fog signal on the island. Although I have not seen the reply, I have been advised that the board suggested that if things were that bad, perhaps they should not go to sea. It also said that if 30 boats had been involved, rather than three, it might have made a difference. On North Ronaldsay, given its population, three boats represent a sizeable part of the working sector. It would be regrettable if it was the decision of the Northern Lighthouse Board to discontinue the sound fog signal, as that would have an adverse effect on the promotion of the fishing industry. This industry could not only improve people's livelihood, but could be a useful source of future employment.

The decision of the Northern Lighthouse Board also suggests that at times economic rather than safety reasons are the guiding criteria. Indeed, when considering the minutes of the Northern Lighthouse Board, one realises that, despite the emphasis on the fact that each lighthouse has been considered on its own merits and that safety is paramount, the tenor of the discussions is about whether money can be saved.

If we consider Sumburgh Head in my constituency, we see that the minutes state:

"The decision to retain Sumburgh Head fog signal could be justified by the high incidence of fog and although there was little passing traffic there was some fishing activity in the area. The Engineer-in-Chief outlined the potential savings from possible keeper reductions and running costs and eventual discontinuance of the fog signal on automation although a stand-by generator would still be required to power the Radio Beacon. It was eventually decided, however, that the fog signal should be discontinued."

It is clear from that that the savings to be made outweighed the advantages that there would still be for fishing activity in the area.

As regards Cantick Head in my constituency, the minutes reported:

"There was no case to retain this fog signal as there would be savings from the reduction in keepers and possible future capital expenditure."

My contention is that this is not an area in which savings should be the guiding principle, but one in which the provision of the service and safety should be the overriding principles. It is a matter of considerable concern that there has been such a rush to adopt the IALA policy, not with any substantial regard to the service provided by the sound fog signals, but as yet another way of trying to meet the financial targets set for our lighthouse authorities by the Department of Transport.

The same pressures are undoubtedly being applied with regard to the future of the lighthouse tender vessels. I understand that the report that was prepared by Arthur Young reached the Department during the past week or two. It has still to be published for public consumption, and perhaps the Minister will suggest when that is likely to be. I do not think that it will be helpful if, without having seen that report, I were to indulge in too much idle speculation as to what it might contain. However, we know that to a considerable extent the report was commissioned with cost-cutting zeal and with an eye to trying to improve the balance sheet.

It is important that the Minister recognises—I am sure that he does—that those currently engaged in the service have, over the years, built up considerable expertise on the various navigational aids that they service and maintain and also of the various shores and approaches to the lighthouses that are supplied from the tender vessels. I wonder whether we are facing a position where that expertise might have to be dissipated. Is it indeed in the best interests of the operation that we should have—this may well be the case—one vessel trying to cover the entire service from Muckle Flugga to Spurn Head? Indeed, can one vessel do that? I should be interested to know exactly what the Department of Transport's interest is in this case.

I am sure that much of the detail will have to be worked out by the lighthouse authorities themselves. If the Minister will give some suggestion of the division of interests and responsibilities between his Department and the lighthouse authorities that will be useful to those of us who may well have constituency battles to fight on this issue. I am especially aware that many of the crew of the Pole Star are constituents of mine and, of course, the number of vessels and the crewing that will be retained is vital.

I am also aware that the town of Stromness on Orkney is the base for the Pole Star and it would be affected critically if the new configuration of ships were to remove the Pole Star from Stromness. The families who are based there and who live there are an important part of the population and shop in the town. Most of the services and the supplies for the boat are purchased from local shopkeepers. Any decision to move the vessel away from Stromness could have important economic consequences for the town. I give notice to the Minister that this issue will be debated at great length if the outcome of the report is not satisfactory for my constituents.

There is a fear that getting rid of a number of ships will inevitably lead to the contracting out of some services to private operators who do not have any knowledge, and who have not had the opportunities to build up the knowledge, of the special needs and of the duties that have been undertaken for many years by the lighthouse authorities. We do not want privatisation by the back door simply to massage the balance sheet. What is most important is that we maintain a good service, which is what we have had up to now. Why upset that?

My concluding remarks relate, first, to savings. I ask the Minister what the position is now regarding the contribution made by the Republic of Ireland towards the cost of the lighthouse authorities? Receipts from the Republic are less than expenditure. I understand that there is an arrangement whereby the Government of the Republic make up so much of the difference. How has that worked out, and is there scope for more to be contributed from the Republic? We are in the unusual position of one sovereign nation appearing to subsidise the services that are supplied to another sovereign nation, when there might be competition between the two.

Secondly, what is being done to try to monitor the administrative efficiency of the lighthouse authorities? In its response to the increase in light dues the General Council of British Shipping suggested one lighthouse authority instead of three. I would certainly advise against that. The Scots would not readily accept any attempt to take over the Northern Lighthouse Board. It is a question, not just of national pride, but of economics, because with more lights than Trinity House the annual cost has been consistently less than half those of Trinity House. I am well aware that Trinity House has much greater responsibilities than simply the lighthouse service, but I would have thought that that would provide it with an opportunity to develop economies of scale. Yet, the cost of general lighthouse administration appears to be greater.

Similarly, between 1980 and 1986 the head office of Trinity House increased its staff by 20, whereas those engaged on other locations were reduced by 228. The Northern Lighthouse Board increased its administrative staff by three, whereas those in operations were reduced by 103. Therefore, it seems that more chiefs are administering fewer field workers. Perhaps a timely review of the administration of the service would not go amiss.

The lighthouse service is important in remote rural areas and problems follow from the reduction in the number of those who work for the service and from automation. Now there are threats of discontinuing the sound fog signals and fears for the future of the lighthouse tender vessels. When there are closures in the coal industry, for example, when many redundancies are pending and particular areas are hit, British Coal Enterprise Ltd. is there to relieve the unemployment that is caused as a result.

The effect on much smaller communities of the loss of the odd job here and there is not noticed, although proportionately that can have just as great an effect on the community. The automation of a lighthouse may well bring with it the removal of a young family from an island or remote rural area, which in turn can affect the future of a local school. I have already mentioned the importance of the lighthouse shipping service to Stromness. I hope that the Government will be sensitive to the effects of any cost-cutting exercise on these communities.

I know that the Northern Lighthouse Board, to which I have frequently spoken about this issue, is aware of the effects, but it cannot do anything about them. It is not within its remit to take account of the social and economic consequences for a community of an automation programme or any alteration to the lighthouse tender vessels. It is anxious in cases of individual redundancy to take into account the fact that employees not only lose a job, but often a tied house, and it wishes to enhance the redundancy payments to take account of that. Naturally, it would look to the Government for assistance with that and perhaps if the Minister cannot respond to that point this morning he will write to me about it. I would happily correspond with him to see whether anything can be done to enhance redundancy payments.

Similarly, we should enable the lighthouse authorities to pay a rent allowance to those who should perhaps be encouraged to find their own home, either to buy or to rent, so that they do not become as dependent on a tied house as in the past. I understand that Trinity House has operated a system of rent allowances, but that has not been the case north of the border. If assistance could be forthcoming to enable the Northern Lighthouse Board to do that, I am sure that it would be welcome.

We need a broader perspective. We must accept that we need people on our coasts and that everything cannot be left to automation. There are good security reasons for that and when ships go aground it is useful to have people on the scene, not merely automated machines. In New Zealand and Canada there has been a rethink of the whole programme of automation.

We have a good service, which has been provided for many years. I seek an assurance from the Minister that in the development of the service the first and foremost consideration will be safety and the quality and efficiency of the service, and that that will not in any way be subordinated to the interests of the balance sheet. I am not denying the importance of that, but I hope that the valuable quality of the service will be recognised and that its work can continue.

4.59 am

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): It is understandable that the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) should raise this subject in tonight's debate. I know that he takes a personal interest in the subject on behalf of his constituents especially those in the service of the Northern Lighthouse Board. The subject of the debate is an invitation to cover much wider matters. However, the hon. Gentleman's timing is unfortunate. Not just because it is 4.59 am but because a number of the matters he raised are directly related to the Arthur Young tender vessels study which is about to be published and it would be improper of me to disclose its contents in advance.

However, considerable attention has focussed on the lighthouse service in recent months, and this reflects a range of developments and studies bearing on the activities and responsibilities of the general lighthouse authorities. I am sure all Members on both sides of the House have a high regard for the dedication and traditions of service of those employed in the lighthouse service and I pay tribute to them. The authorities are bodies with long and respected histories of high standards in the service of the mariner. I recognise that they are engaged in a difficult period of transition and change, reflecting increased automation and new technology in the area of marine navigational aids. The problems this brings in human and management terms are understood. I have a high regard for the readiness of the authorities' staff to adapt to new circumstances.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland referred to the financing of the lighthouse services. I accept that the United Kingdom, with Ireland and Greece, are in a minority within the EC in charging light dues — though nearly half the members of the International Association of Lighthouse Authorities rely on dues of some kind to finance their lights. We in the United Kingdom remain of the view that the user should pay, within what is administratively practicable. I can hold out no prospect of the Exchequer taking on these costs. I accept some of the criticisms from the shipowners and ports that aspects of the current light dues regime — which has remained substantially unaltered since the turn of the century — have a disadvantageous effect on some traffics such as liner container vessels and part cargoes, and that some of this traffic may be diverted to a near continental port for transhipment. However, the reasons for transhipment are complex and go beyond the issue of light dues. We are nonetheless examing the scope for technical changes in the light dues structure which I hope will go some way to remedy some of the anomalies.

It is however inevitable that a substantial element of the costs will continue to fall on commercial shipping, because the revenues which might be raised from other users can never amount to more than a small proportion of the costs. The main category of user not contributing to these costs is small pleasure craft. Here it has not proved practicable to devise an enforceable system which would yield worthwhile revenue after collection and enforcement costs from other sources.

I fully understand the concern of the shipowners and the ports about the 14 per cent. increase in light dues which had to be imposed earlier this year. That increase has to be seen, however, as one coming after a long period when it had been possible to cover the difference between costs and revenue by drawing on the considerable cash reserves which had accumulated in the General Lighthouse Fund. However, these reserves were reducing rapidly, and an increase was unavoidable to bring revenue closer in line with current operating costs. There was also a new requirement — about half the increase — to be met as a result of transferring the £3·6 million annual operating costs of the UK Decca Navigator transmitters to the GLF. Reflecting this transfer, we have also for the first time extended light dues to the larger fishing vessels — but 60 per cent. of vessels — those under 10 metres in length — will still not have to pay. The Government believe that the new arrangements are a good deal for fishermen, who have seen substantial reductions in the market price of receivers. Most of those who previously rented sets will in fact save money.

The hon. Gentleman raised the question of representation for fishermen on the lights advisory committee. That is a matter for the committee, which has already approached the industry to invite its members to be represented.

Despite this year's increase, light dues are steadily declining in real terms. They are down 33 per cent. from the 1975-76 peak, and 18 per cent. lower than in 1981-82. The Government also reduced dues by 10 per cent. in 1983, in contrast to the increases of 23 per cent. and 40 per cent. imposed by the Labour Government in 1975.

The Government's policy objective is to contain and reduce lighthouse costs to secure efficiency and economy in the operation of the service. We have taken a number of constructive steps. There is now a much stricter control over the GLA's budgets, and it is set demanding cash limits which, to its credit, it is striving to meet, or even to better. A number of studies are now in progress.

I must stress that, although the costs that must be found for the lighthouse service fall on ship operators and not on the Government, we are determined not to take any risks with safety. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be glad to have that reassurance.

A major study has recently been undertaken by Arthur Young, the management consultants, into the tender vessel requirements of the three lighthouse authorities. I know that this study is of particular interest to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland, as one of the NLB tender vessels is based in his constituency, and he has already raised the matter. We have now received the consultants' final report, and my right hon. Friend will be making an announcement about it very shortly. Copies of the report will be placed in the Library.

This study was commissioned jointly by my Department and the three lighthouse authorities, and I believe that it is the first comprehensive joint appraisal that has been made of the fleets and the requirements that they have to meet. The report makes a wide range of recommendations, but, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows, it would be improper for me to anticipate my right hon. Friend's statement. We shall, of course, consider the report carefully in close consultation with the Authorities and with the lights advisory committee, which represents ship owners, shippers and port authorities.

I know that the hon. Gentleman has a particular interest in that the Northern Lighthouse Board currently bases its ship "Polestar" at Stromness, and he raised that in his remarks.

The consultants' report makes some recommendations about different fleet configurations, and suggests illustrative alternative locations for vessels. The operation of the vessels represents about a quarter of the current running costs of the lighthouse service. Those costs fall not on the Government but on ship operators, who are under considerable financial pressure.

The hon. Gentleman raised the matter of the Kiely and Strange reports. Let me add, in connection with electronic aids replacing traditional ones — which he also mentioned — that reports on navigational aids have commanded wide interest in the marine world. Earlier this year my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State published an independent report by Dr. D. G. Kiely, a consultant electronics engineer, recommending how developments in marine navigational aids should be applied in the coming years. The report contains an extensive analysis of likely technical developments, and examines those developments in relation to the implications for United Kingdom marine policy and the likely requirements of all classes of marine users. It makes a large number of recommendations, and the views of interested parties have been invited. We shall be considering Dr. Kiely's detailed recommendations in the light of views expressed by the marine community. I am sure that, when that is done, account will also be taken of the hon. Gentleman's comments.

The hon. Member also referred to the Strange report. The Lights Advisory Committee has urged on my noble Friend the Minister for Aviation and Shipping a review of the traditional aids provided by the general lighthouse authorities. In support of this, it has commissioned a study by Dr. John Strange to examine the shipowners' contention that many of the traditional lights, buoys and beacons have been superseded by those of modern electronic position-fixing equipment carried on board ships. Dr. Strange concludes that the number of traditional aids should be reduced as electronic aids gain wider availability. I think the hon. Member will admit that because of the duplication that would necessarily be involved, one could not expect two systems to be kept permanently in being.

The LAC report is a timely contribution to the continuing examination of the costs and requirements of the GLA's services. It would be wrong to pretend, however, that the resolution of these issues will be easy. There will always be a continuing need for lights and daymarks as hazard warnings—a point recognised in the Kiely report. There are also many conflicting views and interests to be reconciled. They range from the largest tanker vessels through to the weekend yachtsman. The lighthouse authorities, who bear the responsibility of providing aids to safe navigation for all users, have already questioned some of the conclusions that were reached by Dr. Strange. My noble Friend will be taking forward consideration of all these complex issues in consultation with the lighthouse authorities.

The hon. Member referred to fog signals, or fog horns. That is a management matter for the authorities, which they will no doubt carry through as they think fit, in consultation with the users. In the light of the recent recommendations of the International Association of Lighthouse Authorities, that fog signals should be dropped as a major navigational aid but retained where needed as a hazard warning, the GLA, including the Northern Lighthouse Board, will have to hold consultations with the vessel users for whose benefit the fog signals exist. The Government are not involved in the matter. I hope that the hon. Member will raise it directly with the Northern Lighthouse Board which is responsible for the safety of navigation.

Mr. Wallace: The Minister has said that restrictive financial targets have been set by the Government for the lighthouse authorities. I referred earlier to Sumburgh head, Copinsay and Cantick head. Cost cutting seems to be paramount. Fog sound warning devices, particularly for fishing vessels, do not appear to have been considered. Does the Minister believe that when the board is considering these important matters it should bear that point particularly in mind?

Mr. Mitchell: The board has to balance all the considerations and make a sensible judgment. I said earlier that we do not intend that there should be any safety risk. Safety is the paramount purpose of the board's activities.

The hon. Member referred to the proportion of light dues that account for the difference between United Kingdom and Continental port charges. United Kingdom port costs are about 60 per cent. above those in comparable Continental ports for the liner container trade. A study undertaken by the Department of Transport in 1985 estimated that light dues, on average, accounted for only one seventh of the difference.

The hon. Member also referred to the Royal Navy. The Ministry of Defence still pays for its use of the Decca Navigator under an agreement with the Racal-Decca company. It has not been relieved of that responsibility under the new arrangements. The hon. Member also referred, understandably, to consultations with users. The Arthur Young study of the lighthouse service in 1985 recommended a new lights users committee, in addition to the current lights advisory committee that represents the shipowners and ports. One must guard against the proliferation of committees and the concept of separate payers' and users' committees seems of doubtful value. The general lighthouse authorities have regular and satisfactory consultations with users. The fishing industry has been invited to be represented on the Lights Advisory Committee with regard to any extension of light dues for some fishing vessels.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland raised the matter of Irish lights. A financial agreement was reached in 1985 whereby the Irish Government now makes an annual contribution to the costs that are incurred in the Republic. After a transitional period, Irish sources of light dues and contributions will meet 50 per cent. of the costs in the Republic.

Enhanced redundancy terms for lighthouse keepers are initially a matter for the general lighthouse authorities in their capacity as employer, but approval from the Department would be required to sanction any increase in expenditure in redundancy compensation.

The keepers who are in the service of the Northern Lighthouse Board have sought improved terms to compensate for the loss of tied housing. The redundancy terms, which are based on those of the Civil Service, are already generous and for keepers they already take account of their tied housing. The Department had to reject an earlier proposal which would have added between £2 million and £4 million to the costs of the automation programme, but we are prepared to consider some more modest proposals if the NLB believes that there is a case for them. I hope that the hon. Gentleman and his constituents will find that helpful.

I hope that what I have said will reassure hon. Members that we are aware of the problems that face shipowners on the one hand and the authorities and their staff on the other. The Government's primary concern is to secure an efficient and cost-effective system of navigational aids that are appropriate to the needs of marine users.

It is not in dispute that a service to the mariner is required if safety at sea is to be maintained, but it is a service which is necessarily adapting to changing circumstances and technology. With the co-operation of the lighthouse authorities our objective is to continue the process of reducing the costs of the service and improving its management.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will feel that during the course of this short debate I have been able to cover most of the points that he raised and that he will take some reassurance from them.

5.17 am

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): I apologise to the House and to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) for being absent at the beginning of the debate. Unfortunately, the provision of public transport in the capital city at 4 am is not what it should be and I have the dubious pleasure of having walked to the House from Lambeth.

I listened with interest to that part of the hon. Gentleman's speech that I heard. The hon. Gentleman spoke with knowledge of his constituency and with concern, which is shared by many of us, about the position that is currently enveloping the lighthouse service.

I think that the hon. Gentleman played some part in the debates on the reorganisation of the pilotage service. Many of us on the Opposition benches were concerned about the way that the Government were proposing to allow exemption certificates for masters and foreign masters who use British ports on a regular basis. They would be able to gain exemption certificates and they would not necessarily need a pilot. In my view, and that of the United Kingdom Pilots Association, that was a retrograde and detrimental step. The current thinking in the Department of Transport, whether on pilotage or lights, does not satisfy many of us in respect of the safety provisions that we all feel are necessary for British merchant shipping.

I readily accept that there is an argument that modern electronic navigational techniques make lights and buoys unnecessary. That may be so, but it assumes that a ship and those navigational aids are functioning properly. If there is any problem on board ship and the aids are not functioning properly, those involved have to resort to traditional navigation methods using lighthouses, buoys and the Decca navigational system. I contend that that system is essential. No matter what it costs, it needs to be maintained and available at all times as a fallback. I do not think that the House would readily agree to any reduction in the provision of safety around our coasts caused by the withdrawal of lighthouses, foghorns, buoys or any other type of navigational aid currently in place. I understand what the Minister says about the current review and his unwillingness to comment until its findings are made public. Perhaps we can debate that matter when those views are made public.

I am conscious of the time. I see that the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) is waiting for the next debate and that my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) is duly in his place at 5.20 am, so I should like to make a final point. It is a great pity that, because of the general election's intervention, we were denied the opportunity of an hour and a half's debate on the Opposition prayer on the increase in light dues. I have to say in honesty to the Minister that, even at this early hour of the morning, I found his defence of the increase in light dues utterly pathetic. The total cost of the provision of lights around the United Kingdom is about £40 million. In overall Exchequer terms, that is a drop in the bucket. It is insignificant. It could well be paid out of central Exchequer funds, as it is in almost every major maritime country, but instead the Government have done as all Governments have done—my Government did it just as the Minister's Government are doing it now—and have imposed a levy on ship owners and port authorities. According to the Port Users Association, an increase of 14 per cent. in light dues means an increase of about £1 million for certain ship owners. That must be a massive disincentive for ships to come to the United Kingdom.

[Mr. Roger Stott]

The Minister is as aware as I am of the demise of the British Merchant Navy and our port industry. The Government should have constructive policies and a proper strategy for shipping and ports, instead of putting a spanner in the works by increasing light dues. I reject the ethos behind the Minister's speech, which implies that it is not possible for the Treasury to take on board what is a minor cost to it but a major cost to the shipping industry. It is time that the Government sat down and thought about the damage that they are doing by simply hiking up the costs and charges imposed on an already overburdened shipping industry.

5.23 am

Mr. David Mitchell: With permission, Madam Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) started with some rather snide remarks about the lack of transport services at 4.30 am in the capital city. If it were appropriate, I would have referred to the hon. Gentleman as the foolish virgin for not having made prior arrangements to ensure, as other hon. Members have, that he got to the House on time.

The hon. Gentleman raised the subject of the traditional aids which he seeks to defend, almost brick by brick and stone by stone, as though no technological advances were taking place. If the hon. Gentleman reflects on what he said, I am sure that he will feel that there is some inconsistency in his expressing a desire to retain all of the existing aids while technological advance means that there are other ways in which to secure safe navigation.

The hon. Gentleman referred to a 14 per cent. increase in light dues and said that it is not justified. About half of that cost arises from the Decca Navigator being a cost now taken on by the general lighthouse fund which was not formerly carried by that fund, so we are talking about a 7 per cent. increase in costs. Moreover, it is not a 7 per cent. increase in one year. Lighthouse funds have drawn on reserves recently. It is not possible to draw on reserves for ever. The hon. Gentleman must demonstrate that the reserves are still larger than they need to be. He did not, and unless he can make out such a case, he cannot deploy an argument against a 7 per cent. increase.

The hon. Gentleman takes the view that the Exchequer should pay, although a previous Labour Government concluded that dues should continue to be paid on the traditional basis. He said that the cost is £40 million, but it is £63 million. He said that it is a burden on the United Kingdom shipping industry, but he fails to take account of the fact that 90 per cent. of light dues are paid by foreign shipping. He is suggesting that this sum should be paid by United Kingdom taxpayers. The logic behind that statement is not as impressive as I would expect from the hon. Gentleman. It is perhaps understandable that his logic is not as impeccable as normal at such an hour of the morning.

No doubt we shall return to these matters, when I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be thinking a little more clearly.

Social Workers

5.27 am

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): I listened with considerable attention to the interesting attempt to separate the men from the buoys. I am delighted that there is little danger of your becoming automated, Madam Deputy Speaker. If I am to step out of order, I would far rather have your eyes flashing at me in disapproval than some automated blinker.

The point of the debate is to try to clear up some of the misunderstandings about social workers which I do not think it is unfair to suggest are shared by some hon. Members and are widely held by the public. For that reason, it is a sensible subject to raise in the debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill even if I were the only hon. Member to speak. I am delighted, however, to see the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) and my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) here to add their considerable understanding to the debate.

I speak partly as the outgoing chairman of the parliamentary panel for personal and social services, but I do not expect—I do not think that I am qualified—to dazzle the cognoscenti of the social worker world. I hope that any experts who read what I have to say will not be too contemptuous of the simplicity of my approach.

What is a social worker? Twenty four thousand 800 qualified and unqualified social workers are employed by social service departments in England and Wales—one for every 1,900 persons. This exludes the probation officers, who are also social workers, but who are in a different service. This compares with one general practitioner for every 2,000 persons in England and one police constable for every 550 persons.

By no means are all social workers young and inexperienced. For a long time there was a belief that most social workers were dolly birds with neither experience nor good training. One third of the intake to the certificate of social service training courses at the start of a career are aged between 35 and 44. The spread of age thoughout the profession is comparable to that in any other profession.

Social workers are to be found mostly in social service departments, but around 16 per cent. of them work in the voluntary sector, some work in private practice and some are attached to the armed services. It is perhaps also worth saying in this child's guide to the profession, that where teachers have pupils and doctors have patients, social workers, like lawyers, have clients.

Social workers mostly do what Parliament tells them to do. More than 36 principal Acts govern their work. We in the House shower regulations upon them as if we wanted to give them some sort of ticker tape welcome. Their duties include the requirement to help children either in trouble or at risk of being so, both in their own homes and when removed from their homes and to help disabled and handicapped people in residential care and in their own homes. The pressure to empty the huge institutions not only moves an individual from residential care into the community but also transfers financial responsibility from the National Health Service to local authorities.

It is worth noting that efficiency improvements in the hospital services, such as the faster turnround of patients and the greater use of hospital beds, throws added burdens on to social service departments, usually with no additional resources allocated to meet them. They also have a duty to help to look after the elderly. This is a rapidly growing source of demand that is outrunning the provision of resources. Our present Ministers have done a great deal to get more resources in real terms, but in 1984-85 — the last year for which I have figures — the number of meals provided, the number of home-help hours and the number of local authority-supported residents in old people's homes had fallen to 91 per cent., 85 per cent., and 74 per cent. respectively of the 1978-79 levels. What is more, the age of the elderly has increased. In my own constituency, Kent County Council spends 85 per cent. of its budget for the elderly on the over-85s.

The clients of social services departments are disproportionately from among the poor and disadvantaged, but we should remember that thousands of clients have difficulties that have little or nothing to do with being poor and the tendency, prevalent in our society, to attach importance to a service relative to what one might quote as the importance of its clientele has only to be described to be seen to be disgraceful.

What sort of people are social workers? Social workers are taught that it is more important to listen than to talk, more important to assist a client to work out his or her own solution than to direct and better to help a client identify and use their own or their family resources than to depend on outside help. As the Barclay report said:

> "The aim of social workers will always be to create a relationship with their clients so that the tasks are accomplished in partnership by people who share some measure of trust and understanding."

If that is the goal, social work will attract into its ranks men and women who are different from most recruits into other professions, even those concerned directly with helping others. Many policemen will get caught up in the complexity of human motivation or the subtleties of cultural difference but, on the whole, police recruits want to be able easily to differentiate right from wrong and to see that the wrongdoer is caught and punished.

For many lawyers, it is precisely the ability to separate the key issues in a legal dispute and to achieve the best for their client that is their strength. To weigh one family member's interests against another is often to betray that trust. That is why our adversarial legal system often exacerbates family disputes.

If, as has been said,

> "social workers will always be bound to put into practice in their work a respect for persons and to see other people in all the complexity of their life, relationships and environment", it is small wonder if they sometimes come, like Voltaire, to believe: "Tout comprendre c'est tout pardonnez." Therein lies another danger.

If one has a profession that not only recruits compassionate people in the first place but then spends much of their training teaching them how to ensure that their clients receive all the resources to which they are entitled, encourages them to develop family and community networks of support and to become more articulate and effective in standing up for themselves, its members will naturally tend to become the champions of the poor, the deprived and the powerless. Indeed, for many social workers that becomes a major role and many critics of social work base their attacks on a perception that individual social workers are less effective in pursuing that role than they feel they ought to be.

I believe that that places social workers in a serious double jeopardy. It leads many of them into accepting a narrow and often transiently fashionable view of what are and are not acceptable policies. For example, many social workers seem to believe that public provision of services is incontrovertibly superior to private provision. I have met social workers who seem to think that if a pensioner, for example, chooses to pay for private residential accommodation and outlives his or her capacity to keep up the payments they should be, as it were, punished by being put much further back in the queue for local authority help than someone who, for whatever reason, has never made the effort to contribute in that way. That has to be nonsense.

If, on the whole, people in Britain are to continue to enjoy the rising real incomes and stability of personal savings that the Government have delivered successfully over the past eight years, the partnership between private resources and public funds has to be accepted joyfully and effectively defined and developed. There is also the danger of undermining one of the objectives of good case work; the liberation of a client to enable him or her once again to determine their own future. If the habit of blaming the system becomes too ingrained, it can easily lead to ignoring altogether the part played by some clients in the creation of their own difficulties.

It is noteworthy that that theme never appears in, for example, the classic study of study work practice, the Barclay report. Not only is it bad social work; it is bad politics. It hands to those who do not want to know the real condition of the poor a perfect excuse for not listening to the voice of social work when it is raised on their behalf. That is one reason I welcome the decision of the four professional associations to establish the parliamentary panel and why I have been pleased to play a small part in it.

It is not only appropriate but necessary for social workers to inform Government and the public about the work that they do and the conditions in which they do it. I am equally sure that that task has to be performed with accuracy, relevance and as clear an understanding as possible of the practical choices open to Government and to social services departments. For far too long, medicine or the economics of benefit have dominated discussions of policies that are directed at improving the conditions of the least fortunate in society. It is high time that social work and social services played a role proportionate to their importance. Yet social workers are required by Parliament frequently to act both as rationers and gatekeepers, on behalf of the taxpayer saying no to clients' demands for more benefit or better services. More often than not, it is their decision whether a child stays at home or is taken into care, whether an old person gets a place in a home or stays with the exhausted carer, or whether a mentally handicapped person stays in an institution or goes out into the community.

They are powerful decisions, and are seen by the public to be so. Moreover, if a decision goes badly wrong—if a child who is kept with a family suffers abuse or dies—the press and the public will not hesitate to vilify a social worker. They will instantly forget that, yesterday, they enjoyed articles that lambasted social workers for destroying homes and removing parents' rights. They will seldom remember that social work is dangerous. In the past three years, four social workers were killed on duty. That is more than the number of police deaths. Few field workers have not been physically assaulted in the course of their work. Frightened social workers must find it even harder to do the sensitive work of finding the strengths in a client group and helping someone to build on them to climb out of their personal abyss.

The present furore about child abuse will, I hope, be salutary and bring everyone's attention to bear on the muddle that is society's attitude to its own members. I welcome the appointment that was announced today of a senior woman judge to examine the issues raised in Cleveland. I have no intention of seeking to prejudge them here, but I will say that, in Britain, we have nugatory training for people in how to be parents, nugatory support networks for parents, and severe restraints on the right of anyone to intervene between parents and their children.

When one in three marriages ends in divorce and step-parents multiply, these deficiencies are daunting. When we add to them the fact that every social worker knows that when a child is taken from his home, his chances of returning satisfactorily to it diminish sharply after a mere six weeks and become sadly dim after 12 months, it is hardly surprising that they are reluctant to remove a child in the first instance. That is why the work of the interdepartmental working party reviewing the legislation on children is important. It seeks to define the sort of partnership between a local authority and parents, which holds out some hope of a successful outcome for a child who is taken into care for a period.

It also seeks a system that will cut down the delay in working out a proper arrangement. At present, the system can take nine months or more to deliver a proper regime of care for a child who is at risk. What is more, many of us feel strongly that the present adversarial system for dealing with children's cases is wholly inappropriate. When I worked in Scotland, I played a part in the introduction of children's hearings — a largely non-adversarial system for trying rapidly to reach an agreed regime for children in trouble.

Will the Minister tell us when we can expect real progress towards a similar system in England and Wales? Call it a family court or whatever, but we need something.

There are other burning issues in social work; one is training. For five long and substantially confused years, the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work has argued about a third year of training for professional social workers. Ministers are soon to pronounce on their latest and, I have to say, much their best version of its proposals. I think that the new director and chairman of the central council are some of the best news for social work for a long time.

Everyone agrees that social workers need more training; everyone agrees that the present mix of CSS and CQSW is unsatisfactory. The question is whether a combined pre-entry training lasting some three years, and adding some £40 million to the training bill, is the best solution. It is the solution that the Beckford inquiry pressed for. Would it be better to offer the third year later and, if that were the decision, would it be honoured in practice? We also know that between 80 ad 90 per cent. of all residential staff have no professional qualifications. What can and should be done about that? Perhaps the Minister will give us some clues this morning.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Is there not a risk of putting too much emphasis upon technical and professional qualifications and too little emphasis upon common sense?

Mr. Rowe: One person's common sense is another person's prejudice, but one has to be extremely wary of being mesmerised by training. I remember Lord Kilbrandon saying: "If we are not careful, the way we are going now, we will have to have a qualification before helping an old woman across the road." But I take my hon. Friend's point. Ther is a substantial risk that qualified social workers constantly run into problems with which they are unable to cope.

I ask whether they would be better off having a longer pre-entry time for training, or whether it would be better to have the extra time later in their career when they have hit their head on the ceiling with their knowledge once or twice before they absorb any more. That is a serious question about which there is considerable division in the social work world, although the present proposals by the central council have been welcomed by social workers.

Then there is accountability. At its crudest, what is to be done about the unfit social worker and about the use of the term 'social worker', which at present describes anyone, including bricklayers? I have just seen an advertisement of a bricklayer building a wall and being called a social worker because he is doing it in an inner city. The term 'social worker' covers everyone from bricklayers to agony aunts.

Many people in social work believe that the time has come for the Government to create a social work council which will be empowered to regulate the profession. But there are hazards in the proposal. If it were still further to undervalue the non-professionally qualified people in social work, or if it should occupy itself with trade union matters rather than the broad sweep of social work professionalism, it would become like the stick in the fairy tale, which the scolding old woman summoned out of the sack, to her lasting chastisement. Yet it is surely strange that a major profession should have so little control over its affairs. I should be glad to hear from the Minister some of her thoughts on that.

Two other matters and then I am done. The first concerns one of the central tenets of social work practice; working with others and making maximum use of all resources. The Cleveland affair has demonstrated dramatically the importance of different professions working together to a common end, but it should be the same in all facets of social work.

There is no doubt, for example, that in developing community care the closest co-operation between professions, voluntary organisations and members of the public is absolutely essential. In my part of Kent we have so far achieved miracles of rehabilitation for many clients as they leave hospital for a place in the community. It is all due to skilful and dedicated working together.

That is why I was appalled to learn that in some areas, health authorities, suddenly aware that they are losing resources and influence as patients turn into clients, are establishing separate, health-dominated community care systems. Even worse, Mr. Utting — chief social work inspector at the Department of Health and Social Services — told the parliamentary panel for personal social services that not only did he not know that, but he probably never would have known of it as it was of no direct concern to the Department. I ask the Minister to comment on that potentially disastrous waste of resources and on the Department's role in preventing that.

I wish to draw attention to the huge importance of both the voluntary sector and the volunteers to social workers and their clients. Simply to mention the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, Dr. Barnado's, Age Concern or the Spastics Society is sufficient to remind the House how rich we are in devotion and expertise outside Government ranks. I mightily applaud the growing willingness of social services departments not only to work with voluntary organisations, but to clarify and define their mutual roles. Volunteers form a vein of ever-richer value, whether that is tapped by organisations such as Community Service Volunteers or directly by social services departments and hospital authorities. One person in five in Britain already offers help on a regular — at least monthly — basis.

It is devoutly to be hoped that the process will continue as more and more people have disposable time, disposable income and varied skills and experience to offer, and at a much earlier stage in their career than hitherto. Social workers will need to become ever more skilful at working with them. In that way society can, perhaps, go some way towards healing itself. For far too long we have cared with our voices, clamouring for someone to do something about the problems that are too complex, too distressing, too messy or too dangerous for us to face. That someone has usually been the social worker, trying desperately to meet the conflicting demands made of him by the prejudices, fears and carelessness of the rest of us. We in Parliament, like the rest of society, owe a great deal to social workers. Above all, we owe them understanding and support in their difficult role.

5.52 am

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) on his profoundly thoughtful speech in the debate that he initiated on social workers. It is of value to the House and the country that, from time to time, hon. Members enter into the discussion on the work of certain specialised professions. My hon. Friend has done that in depth, and we are in his debt.

I wish to share my hon. Friend's general tribute to social workers and the value of their work both to the community and to individuals in need of their help. I hope that my hon. Friend did not mind my intervention. We live in a society that places undue emphasis on professional qualifications. Of course people need to be good at their jobs, and of course they need to know how to do them. There must be some means of testing to be sure that they know how to do them, and that is the purpose of a professional qualification. However, a professional qualification is a necessary, but not in itself a sufficient, condition of being able to do a job well. In addition, to do a complicated and important job people need gift, flair, insight and wisdom, and those cannot come solely from book learning, technical expertise or even from experience. They must also owe something to talent. Nowhere is this more necessary than in social work. We are all aware of the difficulties under which social workers have to operate and of how easy it is, with hindsight, to be critical when things go wrong. We are all aware of the special need for insight as well as professional qualifications.

I wish to refer to a constituency case involving social workers. For the past few days a little girl aged four and a half years has been in the burns unit of Queen Mary's hospital, Roehampton, having been badly scalded by boiling water. The case is distressing and worrying, and yesterday I felt it necessary to draw the facts, as far as I knew them, to the attention of the Twickenham police.

Just over a year ago the social services department of the Richmond upon Thames borough council was warned that the little girl in question, Joy Scott Chaney, could be in danger. The warning came from a highly responsible and respected person who runs an excellent playgroup. Having noticed a considerable amount of bruising on the child, this lady was sufficiently concerned to bring the matter to the attention of the social services department of the Richmond upon Thames borough council.

A circular had been sent by the council to all independent playgroup proprietors. It said:

"If you have any concern about a child in your care, please contact the social work team for your area."

That is exactly what the lady did. A case conference was called. I quote from the case papers:

"On the evening of 27 June 1986 the playgroup proprietor"

whom I shall not now name

"telephoned Mrs. Dolton, an assistant day-care advisor, to express concern about serious bruising that her staff had noticed on Joy's arms and abdomen in the course of the week. Mrs. Dolton subsequently referred the matter to the Twickenham intake team for investigation. On 30 June 1986, Mr. Burridge, duty social worker, visited the kindergarten and was informed that frequent bruising had been noted on the child during recent months and recorded in a note book by staff as follows:

24 April 1986—Very severe bruising noted on Joy's forehead. Father stated that she had tripped over his foot whilst out shopping.

28 April—Joy covered in bruises, some very livid, behind her left knee especially.

6 May—New bruising noted on child's arms, two the size of a 5p coin on the front of her arms just above her elbows and smaller, less distinct ones in a row on the back of her arm.

15 May—New bruise noted in the mid-back of the left thigh.

19 May—Large bruise and lump noted on forehand and graze on nose. Child stated that she fell over whilst at somebody else's house.

13 June—Large bruises noted on the child's legs on return from holiday. Mother informed staff that there was 'nothing to worry about' and that Joy was unhappy and just needed to settle again.

17 June—Bruising on front of Joy's legs, especially around her knees. (She was wearing thick tights.) There was also bruising on her left inner ribs, the size of a 5p coin.

27 June—Fresh bruising noted on the middle of child's back and more on the right side of her waist. Also a very nasty bruise the size of a large egg on the right side at front waist level and more on her thighs the size of a 10p coin. Whilst at the kindergarten Mr. Burridge noted the extent of bruising on the child on a skin map, having observed Joy at play."

At a subsequent conference, two weeks after the previous case conference—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order; I can barely hear the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel).

Mr. Jessel: At a subsequent conference, medical opinion suggested that the bruising could have been caused entirely by a blood condition. However, medical opinion in this matter is not unanimous.

Yesterday I showed the papers to a distinguished doctor, the former dean of a medical school of one of the great London teaching hospitals. He was thus responsible for the training of hundreds of doctors. He was highly sceptical of the suggestion that so much bruising, occurring in a short time of a few weeks, could be explained solely in terms of a blood condition coupled with ordinary childhood collisions.

On the face of it, it appears that the view of the former dean of the medical school was one of common sense. The doctor who examined the child was a junior doctor, a registrar, with nowhere near consultant status. That doctor should not have had the last word. I believe that in such sensitive matters we should all make a point of remembering the wise advice of Sir Winston Churchill:

"Experts should be kept on tap and not on top."

A second case conference decided that the child's name should not be placed on the child abuse register—based on the advice of the doctor to whom I have just referred. The child's health and development were to be monitored by out-patient appointments at the West Middlesex hospital and by the general practitioner and the community health services. It was agreed that there was to be "no on-going social work involvement as the parents are opposed to such intervention".

I believe that this last decision was wrong.

Once it was decided not to place the child on the child abuse list, there was insufficient follow-up by the Richmond upon Thames social services department. Little if anything was done to inform the infant school attended by the child that the child may have been in danger. It has since become clear that both the head of that infant school, Stanley road infant school at Teddington and the nursery class teacher had cause to feel somewhat worried about the child during the ensuring year.

I am concerned that when the child was taken into hospital with severe scalding the social services department was not informed. It appears that, following the two case conferences, there was an element of complacency in the social services department of the borough council about the dangers that the child faced.

I do not think that anyone can criticise the playgroup proprietor for referring the case to me. She is a responsible person, the wife of a solicitor, and her playgroup is of first-class repute. That lady had first gone through the proper procedures by referring the case to the borough council. With her experience and knowledge of small children, she had felt cause for continuing concern about this child, and events have tragically proved her right.

I hope that the borough council will look into its procedures to see what can be done to reduce the risk to other children. I ask also that my hon. Friend make inquiries about what happened, with a view to preventing any recurrence.

6.5 am

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): Madam Deputy Speaker, may I first say how much I welcome the fact that you have taken the Chair and say what a pleasure it will be to speak in this debate with you presiding over it. I should like to welcome the fact that the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) has chosen this as the subject of his debate.

In 1982 Peter Barclay said that social workers had two main functions—the organisation of social work and counselling. That remains the case today but th demands that are being made on social workers and the context in which they carry out those two functions are altering dramatically. Social workers are required to paper over the cracks in an increasingly divided society.

The cruel increase in unemployment subjects families to stresses and strains that lead to increasing demands, which need an increasing response from social workers. The increasing demands that are placed by unemployment on social work are recognised by the Association of Directors of Social Services, by the British Association of Social Workers and by many other professional organisations.

The dramatic increase in the number of people who are dependent on benefits means more work for social workers as they try to help people who are struggling on inadequate incomes. The deteriorating conditions in the inner cities mean that more people turn to social workers for help. Social workers may, for example, try to help a family through a crisis that is caused by inadequate housing. In my own constituency I know that social workers are increasingly involved in desperate attempts by families who are under pressure and who are trying to get rehoused in a situation where the housing pool is disintegrating rather than increasing. In the inner cities, social workers are often called upon, for example, to help a woman who has become addicted to tranquillisers that might have become necessary initially because of anxiety caused by repeatedly being burgled. In the inner cities, social workers are often called upon to help youngsters who are starting to drop out of school and who start to sniff glue.

I am talking not only about an increase in the work load of social workers but about work that is becoming more stressful, difficult and frustrating as the circumstances of their clients become more and more difficult. As the hon. Member for Mid-Kent said, social workers are increasingly subject to attack. We know that the incidence of attacks by clients on their social workers has increased dramatically. I do not believe that we know the full extent of that because social workers are reluctant to report such incidents because they want to encourage and help their clients. They are trained to put themselves second and not to speak out about their own problems. Therefore, I do not think that we know the full extent of physical attacks on social workers. There should be some initiative to collect information nationally about the level of those attacks which are of growing concern.

Social workers go—and must go—to places where even the postman is not prepared to go and where the milkman may have ceased delivery. Doctors will not visit certain estates, yet it is expected that social workers will go, often on their own, into people's homes, in circumstances in which many other professionals or employees would not go. I hope that the Minister may take the opportunity to report to us on the progress of the inquiry into the death of Isobel Schwatz.

I have already mentioned the increase in the problems caused by Government policy that cause problems for the clients whom the social workers help to look after. Demographic changes have also increased the work load for social workers. Obviously, we welcome the fact that people with disabilities have a much greater survival rate, but that often means that they need more help. People are living a great deal longer, which means that more people need social work help, even if it is only to assess their need of other services.

Mr. Rowe: Does the hon. Lady agree that it is 11 years since Amelia Harris did her great study on old people? Does she agree that our understanding of old people in need, particularly the statistics for them, is badly in need of updating?

Ms. Harman: Absolutely. We are dealing with a whole range of statistics which are out of date because of the shape of the population and the increasing number, not only of elderly people, but of very elderly people.

The changes in the approach to social work, most of which are welcome, have also increased the responsibility on social workers. It has been recognised that services must be more consumer friendly which has meant allowing those who need the services to plan and choose their services. Obviously, that requires social workers to be more flexible in allowing their clients to have a say, which places extra demands on social workers. That change from handing out paternalistic, patronising, pre-packaged services, as was sometimes the case in the past, has placed an extra demand on social workers.

It has been recognised that greater help must be given to carers and that social work departments cannot leave people who are caring for elderly or disabled relatives on their own and excluded from social services. That again, has opened up a whole new area of demand on social workers. Care in the community, as the Government are currently operating it, has cast on to the shoulders of already over-committed social workers the responsibility for supporting in the community people who would previously have been in residential care. I know that it causes social workers great anxiety that they have the responsibility of assessing the needs of someone who is moving into the community from an institution and of smoothing that path when the social workers do not have adequate back-up facilities in the social work department to make the transition an easy one for all concerned.

Several steps in relation to social work are overdue. The hon. Member for Mid-Kent mentioned the funding of a third year of social work training. Obviously, we all believe that social workers should have common sense and we can all think of examples where more common sense was needed, but that does not mean that we should ignore the growing consensus for a third year of training. If it is right to demand high standards of professionalism and competence, it is right to recognise the training implications of those demands.

It is also important to provide sufficient funding to social work departments to meet the additional problems that I have identified as arising from unemployment, poverty and the extra responsibilities of community care. The Government have had rather a cheek in claiming the credit for an increase in spending on personal social services when that increase has been largely in Labour-controlled authorities which have refused to make cuts and insisted on improving and expanding services to meet the growing demands.

It is outrageous for the Government on the one hand to tell social services departments to spend less, and on the other hand to claim the credit when spending by social services departments improves. The Government cannot have it both ways. I accept the points raised by the hon. Member for Mid-Kent about the general social work council, and that point needs more attention and discussion. It is certainly heading in the right direction.

I want to make several brief points about child abuse and child care. The public must choose whether they want a witch hunt or good social policy. I believe that we cannot have both. At the moment there appears to by hysteria and witch hunts, rather than a sensible discussion of child care policy. The hysteria and witch hunting that developed following the tragic death of Jasmine Beckford are now developing in Cleveland. It provides a climate in which it is impossible to make sensible and calm judgments about what is in the best interests of individual children and in which direction the policy for helping children at risk should lead.

I know that it is difficult not to be emotive, because we are talking about vulnerable children who cannot speak up for themselves and the topic invokes revulsion in everyone. On the other hand, we are also concerned with the rights of parents to bring up their own children and the terror that can be struck in parents' hearts at the thought that a child will be taken away. This is an emotive issue, but it is important that we do not allow a climate of hysteria to be whipped up.

It is also a shame that no parliamentary time has yet been set aside for child care law reform. There is a wide concensus about the work that has been carried out in that area and parliamentary time should be set aside for implementing those plans.

It is also a shame that there is no firm proposal yet on when we are to see the introduction of family courts. Some of us feel like parrots, as we have to raise this issue so often. The problem is that there is no longer any reason not to introduce family courts. There is unprecedented agreement on the need for such courts and the form that those courts have taken. I do not believe that events in Cleveland would have developed as they have if the Social Services, the medical authorities and the parents had had the benefit of the involvement of a family court early in the development of the incidents and reformed child care law as the framework within which the family court could operate. I welcome the Government's inquiry. I hope that it will conclude speedily and will stop finding excuses for not taking measures that all in the profession are agreed are necessary.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): Madam Deputy Speaker, may I begin by joining the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) in saying that it is entirely appropriate that you should be presiding over our activities at this strange hour of the morning. I suspect that this might be the first time ever in the House when both Opposition and Government Benches and the Chair have been occupied by women. We give notice to the rest of our colleagues that women are on the march and I hope that more women will join this place and help to serve our people.

I want to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) on his success in the ballot, in one of our quainter rituals of the House, I congratulate him on introducing such an important subject upon which he spoke with the erudition and sensitivity which the subject has long required but which it has not always met in the House.

My hon. Friend referred to the parliamentary panel on personal social service that was set up in the House during the previous Parliament. He knows that when I was a Back Bencher I was in touch with that committee. The establishment of the panel was long overdue and its work is very valuable. My hon. Friend will also be aware that I served for seven years on a major metropolitan social services committee and chaired that committee. I learned then about the terrible things that people do — particularly, perhaps, to their children. But I also learned about the incredible courage, fortitude and endurance of many others, especially the long-term sick and the disabled, and those coping with such people. I recognised, and hope at all times to act upon, their demand to be treated first as human beings and citizens, so that they retain their rights—and, indeed, their obligations—along with the rest of us. But most of all I learned a healthy respect for the skills and the insights of social workers, and I am glad to say that I agree with a great deal of what has been said tonight.

Social workers work in many settings and for many different employers. It is worth remembering that they do not all work for local authorities, and that they are not all employed in the same way. They work in hospitals, fieldwork teams and residential institutions; often they work unseen in the domiciliary setting of other people's homes. A large number work for voluntary organisations, and about 24,000 work for local authorities. Nowadays, nearly all of those who work for local authorities are qualified in one way or another.

Social workers who work in the social services departments are charged to perform tasks that mainly arise from the powers and duties given by their employers to Parliament. They are the majority. In this important sense, social workers are public servants working on behalf of their employers and of society—in other words, the rest of us.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent referred to child care law, and I shall go into some of the issues in detail. However, before I do so, it is worth remembering and perhaps reinforcing the fact that social workers are involved in far more than child care. They are involved with every age group, particularly the elderly, and especially those without close relatives. They are involved with the mentally handicapped—even more so with the strenuous efforts now being made through the community care programme to improve the quality of life for those people. They are involved with the mentally ill, and in that respect psychiatrically trained social workers have a particular part to play.

Social workers are often in the role of gophers—intermediaries—and, as a result, they may take the blame when others fail to deliver. The successes are not always seen, and I believe that the efforts required to produce those successes are rarely understood and frequently underestimated by the general public. That is well illustrated by Wally Harbert, OBE, director of social services for Avon county council, writing in last week's Social Services Insight. In a wry and humorous piece about how the status of social workers might be improved, he suggests that one answer might be to introduce insignia for presenting to persons in other organisations who have distinguished themselves in personal social services activities—a sort of Legion d'Honneur. He says:

"It would go to head teachers who retained troublesome children in their schools, geriatricians who found beds for dying patients, paediatricians who made the same statements in court about child abuse as they made in case conferences, and housing officers who found accommodation for mentally ill people. A special award would be for newspaper editors who produced such unlikely headlines as Social Worker Saves Child.

I must say that I have considerable sympathy with that point of view.

Local authorities determine their own priorities, and it is for them to decide how they should meet the need for social work and other aspects of the important work that we have been discussing. In the rate support grant settlements, the Government set indicative figures for individual local authority services. Those figures take account of the demographic and similar pressures on the personal social services. In successive rate grant settlements, the year-on-year increase in the personal social services indicative figure has been higher than for local government services as a whole in order to reflect those pressures. Between 1978-79 and 1987-88, expenditure on the personal social services grew in cost terms by 34 per cent., and by over 10 per cent. more than was required to meet demographic and other pressures. In 1986-87, the net current expenditure growth was 8·5 per cent. This year, the provisional figure is 4·7 per cent. That makes a total of a 13 per cent. increase over the past two years. The money is available.

Government plans have usually reflected the fact that personal social services are subject to such pressures as the growth in the number of elderly people — particularly the very elderly — increasing numbers of difficult children, and the need to take on the taper of joint finance and unemployment. That has been calculated at 2·5 per cent. per year, from which 0·5 per cent. has been deducted to take account of efficiency savings. In this year's expenditure group report, a further 1 per cent., or £27 million, was added to take account of the need to build up services in the community. Potential savings were also netted off to deal with other pressures, such as AIDS and drug abuse, and also with the need for substantial additional investment in social services training. The new figure—a 3·5 per cent. increase—has been fully reflected in local authority current expenditure levels for 1987-88 and amounts to an additional 7 per cent. in cash terms.

I was also asked about meals on wheels and other domiciliary services. We covered some of these issues in our debate on 14 May 1987. As I said then, the number of meals served by the meals on wheels service has risen by £43 million a year during the life of this Government, and 70 per cent. of those meals are delivered to people in their own homes. The number of home helps has increased by 14 per cent. There are now 53,000 full-time equivalents. A substantial army of people are helping others to remain in their own homes.

This rate of growth is rather less than the rate of growth in the directly managed services of the National Health Service. It is due to the fact that this Government run the NHS services more directly than the personal social services which, as the hon. Member for Peckham rightly pointed out, are often run by Labour-controlled councils whose priorities are different.

My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) referred to a particularly sad case: to the injuries to a little girl who so incongruously is named Joy. He has passed the papers to me. I shall look urgently into the matter, and I hope to be able to deal with it.

Mr. Jessel: The papers that I have passed to my hon. Friend refer to the bruising that was caused a year ago. In my speech I referred to recent serious injury by scalding. It is the conjunction of those events, rather than the events taken separately, that is so serious. One child has suffered far too many injuries.

Mrs. Currie: Without yet having had an opportunity to study the papers, I agree with my hon. Friend's last comment, and I shall be very glad to look into the matter.

The hon. Member for Peckham referred to the inquiry into the death of Isabel Schwarz. I shall find out exactly what the state of play is as at 14 July and will write to the hon. Lady. If she wishes me to do so, I shall put that information in the Library.

Mr. Rowe: I have been informed today — Monday in this House — that the inquiry into that case reopened on Monday and that again it is in closed session because of the nature of some of the medical evidence.

Mrs. Currie: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend. He is several hours ahead of me on that issue.

The Government take very seriously the violence that is inflicted on social workers and other care services staff. My hon. Friend Lady Trumpington chaired a working party on violence against not just social workers but NHS staff and those who work in social security offices. That responsibility has been taken on by my hon. Friend Lord Skelmersdale, the new Under-Secretary of State. In the last few days the chief inspector, Mr. Utting, has sent papers to all the local authorities. We believe that they will assist local authorities in the management and organisation of their services so that problems and conflict can be avoided. When there is conflict, the staff will be able to cope with it.

In May, the Association of Directors of Social Services sent out some thoroughly sensible guidelines. Partly as a result of recent tragic cases involving the death of social workers and attacks upon them, some progress is now being made. There is better training of staff. They now know both how to avoid problems and how to deal with them.

Several hon. Members mentioned the child care law and the necessity for reform. The Government accept that the existing child care legislation is confused, and that it is confusing for social workers in doing their work, and that it urgently needs reform. Our proposals are set out in the White Paper and have followed, in many instances, the views of the Select Committee of which I was a member. We believe that the proposals will lead to a greater clarity of purpose, will bring parents and public bodies into a closer partnership and will be more fair than the current arrangements to children and their families. The Government are committed to enacting this legislation at the earliest opportunity.

Perhaps it is appropriate, since we have talked a lot about reforming the law, to bear in mind exactly what the White Paper has suggested that we might do. We will take into account in the exact formulation of the proposals that will be put before the House, the results of the current inquiries. Broadly speaking, I feel that many of the suggestions that we have made in the Select Committee report and in the White Paper are along the right lines, and I would be glad to hear the views of hon. Members as to whether they feel that to be the case.

The White Paper's proposals are wide-ranging. The key points include a positive statement of the role of local authorities in promoting the care and upbringing of children within their families, which will generally be in the child's interests. Local authorities' existing statutory responsibilities towards children for whom they are caring away from home will be recast. The changes will build on existing welfare principle that governs local authority decisions about a child for whom they are caring. The local authority will be under an obligation to safeguard and promote the health, education, development and welfare of the child, and in particular to afford him opportunities for the proper development of his character and abilities. The authority will continue to be required to give due consideration to his wishes and feelings in these matters and to his religous persuasion and racial and cultural background. In addition, the authority will continue to be under a duty to review the child's position every six months.

Children and young people who are leaving care may face difficulties in adjusting to the change in their circumstances, so two changes to local authorities' duties are proposed. First, they would be required—we wish to make it as strong as that—to advise and assist children and the young people for whom they are caring so as to promote their welfare when that care ends. Secondly, the prevous duty to advise and befriend all those who leave care after leaving school, provided that their welfare requires it and that they request it, which currently lasts until 18 years of age, will be extended to cover those up to the age of 21 years. Those proposals are in the White Paper in chapter three.

For children who are looked after under voluntary arrangements an emphasis will be on a partnership between parents and the local authority in caring for their child. The local authority's responsibility for planning its care to extend to all such children, including those who are handicapped, will be emphasised for, I think, the first time.

There will be clearer and greater emphasis on the local authority's parental responsibilities for children who are committed to its care by a court order. In particular, there will be a rationalisation of the 20 or more legal provisions by which a child can be committed to the care of a local authority.

There will be a new and simplified list of legal grounds on which a court order committing a child to local authority care can be made. The new grounds should cover cases where substantial harm is likely in the future as well as those where harm has already occurred. Local authorities should no longer be able to take parental rights over a child in their care without references to a court and we hope that changes to court procedure will be introduced to ensure a fairer and more expeditious means for the court to determine what is best for the child. Recent attention to issues in Cleveland and elsewhere mean that some of the provisions are even more important than they were when the White Paper was written.

We want to see a full involvement of parents in court proceedings and more involvement of relatives, friends and foster parents. We will be extending the court's present power to hear cases where access to a child in care is denied to cover cases where there is dispute over the reasonableness of the access that is granted.

Clear rights of appeal from decisions in magistrates courts will be introduced for local authorities and parents, in addition to the existing appeal rights for the child. We hope to recast the law governing private and voluntary facilities for children, leading particularly to improved arrangements for facilities for under-fives and hopefully a more rational approach to facilities for older children.

Hon. Members will realise that that is a major piece of child care legislation and is a considerable reform. As presently drafted in its preliminary form, it already runs to over 100 clauses. It is therefore right and proper that it be introduced when sufficient time is allowed in the House for its discussions to proceed without hindrance. We look forward to doing that at the earliest opportunity.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent and the hon. Member for Peckham mentioned the importance of introducing some non-adversarial system for discussing family and child proceedings, and called for the formation of a family court. That matter was raised by the Select Committee on Social Services at the time I served on it and it has been repeatedly suggested from the 1970s. The matter is under discussion. As yet, I have no further progress to report.

To cover both education and training prior to qualification and post-qualifying training, there is a shared responsibility between the Government and the local authority employers. The Government spend £11·25 million annually in support of the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work, of which £7·5 million is grants for students and direct support of training. In 1987-88 we have made provision for an extra £10 million to be made available to social services departments for training. We estimate that local authorities spend some £20 million a year on internal and external training, which is not a small sum.

We can see that improvements are needed. Our acceptance of that obligation was clearly set out on 6 April 1987 in the letter from my hon. Friend the Minister for Health to Professor Saul, in which he said:

"It is therefore clearly right that CCETSW should be examining these problems and considering what might be done to bring about improvements. I must say however, that the arguments for the proposals contained in Consultation Paper 20.6 do not provide a sufficiently clear or sound basis for the Government to give you a final decision."

Therefore, we have asked the CCETSW to do more.

We shall look carefully at the proposals that we expect this autumn from it.

I concur with the statement by my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham that training alone is not enough. We need to ensure that we recruit people of maturity and common sense. In my view, common sense is not a bad thing in any form of work. It is particularly valuable when dealing with the fine judgments that a social worker is called on to make. It is important that we motivate and support them and retain their skills later for the service of clients. There are considerable parallels here for the other caring services.

I have heard what was said about the profession's desire to regulate itself and the proposed general social work council. Our position is, broadly, that it is not in the first instance for the Government to act anyway. We shall listen carefully to arguments from the employers and the professions. We want a convincing case to be made that it is in the public interest that the profession should be regulated in any of the proposed ways. It is worth going into that aspect in a little more detail because it helps to illustrate some of the difficulties that face those who would turn the social work profession into some model which is based on one of the other professions and has the same difficulties.

There is renewed interest among professional social services associations in seeking support for a GSWC in some form, but the main role and functions of the regulatory body are not yet the subject of agreement between the associations. Indeed, there are large gaps between them. We have at all times shown a willingness to listen to the debate and we have encouraged greater agreement on the fundamentals. My hon. Friend the Minister for Health had a meeting with the British Association of Social Workers on 28 January this year when some of these issues were explored in depth.

The claim of social work to be a professional occupation rests in part on the existence and the transmission to practitioners of a set of values finding expression in an ethical code. Training courses leading to the certificate of qualification of social work normally give attention to social work values and ethics. But not all those practising as social workers, particularly in residential and day care settings, have had the opportunity for professional training.

BASW, which has about 10,000 members, adopted a code of ethics for its members in 1975. The Social Care Association, with 5,000 to 6,000 members, is consulting its members this year about the introduction of a code. Not all social workers, however, are members of those organisations. The way forward according to those bodies is through the establishment of a national regulatory council which they hope will protect the interests of personal social service consumers and maintain satisfactory standards of conduct and practice among all social services staff in contact with clients. Also envisaged is the incorporation of the functions of the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work in the new council, which would include the promotion of training, the approval of courses of study and the awarding of certificates to successful students.

The Barclay committee report of 1982 provided a comprehensive review of arguments for and against the creation of a general social work council. Among the counter-arguments put to the committee were that such a council could be part of the creation of a self-protecting elite group of social workers, that the definition of social work is still unclear and accordingly that it is uncertain which staff would be eligible to be registered; and that as local government is the principal employer of social workers, its conditions of service provide sufficient means to regulate the conduct of social workers and other social services staff.

Such arguments, which came mainly from local authority associations and NALGO, reflect their stance in the current debate about a regulatory body. Local authorities have responsibility for the quality and standard of work done by their staff. Social service staff function as the agents of the local authority, not as independent practitioners.

The earlier lack of agreement expressed to the Barclay committee by professional associations persists. The Association of Directors of Social Services envisages that all people with a recognised social work qualification who are in practice should be eligible for registration. By contrast, the SCA argues for a broader approach in which registration would be a requirement for all staff in personal social services — qualified or not — who hold positions of authority over clients. BASW's firm stance, which broadly accords with that of the ADSS, is subject to current review. NALGO has issued a statement of opposition. That is not a very strong basis of agreement on which the Government can support further moves.

Mr. Rowe: Whether a council is the right way forward is something that will be considered during the next few months. What worries me is that, in inter-professional discussions, there is a tendency for the old established professions, notably medicine, to assume a seniority and authority which is often unjustified. It is in the public interest to foster good practice which is found in several areas so that, when they earn it by expertise and experience, social workers are accorded the kind of professional seniority which, at the moment, too often goes by the board.

Mrs. Currie: I recognise the force of the feeling behind my hon. Friend's assertions, but I am sure that he agrees that we must aim to achieve teams that are genuinely multidisciplinary and teams that are genuinely teams. People should share all their skills to assist clients.

The current debate and the papers produced by professional associations have been brought formally to the attention of the CCETSW. I would be unhappy at entering endless negotiations about the status of social workers when we are more interested in the quality and standard of social work. I am keen to ensure that we do not lose sight of the client and his or her needs, or of the employer — usually the local authority — its statutory responsibilities, the taxpayer and the ratepayer.

There is considerable public ambivalence about social workers. I hope that this debate will play its part in helping to resolve the public's feelings about the role of social workers. We all feel some concern when we recognise that perhaps some over-zealous bureaucrat is meddling in people's lives. Yet we call them in to protect us from the difficult problems of the real world outside. We hand over to social workers the flotsam and jetsam of our society and then we criticise them for perhaps being too interested in those who have little opportunity to stand up for themselves. We criticise when social workers are too cautious or when they are over-eager. The British public persists in the belief that there is a formula for social work, whereas each case is different.

I think it was in the Barclay report that social workers were described as brokers in lesser evils. Perhaps that sums up exactly the role that they have to play. The Government value what is being done by social workers. We recognise that the work is important, difficult, stressful and frequently dangerous. We recognise that the work involves the exercise of considerable influence over people's lives, often with pressure and conflict. We want to ensure that, as far as possible, social workers are well equipped and supported in the work that they do. I put on record my appreciation of everything that they do and try to do.

Fire and Civil Defence Authorities

6.45 am

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): It gives me great pleasure at this hour, having sat all through the night giving moral support to hon. Members on both sides of the House in a number of interesting debates, to see the end of this marathon sitting ahead. I hope that at the end of the morning's celebrations I shall have been able to shine some chink of light on the matters that I wish to raise with the Under-Secretary.

It is no accident that I raise the issue of Government funding arrangements for fire and civil defence authorities as I am still a member of the Greater Manchester fire and civil defence authority. In the period between abolition and the setting up of the new authority I was a member of the transitional organisation. Since the setting up of the authority I have been the Labour party spokesperson and whip on the authority and as such have been involved in detailed discussions about the running of the authority, both in terms of its policy towards the development of the service and how that service is funded. Interlinked with that, there has been the role of civil defence obligations within the all-purpose authority.

I want to mention three items in the debate. The first item relates to the fire service and the delivery of service by fire fighters. The second item relates to capital allocations and expenditure limitations in the civil defence and the third item relates to the inclusion of fire authorities in the Local Government (No. 2) Bill in respect of the privatisation of certain aspects of the fire service. I do not want to go over all of the ground about the whys and wherefores of abolition.

Much of what I complain about stems from the hurried way in which the Government carried out that operation and failed to take into account the nature of the single purpose bodies they were setting up and the way in which those bodies, not only in the short term but in the long term, have to be funded in a way different from other local government organisations.

The fire and civil defence authorities are all subject to precept limitations under the Local Government Act 1985. This means that the Home Office prescribes the maximum expenditure level—MEL—for each joint authority. The grant entitlement is calculated by reference to grant-related expenditure and other calculators set by the Department of the Environment. The precept raises the difference between those two calculations and the entitlement that flows from the calculations is prescribed as a maximum by the Home Office.

The two target areas have been met by two separate Government Departments. The MELs set by the Home Office, which also provide establishment levels and establishment costs, average about 80 per cent. of the total expenditure. That is important in respect of that high level of investment in manpower when changes take place in expenditure levels and how critical that can be to the service in respect of maximum expenditure levels.

The grant-related expenditure assessment is calculated by the Department of the Environment on a hypothetical assessment of need to spend based on total population, density and fire calls. There is no consistent relationship between those two targets, and the statistics for 1987-88 show unsatisfactory, unexplained discrepancies. For example, the grant-related expenditure assessment as a percentage of maximum expenditure limits for Merseyside is 97 per cent., for West Midlands it is 97 per cent. and it gradually goes down the scale. It is 85 per cent. for London, 84 per cent. for my authority in Greater Manchester, 83 per cent. for Tyne and Wear, 81 per cent. for South Yorkshire, and, at the bottom of the pile, is poor old West Yorkshire. The result of that discrepancy is the loss of block grant for spending at Home Office target levels with consequent increases in precept levels. This year the Merseyside precept is 6·3p in the pound. In West Yorkshire, an authority of a similar size and nature, the precept is 11·59p in the pound. Yet, there is no indication that the standard of fire cover in West Yorkshire is almost twice that on Merseyside. That is the result of the central financing systems. The fire authorities are working to common standards. They are controlled at establishment level by the Home Office and are subject to Her Majesty's inspectors audit. On the face of it there is no justification for the differences and the result is an imposed burden on precept payers in many metropolitan areas.

The absurdity is best demonstrated by the London fire and civil defence authority, which receives no block grant because GREA is so far below maximum expenditure levels. That arises because of totally erroneous assumptions by the Department of the Environment on financial resources available to the authority. I am genuinely hopeful that at the end of this debate the Minister will provide the House with a satisfactory explanation for that wholly unsatisfactory state of affairs.

The effect on Greater Manchester fire and civil defence authority in the past 12 months has been serious. The Home Office set the maximum expenditure limit at £44,232,000. Albeit as a consequence of the Secretary of State for the Environment's indiscretions earlier this year, the redetermination process was suspended and the maximum expenditure limit was eventually converted into the precept level of 9·75p in the pound. However, if the Secretary of State, old Nick as he is commonly known, had got his way, he would have set GREA at £37,241,000. That is £7 million below the Home Office's own assessment of my authority's requirements simply to stand still in the current financial year. If that figure had been imposed on us we would have had drastic cuts in our budget in terms of manpower, ridership factors and in relation to our successful Whelephant operation, which is known throughout the United Kingdom and Europe as the most success attempt to teach children and others in the education process about fire and the prevention of fire. Therefore, an error of judgment by the Secretary of State has prevented us from being paid £7 million less this year than the figure set by the Home Office Minister.

The Association of Metropolitan Authorities has been considering the matter for the past 12 months and on 26 May its sub-committee met to discuss papers prepared by the Home Office and the Department of the Environment addressing the options about the discrepancies on GREA and the Home Office determined expenditure limits for all of the metropolitan fire authorities. The AMA felt that, despite the obvious delay in completing the fire risk areas exercise some one-off proposal should be made to the Home Office for 1988-89 which would

"recognise the total expenditure resources required by individual authorities in order to meet their statutory functions and support their (Home Office) approved establishment levels; minimise the differences in GREA's and ELs so that the precept levels within the metropolitan areas would be similar and reflect the provision of a (largely) homogeneous service provided to nationally determined standards as monitored by Home Office inspectors."

The authority subsequently asked for information from constituent metropolitan fire authorities that would help them in negotiations with the Home Office. That exercise has highlighted major discrepancies between authorities with a commonality of interest. At this hour, I do not wish to tax the House or the Minister with a further list of statistics. Therefore, I recommend to the Minister the AMA report that was approved on 8 July 1987, a copy of which I understand has been sent to his office.

The views of the AMA have all-party support. I do not attempt to use the difficulties between the Home Office and the Department of the Environment for party political purposes. All of us who have worked for fire and civil defence authorities recognise that they are here to stay for a considerable time. Even if the Labour party wins the next general election, fire authorities will remain in place for a considerable time thereafter. Therefore, we are in the real job of trying to come to an accommodation with the Minister about appropriate funding for single purpose authorities. That was basically highlighted by the London fire and civil defence authority on 9 July, when an all-party resolution was approved, stating that the current methodology for GREA is unsuitable for assessing expenditure levels and that more regard must be paid to the standards of fire cover set out by the Home Office, a review of which is presently being undertaken not only by the London FCDA but by most metropolitan fire and civil defence authorities.

Two matters must be considered by the Minister. One is what we shall do in the short term, and the other is what we shall do in the long term. In the long term, we must examine a system that is based on the risk categorisation exercise from which all other factors such as needs and resources ultimately come. I have noted that the Home Secretary's working party discussion paper is examining some of the AMA options in developing GREA for 1988, 1989 and 1990, based on establishment levels, total calls, pensions and fire prevention work, but as yet no firm decisions have been forthcoming from the Department. Such delays have been unhelpful to fire and civil defence authorities who are desperately trying to plan without the obvious abilities of multi-purpose shire counties to support levels of expenditure by virement of GRE between service heads, or using contingencies and balances that are almost always available within larger budget heads such as those commonly available to shire counties.

Fire and civil defence authorities are not in the business of trying to rob Peter to pay Paul. There is no suggestion, nor would I support any proposal, to move funding from the shire brigades to assist metropolitan brigades. We require an interim agreement for 1988-89 on the recognition by all of us that a long-term formula must be agreed for 1988, 1989 and 1990. There must be some political discussion between the Home Office Ministers and those who are responsible for the day-to-day running of fire and civil defence authorities. The AMA has been asking for such a political level meeting since July 1986, and so far, for various reasons, such a meeting has not taken place. Time is now running out to agree a joint package that will meet the needs of the fire service and suit the ratepayer's pocket. At the end of the day, I shall look to the Minister to give an indication to the House when he will meet fire and civil defence authorities via the AMA this summer. If he is not available, I shall ask the Minister of State to do so as soon as possible.

The Government, through their abolition proposals, created the single purpose authorities such as the FCDA's. They must ensure that they are adequately funded. One approach to consider in 1988-89 is that maximum expenditure should be calculated by reference to the original 1987-88 redetermination submissions, updated for inflation and other committed expenditure. I leave that for comment from the Minister.

I now turn to the problems of civil defence, in particular to the funding arrangements for the planned programme of implementation. Despite the original hostility between local authorities and the Government about attitudes to civil defence, there is now a common purpose about the way in which the Government should proceed about using funding arrangements for civil defence in terms of meeting emergency situations in local communities.

At a recent meeting which I attended at the Home Office, to report on what the Greater Manchester fire and civil defence authority was doing to implement the PPI, it became clear from the representatives of the F6 division of the Department that there was no common ground between those officials and the Department of Environment about the way in which 100 per cent. funding grants for emergency centres would be financed via the fire authorities and districts. We have the ludicrous position of the Minister's Department being prepared to provide fire and civil defence authorities and district councils with 100 per cent. funding to update emergency centres, yet the Department of the Environment, on the other hand, penalising authorities by including the calculation in the capital expenditure limits.

The Government cannot seriously expect metropolitan district authorities such as Wigan, which are having their capital expenditure limits squeezed to allow that kind of virement to take place at the expense of social services, housing and education. Because of that difficulty and the disagreement between the two Departments, which has still not been resolved, we have a position where neither ourselves nor the Minister's Department can move forward in any real sense with the refurbishment of emergency centres in metropolitan districts.

On 3 July, F6 wrote to the Greater Manchester fire and civil defence authority about this matter. I quote from the letter, which states:

"We understand the difficulty authorities face with the capital costs of establishing emergency centres. The Home Office has raised the matter with the Department of the Environment and with the Treasury but the issue has been subsumed into a wider reconsideration of local authority finance. We will not be letting the matter lie but there is nothing further we can say at the moment. As promised, we are currently giving consideration to the question of the running costs of emergency centres."

That small paragraph is indicative of the whole attitude towards fire and civil defence authorities in all its guises. The Department of the Environment and the Home Office cannot get their act together, never mind agree with the fire and civil defence authorities.

I turn to privatisation and the incredible decision to include fire services within the scope of the Local Government (No. 2) Bill. I indicate to the Minister that the AMA and others of a responsible view will be looking for an exclusion in the Bill, similar to that contained in the Bill for the police service vehicles. This should also apply to fire service vehicles.

In addition, it is important to place on record the problems associated with the maintenance of fire brigade vehicle workshops, because it is essential that the issue is not simply put aside in the Local Government (No. 2) Bill. We must ensure that fire appliances have 100 per cent. reliability, extending for 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. The public must have confidence in the fire brigade and that confidence can be ensured by having both the vehicles and the equipment on the vehicles fully operational in a first-class condition. I hope that, in all the circumstances, the Minister will state his intention to meet with the AMA as soon as possible to consider all the points raised in the debate this morning.

7.5 am

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I wish to begin this very brief intervention by saying what a pleasure it is to see you, Madam Deputy Speaker, in the Chair.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) on his speech. He covered a technical area very competently. He was, perhaps, a little optimistic when he hoped for a chink of light. Even at this time of the morning, that is a bit much. However, when he then said that he hoped for a satisfactory explanation from the Minister, that really was raging optimism.

I served on the abolition Bill, which, as my hon. Friend recognised, is really where all this trouble started. If the Minister were to give my hon. Friend a satisfactory explanation, he would stand at the Dispatch Box and say that that Bill was a total and utter disaster, especially in relation to the fire and civil defence services. Lord Whitelaw's own words showed that the thought it a nonsense to set up a separate authority. The Home Office never wanted it, it never liked it, it thought that it was a contradiction in terms and it recognised that it would lead to major financial problems in the administration of the services. As my hon. Friend said, organisations such as the AMA recognised in advance of the Bill that it would be nothing but bad news for the fire and civil defence services.

The Minister has the opportunity—and I suggest that he takes it—to return to his Department and arrange meetings with the AMA at the level suggested by my hon. Friend, and to begin to talk realistically about the funding of such organisations. My hon. Friend was right to point out the need for a longer-term view of the arrangements for the fire and civil defence services. We do not doubt that we should be looking for proper local authority arrangements again rather than at this mismatch of centralised control, lack of sensible funding related to local needs and so on. My hon. Friend has provided the Minister with an opportunity to recognise past mistakes and to say that he is prepared to begin talks along the lines suggested by my hon. Friend.

I think that the Minister, in his wisdom, recognises that this area went badly wrong under the abolition Bill. Whatever the rights and wrongs of the Government's intentions on the wider aspects of abolition, this area has caused acute problems. If the Minister is not to duck the challenge from my hon. Friend, he should be bold enough —as I am sure he can be at times, as I have seen it in the past—to recognise that there is a major problem to which he needs to respond along the lines suggested by my hon. Friend.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): In common with other hon. Members, I welcome you, Madam Deputy Speaker, to the Chair in your new capacity.

I congratulate the hon. Members for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) and for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) on raising a matter of considerable importance. Before I deal with the main points raised, with particular reference to the fire authority function, I wish to comment briefly on the civil defence aspect raised by the hon. Member for Makerfield.

The hon. Gentleman made the point that capital controls work in an eccentric way, and I well understand that. He will know that a review is taking place into the capital control—or capital expenditure—system. The points that he raised about civil defence capital grants will be considered in the context of that review.

Mr. McCartney: I understand that, but that does not alter the fact that the Department has been pressurising local authorities to put pressure on district authorities—irrespective of the review—to commit some of their capital expenditure to a refurbishment programme. The Minister has admitted that the current review is considering whether any expenditure in an authority at district level reflects on the total capital expenditure. The Minister cannot have it both ways. The Government have had 12 months to resolve the matter, and until they do so there is no chance of authorities finding moneys from the housing, education and social services budgets to meet the planned programme of implementation.

Mr. Hogg: I have not conceded anything. I said that the Government are reviewing local authority capital expenditure controls, and that in that context capital allocations for civil defence will be considered. That is a statement of fact, not a concession. I shall not go beyond that and I shall not anticipate the outcome of the review.

I shall deal with the broader questions that the hon. Gentleman raised, which concentrate largely on the mismatch between the GREs and expenditure limits. Before doing so I shall summarise in brief form the controls that exist for the fire and civil defence authorities. There are essentially two controls, those of manpower and finance. I propose to deal with manpower fairly rapidly, as it is not an issue on which the hon. Gentleman concentrated. He will appreciate that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department exercises a statutory control over the establishment, support services and management arrangements of the seven FCDAs. These controls will operate for the first three years of the existence of the seven FCDAs. That will mean that they come to an end in 1988-89.

The second and much the most important area of control is something that relates to financing. By section 68 of the Local Government Act 1985 the FCDAs were deemed to be subject to the rate limitation controls that were created by the Rates Act 1984. That operates for the first three years of their existence. Effectively, the authorities are treated as being rate-capped, and there is a maximum precept that they are authorised to levy on the constituent districts.

The hon. Gentleman will appreciate the fairly complex procedure that has to be followed to determine both expenditure levels and precept levels. I could explain the procedure to the House, though I question the merit of doing so at 12 minutes past seven in the morning, but I shall do so if the hon. Gentleman wishes.

I take up the issue that is worrying the hon. Gentleman, which is the mismatch between GREs and expenditure levels. There is a difference between the GREs and expenditure levels, and there is a difference between the functions of the two. Expenditure levels are set by the Home Secretary, and GREs by the Department of the Environment. They are intended to have different functions and purposes.

Grant-related expenditure is used as a yardstick for use in the distribution of block grant. Its assessments are a means of distributing block grant on an equitable basis. The GRE formula for the fire service was reached after consultations with local authority associations. It is based on common principles that are applicable to all authorities. The GRE of a fire and civil defence authority does not determine what an authority should spend, nor does it determine what it can spend. Grant-related expenditure is a yardstick for all fire authorities. It applies to all fire authorities, and is not confined to the FCDAs. The object of the GREs, imperfect though it may be, is to apply a common yardstick throughout the country for fire authorities.

The expenditure level is a different instrument, with a different purpose. It is part of the process by which the precept limit is set. It takes account of the particular circumstances of each fire and civil defence authority. It is hoped and intended that the expenditure level will ensure that adequate fire protection is provided for the public and fire crews. The expenditure limit determines what an authority can spend, apart from the amount allowed for contingencies that is taken into account when setting the precept limit. It is not possible for the authority to set its budget in excess of the determined expenditure limit.

However, to take a broad view, the function is different. There is a distinction between the GREAs and expenditure levels. They are not intended to achieve the same purpose and there is no particular reason why the two should be in total harmony. I appreciate that there are problems that necessarily flow from mismatches—the hon. Member for Makerfield has described some of them—and it is for that reason that a review is taking place with regard to fire risk categorisation. That review is intended to bring the GREAs more into line with expenditure levels. It is desirable that GREAs should be more in line with expenditure levels, but there is no compelling reason why that should always be so.

To contrast the expenditure limit against GREA in order to determine the actual level of expenditure is not, in itself, a sensible thing to do. The functions of the two criteria are different. Although I appreciate that there is a need to bring the GREAs more into line with the expenditure levels—a review is being undertaken to that effect—it is not essential that that should happen. The hon. Member for Makerfield will be aware that we have not had a full response to the fire risk categorisation review. Only a minority of the authorities have replied on the question of fire risk categorisation. Therefore, it is not yet possible to say when the review will be complete. I hope that that review will be completed in the foreseeable future. Certainly I should like to see a greater matching between GREAs and expenditure levels.

The hon. Member for Makerfield suggested that a meeting should be convened between the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and Ministers at the Home Office. It is fair to say that the letter addressed to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was received in his office on 10 July. I am not in a position to commit my right hon. Friend or indeed my noble Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, who has direct responsibilities for the fire service to such a meeting. I am sure, however, that at an appropriate time Ministers would be extremely pleased to meet the AMA to discuss the problems that the hon. Member for Makerfield outlined.

Mr. Soley: Does the Minister accept, perhaps at this time in the morning with a spirit of generosity, that if Lord Whitelaw's advice had been accepted the fire and civil defence authorities would not be in their present difficulties? In those circumstances, will the Minister convey to the Home Secretary, the importance of meeting the AMA as a matter of urgency and recognising that the problems that it faces have been put upon it largely as a result of the Government's legislation on abolition.

Mr. Hogg: I shall not make any concession along those lines. The hon. Gentleman is well able to make his own points. He has done so, and those who read Hansard will understand them. The hon. Gentleman must not be the least bit surprised if I say that, much as I should like to agree with him—I spend much of my time agreeing with him—on this issue I shall not make the concession that he wants me to make.

Mr. McCartney: The Minister has already given the game away—the Department is already conducting a review. That review is needed because the figures do not add up. The discrepancies have been growing. I find it absolutely amazing, even at this time in the morning, that the Minister can, in the space of 10 minutes, suggest that there is no good reason why there should be any correlation between the two calculations, but then admits that there is a working party endeavouring to bring about that correlation.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman was either not listening, or he did not understand. The plain fact is that he does not comprehend what is going on.

It is desirable that there should be as much of a match as possible between GREAs and expenditure, as I have said, but, as I have also said, it is not essential, because the functions of the two are different. However, it is desirable, which is why we are having a review to ensure greater consistency between GREAs and expenditure levels. I do not contemplate that they will be the same. That is certainly not an essential requirement, nor is it necessarily an essential part of the review. However, as I have said, greater consistency between the two is desirable and, when more of the authorities have replied, we shall be in a better position to assess whether we will be able to achieve that desirable result.

As I was saying before that pleasing intervention from the hon. Member for Hammersmith, who I gather wants to get away rather urgently so I shall wind up the debate promptly because I never wish to be discourteous to him——

Mr. Soley: I cannot stand the idea of the Minister going through all these verbal gymnastics at this time of the day. He will do himself an injury, if he has not done so already. Yes, I am leaving shortly, to tell the police at a local college about how bad the Government are on law and order. However, let us leave that discussion until a little later this morning.

My hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield has a fair point and all that the Minister is struggling with — I understand why and accept that it is not his fault — is the fact that the Government got themselves into a mess between the requirements of the Department of the Environment and those of the Home Office on the abolition Bill. Lord Whitelaw recognised that openly and honestly, and it was frequently referred to during the passage of the abolition Bill. If the Home Office would now say, "Yes, we recognise that that abolition process created acute problems, especially in areas such as fire and civil defence", and would go to meet the bodies to which my hon. Friend referred, especially the AMA, on that basis, the Minister would be impressed by the willingness to co-operate to try to make what has become a mess work much better. The Minister must have an interest in that. Indeed, his verbal gymnastics clearly displayed that he knows that it is a mess. Let us get on and sort it out.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman said that he was going to talk to the police about how bad the Government's policies on law and order are. I advise him not, in any way, to try to impress the police with the desirability of his party's policies on law and order, because the police would all fall out of their seats laughing. [Interruption.] In fact, the hon. Gentleman knows that and is smiling now. Indeed, he must be embarrassed by the prospect of presenting to the Metropolitan constabulary the policies of the Labour party on law and order because the police would hoot with laughter. However, that is by the way, and we shall let the hon. Gentleman off on that matter.

As for the hon. Gentleman's references to my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Whitelaw, the hon. Gentleman has already made that point and I have already told him as clearly as I can that I shall not make the concession for which he has asked. I am just not going to do it. Although repetition from the hon. Gentleman is humorous, and no doubt enchanting, it will not get him anywhere at all. I was merely trying to conclude my speech to allow the hon. Gentleman to go off to Hendon, which is what he wants to do.

The essential question is whether fire cover in the joint authority areas that we have been discussing is adequate or inadequate. All the other gymnastics that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned, and through which we have been going, are interesting and relevant to that question, but they are not the principal issue. In such cases, the principal issue is always whether the service is adequate or inadequate. Incidentally, I was deeply disappointed not to hear from the hon. Member for Makerfield any analysis of that, because surely it is the major issue. All that stuff about GREAs and expenditure levels is splendid, but it does not go to the main issue, which is simply that the fire cover in the relevant areas is adequate.

Mr. McCartney: I do not want to prolong this issue because other hon. Members wish to speak. However we need no lessons from the Minister about adequate fire cover, when the Department of the Environment wants to take £7 million off this year's budget, a budget that was set by the Minister's own Department.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman improves his case not a bit. The question, as he knows well, is whether the fire cover provided in these areas is adequate. Even in his area of Greater Manchester the proposal for financing represents a 7·5 per cent. increase on 1986-87, which seems to be a significant increase. It is interesting that the hon. Gentleman has not thought for one moment to suggest that the fire cover is inadequate. As I feel sure that the Opposition parties are willing to take every point, whether bad, indifferent or perhaps good, that can be taken against the Government, the fact that they fail to suggest that the fire cover is inadequate makes my point in a singularly compelling way.

Economic Performance (North-West Region)

7.25 am

Mr. Alistair Burt (Bury, North): I thank the House for finding time for me to raise this important topic. It is particularly pleasant to do so under your benevolent eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, bearing in mind how much you know about our area.

The north-west is generally reckoned to stretch from Crewe to Carlisle, and whether it includes Cumberland and the Lake District depends on the statistics being used. The heart of the area is certainly Lancashire, Cheshire, Merseyside and Greater Manchester. It is the United Kingdom's most densely populated area. My constituency and the metropolitan borough of Bury is right at the heart of the north-west.

I am not unique in the House in having been born and brought up in the constituency that I represent—I am aware that there are others—but it gives me a special feel for the area. For that reason I speak for the area not as an outside, objective observer, but as someone who has the heart of the area close to his own heart.

The area is representative of the country as a whole as such it typifies both the optimism and pessimism that the Government face since their election. If Opposition parties seek to use the north-west as an example of what they term divided Britain, I fear they will be genuinely disappointed. At the general election, 34 Conservative Members, 36 Labour Members and three Liberal Members were returned, so it cannot be classed in any way as a Labour party stronghold. Indeed, one reason why we still sit on the Government Benches and the Labour party is on the Opposition Benches is the Opposition's failure to capture seats that they needed to win in the north-west and their rejection by voters in the north-west.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): It is curious that the hon. Gentleman should follow that train of thought. Can he explain why the Labour party now has more seats than the Conservative party in the north-west?

Mr. Burt: I did not seek to suggest that we had more. The Opposition sometimes suggest that the north-west is a great red area, and that is simply not true. The Labour party recovered marginally from being in the minority. In the last Parliament there were more Conservative Members than Labour Members representing the area and the Labour party's recovery, in the context of the Conservative majority of over 100, is rather marginal. The Labour party expected to do far better in the north-west, but it failed to do so. That is why we are still sitting here.

If a foreign visitor were to come to some parts of the north-west, he or she would shake his or her head at the extraordinary claims of abject poverty and deprivation that he or she might have heard during the election from the Opposition parties. However, if the foreign visitor came to other parts of the north-west, he or she would shake his or her head ruefully and wonder what this talk of prosperity was all about. The region, therefore, like the country at large, has plenty of areas of prosperity but also areas of considerable concern.

In the north-west we tend to suffer from over-concentration on the affairs of our two great cities, Liverpool and Manchester. We have inner-city problems, but I welcome the Government's recent initiatives, such as the Trafford park urban development corporation, the development of Liverpool and particularly the success of the Albert dock. I am glad to see that the Government are tackling inner-city problems in the north-west.

It should never be forgotten that there is a great deal to the north-west outside these particular urban areas. That is sometimes forgotten and glossed over by the outside world. It is remarkable that our foreign visitor, who now sees areas of prosperity and deprivation close together, could have made comments on this disparity at almost any time during the past 300 years. Relative poverty and prosperity side by side are nothing new and it is nonsense to suggest that the phenomenon has arisen since 1979. We should get that one out of the way straight away. However, the problems posed by disparities of wealth now affect our generation, our constituents and the north-west. Therefore, the economic performance of the north-west, coupled with its determination to succeed, is the way forward for us all.

Even in the House, it is sometimes necessary to restate the obvious. That is doubly so in the case of the north-west due to the remarkable lack of knowledge of the area in some places where considerable investment decisions are made. I hope that it will be helpful to the House to consider a little of the north-west's economic history and show how the base of its economy has changed.

Traditionally, of course, the area has been dominated by heavy manufacturing industry — textiles, mining, engineering and paper. There was a concentration of textiles, engineering and paper in my constituency. Those traditional manufacturing industries have been in a long-term decline which certainly predates 1979. Indeed, the textile industry has been in difficulties since the turn of the century.

The reasons for the decline in manufacturing industry in the north-west are not hard to find, and they are almost standard for the rest of the country. They include a decline in markets, poor investment decisions, sometimes poor labour relations, the end of empire and the growth of overseas countries providing more and more of their own manufactured goods. All those factors have affected industry, and employment has declined constantly.

However, that is the old north-west. People sometimes forget that the land that gave birth to Arkwright, Kay, Hargreaves and Crompton is the same land that gave birth to the chemicals at ICI, to the development of Unilever and the development of the world's greatest glass-making company, Pilkington. The new was beginning to replace the old.

The other day I listened to an extract from one of Winston Churchill's famous wartime speeches about fighting on the beaches. In that speech he was referring to the new world at some stage needing to come to the assistance of the old. The analogy with industry is simple. New industries in the north-west are coming to the aid of those who used to be employed in the old industries. The pattern of employment in the north-west is changing.

Unfortunately, a generation of film and television producers of the 1950s and 1960s has perpetuated the myths of the north-west. While we all enjoy "Coronation Street," and no one would wish to see it disappear from our screens, sadly, down south it fuels an image of the north that can sometimes be dangerous.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): My hon. Friend is portraying the north-west painting a proper picture of itself and so encouranging investment and people, but would he dwell on the picture that the Oppostion paint of the north-west, as a down-at-heel part of the country which is dirty and full of unemployed people when that picture is not true in many parts of the north-west? For example, Stockport, which is an industrial town, now has unemployment of 8·8 per cent.

Mr. Burt: Of course, my hon. Friend is correct. One of the problems faced by the north-west in recent years is the difficult balance between portraying its good side and its bad. It would be wrong to ignore the problems in the north-west. However, laying over-emphasis on those problems paints a rather unfair picture. The balance must be right. Sometimes, for political reasons, Opposition Members overlay the problems, and that is no way forward for the north.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: This point is fundamental to the whole debate about the north-west. In our great cities, the traditional centres, there are pockets of such desperation and economic devastation, which the hon. Gentleman must accept has occurred particularly over the past few years. If he does not begin to approach questions, such as what is to be done with the inner cities, he is ignoring the basic problem of the north-west. What is to be done in those inner-city areas?

Mr. Burt: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman reads what I said at the beginning of my speech more carefully. I do not dissent from his comments. However, to concentrate solely on the problems of the inner cities in the north-west is to distort the picture of the north-west completely. I fear that concentration on those problems by Opposition Members and the ignoring of the rest of the development of the north-west gives the wrong picture of the area to those who have the power to make investment decisions.

We are not an area of the begging bowl. There is a lot going for the north-west, and it is wrong to approach the people who can provide jobs with a begging-bowl mentality. As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell), I shall return to that theme later, because it is important, but I certainly do not try to ignore the problems of the north-west. As the House should know, I have been open-minded and outspoken about them in the past.

If the base of the north-west economy is examined, a familiar pattern emerges, as in the rest of the country. Like all manufacturing countries, we have seen a decline in the number of pople employed in manufacturing industry and a consequent increase in the number employed elsewhere. The regional trends publication shows that in 1979 41·2 per cent. of people in the north-west were employed in what might be called traditional manufacturing industries and in construction, compared with 55·7 per cent. of the population employed in what might relatively be called the service sector. By 1986, those figures had changed, 33·3 per cent. being employed in traditional manufacturing and construction and 63·9 per cent. in what might loosely be termed service industries. Interestingly enough, if those figures are compared even with those for 1985, they reveal an increase in the percentage employed in manufacturing.

The central point is still the same. We have seen the figures for alternative industries in the north-west grow, and we know that the area's industrial and economic base is changing. I shall point to two or three examples in which that is most noticeable.

The old, surviving manufacturing industries are surviving because they have adapted to change. They make better products, and market them better. They are looking hard at where the products should go, and they have the right image. Two publications show the changing nature of two of our traditional industries. The British paper industry has made major strides since the catastrophes of the early 1980s. It now presents itself in a much better way, and its export and productivity statistics are remarkable. Similarly, the textile industry has moved away from the old-fashioned idea of textiles. Now it is again a major sector, contributing to the British economy and to exports, and it has done a good deal to improve its image and activity.

It should also not be ignored that traditional manufacturing industry is surviving because of new techniques. It is easily forgotten that new technology is useful in old manufacturing industries. We sometimes seem to imagine that there is a new-tech industry, located somewhere around Reading or Maidenhead, in which thousands of people are employed making computers. But we forget that high-tech then comes into traditional manufacturing industry and keeps it going. We must remember that the old skilled industries now have a balance between the old and the new skills. That is why some of them have survived and prospered throughout a very difficult period.

As well as the old traditional industries, we have the growth of new industries in our area. The north-west is singularly blessed with such industries, which will provide employment for many years to come. There is aerospace and the nuclear industry. Again, it should not be forgotten, when attacks on the nuclear industry are made from the Opposition Benches, that that industry in all its forms employs many thousands of people in the north-west, and will continue to do so. We have the telecommunications industry, the pharmaceutical industry and the computer industry itself, and there has also been a substantial growth in self-employment. The enterprise centre in my constituency has been working for five years. Each year, about 325 firms have commenced business, employing 400 people per year. Those new firms have a success rate of about 50 per cent. There has been a cheering growth in self-employment throughout the region, as well as in my constituency.

There has also been an encouraging growth in small business. In 1984, the Conservative authority in Bury opened a small business unit with centralised services. Various firms could come along and grow at their own pace and in their own time. It started with six firms. All 74 units in that building have now been filled. I pay tribute to the hard work of those in the centre who have created that growth. The traditional industries have survived and there are new industries.

There has also been growth outside the manufacturing sector and an increase in employment in the service sector. There has also been an increase in tourism. The North-West tourist board maintains that the north-west has a great deal to offer. According to the statistics, that is true. The latest figures show that 150,000 people in the north-west are employed in jobs connected with tourism. Between 1984 and 1989 the number of jobs in that sector is expected to grow by 25,000. Total spending on tourism in the north-west each year is £580 million; £1·5 million a day is spent on tourism. Furthermore, £150 million comes from overseas. That is a great new development in the north-west.

In the next fortnight a steam railway will be opened in my constituency. It will run from Bury to Ramsbottom, which is in the north of my constituency. Ramsbottom is developing a small but effective tourist industry. Places that people never thought of as tourist spots have become popular. I note the presence of the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott). The so-called music hall joke, "Wigan pier", attractively presented by very good people with very good investment, has become a major tourist spot. I do not know anybody who has returned disappointed from a visit to Wigan pier. We have much to learn from that development. Ramsbottom should be similarly developed. It has connections with Dickens, and it will have one of the finest and longest steam railways in the country.

Mr. Favell: Is my hon. Friend referring to our hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens)?

Mr. Burt: I do not know whether it is possible to develop my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) as a tourist attraction. I am sure that many people would like to visit him. He is freely available here on many days of the week. That is why the Strangers Gallery is packed.

I thank the Government for providing, through the Department of the Environment, a £300,000 grant to develop that steam railway in the north of my constituency.

A number of factors underpin all these economic changes. One of them is communications. Manchester airport is a major source for the development of the region as a whole. During the past decade its growth has been phenomenal. In 1981 Manchester airport carried 4·7 million passengers. In 1987 it will carry 8·75 million passengers, and by 1995 that figure will rise to 16·1 million. More and more routes are being developed. All hon. Members pay tribute to the work of Mr. Gil Thompson, the managing director of Manchester airport, and to the work of the authority that helped to run the airport for many years. Manchester airport has a key role to play in the development of the north-west.

There are also many fine motorway links. One cannot move in the north-west without coming across a new motorway. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) found that out a few years ago when a new motorway was constructed almost on his doorstep. The north-west is blessed with a fabulous motorway infrastructure. We also have the 19th century legacy of the railways. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that the rail link between the centre of Manchester and Manchester airport should be constructed as soon as possible. We have noted with concern the development of Stansted and Government assistance to provide a rail link. We hope that the time will soon come when a rail link is built between Manchester Piccadilly and Manchester airport.

Another major factor that underpins the change in the north-west is education. We have first-rate educational facilities, in particular higher education facilities, in the north-west. It contains the universities of Manchester, Liverpool, Manchester and Salford. There is also the University of Manchester Institute of Science and Technology. There is the Manchester Business School and the Liverpool, Manchester, Preston and Stockport polytechnics, all of which perform to very high standards. Both independent and state education are first rate. The north-west's education provision will be of great benefit to the area for years to come.

As for the changing pattern of our economy, I have dealt with the old image of the area. The major problem is employment, and it will continue to be a problem for some time. It would be foolish to ignore the loss of jobs in the area. We have seen employee numbers fall from about 2,670,000 in 1979 to 2,260,000 in 1986, but it is interesting to note the changes in pattern over the past few years. Between 1979 and 1983, including self-employment, the figures for people who were in work declined from 2,870,000 to 2,526,000. But if one looks at the figures between 1983 and 1986, one finds a net increase in employment from 2,526,000 to 2,530,000. That has been achieved through the growth of the service and self-employment sectors.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: This is stupid nonsense, even by the hon. Gentleman's standards. To talk about a 4,000 increase in employment over the period is a joke. The reality is that the numbers of the self-employed and builders in the north-west, according to the Government's statistics, have declined in real terms. In 1976 14 per cent. of the work force in the north-west was self-employed. In 1986 the figure was 15 per cent. The growth of the job-creating service sector, about which the Government boast, is false. In the north-west we have experienced a loss in jobs. Self-employment and service jobs have declined.

Mr. Burt: Once again our concern over the dismal picture that is being painted by the Labour party about the north-west has been justified by the words of the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd). If I had been one of the 4,000 who had got a job between 1983 and 1986 I would have been pleased. The hon. Gentleman missed the point that I was making. I was referring to a considerable drop in employment in our area between 1979 and 1983, which continued an historic pattern, but I was showing that between 1983 and 1986 not only did that fall in employment stop, but it was reversed. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the figures for the past year he will find that that historic trend has been further reversed, and more people are coming into employment.

No Conservative Member who represents the north-west tries to gloss over the problems. We know that there has been a lot of unemployment, but I am talking about recent changes and the way forward. On that the statistics are clear. I do not know about the hon. Gentleman's statistics on self-employment, but mine show that in 1976 209,000 people were self-employed in our area, but by 1986 that figure had increased to 276,000. Those are considerable increases, whatever the hon. Gentleman thinks. The pattern of the economy shows a welcome increase in the past few years with regard to employment with a change in the historic pattern of employment ebbing away.

The vacancy statistics are encouraging. They show that vacancies increased by a third in one year. Our local newspapers are full of new jobs. However, there is the problem of skill shortages. I shall quote from the latest CBI survey on the problem of vacancies and skill shortages. With regard to the north-west, it says:

[Mr. Burt]

"The number of vacancies is increasing and overall unemployment is now falling. However, redundancies are still occurring in manufacturing sectors, although not on the scale experienced in the past. Employment prospects are best in the non-manufacturing sectors.

"Although skill shortages continue to be reported, they are not on a large scale. The main shortages are of skilled operatives, of plant and project engineers and in computer-related activities."

We are starting to get to grips with the problems of skill shortages, and that is largely due to the measures that the Government have taken to assist in training.

I should like to pay tribute to the good work that is being done by jobcentre teams throughout the north-west, particularly in my constituency, which work extremely hard and have a good record for finding people jobs.

That deals with employment, but I should like to consider the overall picture as seen by the CBI in the Greater Manchester area and regionally. Regionally, the CBI reports:

"Overall business is good, and the improved situation is expected to be sustained . . . Recent reports from . . . the Manchester and Merseyside Chambers of Commerce indicate that there was a steady overall improvement in the performance in the North West region at the end of 1986 and in the first quarter of 1987. There is now a more optimistic view of the industrial and commercial trends and the region's investment performance is improving in both quantity and quality."

Those words come not from Government sources but from sources outside the Government. They reflect the picture which I have put forward of the changes taking place in the north-west.

There have been individual success stories all around the north-west in recent years. Just a few years ago, Vickers wondered where its next frigate would come from and worried about labour relations with Cammell Laird at Birkenhead. The back-to-work committee from Birkenhead lobbied north-west Conservative Members here, seeking support for their company because they could not find it elsewhere. They found their works blockaded by strikers and pickets. They were desperate to show that they needed their jobs and could return to work. They knew that if there were not good industrial relations at Birkenhead, the company would die. They pleaded with us about their future. We took their pleas to the Minister. Eventually, Birkenhead won the order for a type 22 frigate because it was known that the workers were determined to remove the bully boys from their midst and produce a good future. Vickers' success was mirrored in Barrow's privatisation. Vickers has become a success story for the north-west and for the Government.

Mirroring what happened with Vickers, there are examples all around the north-west of manufacturing and service jobs being created. The Manpower Services Commission's publication on trends has a section on company expansion and development. The 1987 winter edition refers to a number of those developments and jobs. Isolated success is no longer the story of the north-west. There is continuing success in many sectors.

I should like to put my comments in a nutshell. The truth about the north-west is not as the Opposition have often presented it. It is not all doom and gloom. We know that the area has problems, but there are also many patches of success. The task for all of us is to ensure that those patches of success spread, especially to deprived areas and other areas that need assistance. I am pleased by the Government's commitment to the inner cities.

I have had my battles with the Government on employment. I remember a speech which I made in the House, which was subsequently translated into an article for the Tory Reform Group. I resile not one whit from it because I was concerned then about the Government's emphasis on employment and the fact, that they were not getting the messages from the grass roots. I am now less concerned. The Government have listened to some of the arguments and there have been some changes. I know that they do not ignore the pain and problems caused by unemployment in the region.

I hope that I have made it clear that the north-west is now an area for the development of new and old industries. I hope that I have made clear the importance and influence of new technology in the old industries, of tourism and of growth in the service sector. Lastly, and most important, I hope that I have made clear the need for the north-west positively to put forward its own image. We do not have a begging-bowl mentality. We know that our region has many positive advantages. We appreciate the fact that people, whether from the City or from overseas, invest not through sentiment but for hardheaded reasons. In the north-west, we can provide them with an area where land prices are cheaper, so that they can build and develop their companies on green field sites more cheaply than in the south. We offer them a place where rates are cheaper and where the new community charge will benefit them. We offer them an area where homes are cheaper for their employees and their families. We offer them an area where there is less congestion and where their employees will be happier. We offer them an area where quality of life is second to none and where the costs to their companies are low. We offer them hard-working people committed to a brighter future. We offer them a fine infrastructure and great educational opportunities for their children. We offer them a new north-west.

My message to investors is not to be put off by the stories of inner-city areas but to come with us to the areas of growth and development in the north-west and, above all, to get in quickly, because the north-west is expanding. It is bringing in new people. There will be a great future. If the companies miss their chance now, they may never get a chance to come back to the fastest-growing and best part of the north-west. If they want opportunities for development they can contact me at the House of Commons. They want to locate in my constituency of Bury, North and the metropolitan borough of Bury. I know that and you know that, Mr. Speaker, and it is about time that those investors in the City knew it as well.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): It is almost a tragedy to hear what amounts to a form of economic assassination by Conservative Members who want to ignore the plight of our area. My constituency is still home to the largest concentration of industry in the north-west. I am the first to admit that many firms are still successful, for even in the middle of a Government-induced recession, there is still employment in the depths of despair.

The fact remains, however, that our manufacturing base is in a difficult condition. When the Government produced figures for the EC recently, they predicted a rise in unemployment in the area to 1990. They also said that the problems of ageing infrastructure in the north-west outstripped the available resources and that there was therefore a danger that the infrastructure would continue to worsen.

The hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) talked about Vickers. I found it amazing that he should boast about its success because it was the result of public spending. When public spending is the vehicle of recovery, there is some opportunity for social and economic progress. Many of our industries rely on the public sector, and manufacturing is still the driving force in the local economy.

The Government, however, have withdrawn money from the electricity supply industry, British rail and the nationalised sector with the result that jobs have gone every week. That being so, I find it difficult to accept the Conservative view of recovery in the north-west. The Central Electricity Generating Board, for example, has not built one new power station during the Government's tenure of office with the result that jobs and skills have been stripped from my community.

Mr. Burt: The hon. Gentleman is persisting in describing the north-west as a predominantly manufacturing area built on the public sector. That is no longer true. Does he agree that, in common with manufacturing areas all over the world, there has been a decline in the number of jobs in manufacturing and a consequent rise in other sectors? The hon. Gentleman must concede that there are more jobs in areas other than manufacturing and that the number of new jobs in those industries is growing. The new north-west is composed of traditional manufacturing industry and the new industries of which I spoke. If the hon. Gentleman persists in saying that there is only a hard core of industrial areas dependent on the public sector, he is not painting a true picture of the north-west as a whole. The hon. Gentleman should remember that he in his area is not the only hon. Member who represents the north-west. If he takes a wider view, he will see how wrong he is.

Mr. Lloyd: None of my colleagues has suggested that the north-west is an exlusively manufacturing area. In 1979, fewer than 1 million of its 2·5 million jobs were in manufacturing. Many of the non-manufacturing jobs relied on manufacturing, however, which is why we have lost nearly 500,000 jobs, some 330,000 of which were in manufacturing. That is a colossal decline, but the tragedy is that those jobs did not have to go. Some went as a result of the workings of the public sector cycle, others went because of the Government's incompetent policies. They almost waged war on manufacturing between 1979 and 1981. Since then, by incompetence, the Government have kept interest rates sky high. Conservative members have spoken of rate increases. We hear much about that. If any Conservative Member wants to talk to people in manufacturing industry and in the service sector about what the costs are in their own industries, they will find that high interest rates are the predominant factor talked about. That is a direct responsibility of the Government.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): The hon. Gentleman said that the Government have declared war on manufacturing industry in the north-west. I have never heard such nonsense. Was it not the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers that shut down the engineering industry in not only the north-west, but in the whole of the country for three months in 1979? Was that not declaring war on the industry?

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman suffers from a type of myopia when it comes to the reality of his Government. There have been 330,000 jobs lost forever in the north-west in manufacturing. That was nothing to do with the AEU or with the trade union movement, but everything to do with the Government Front Bench and the sycophantic Back Benchers who are not prepared to fight for industry in the north-west. A figure recently produced by the City of Manchester — although I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will dismiss it because it comes from a source of which he does not approve — shows that venture capital flows into the south-east at 3·5 times the rate it flows into the north-west. That is not because we do not have the skills or the competence but because of the bias of the City of London and the incompetence of the management of capital interests in a region such as ours.

The hon. Member for Bury, North talked about the begging bowl. I have no begging bowl to hand out. My colleagues and I have talked to industrialists and people such as Lord Weinstock, who is still a leading light in the biggest private company, who told us that he would not invest in the north-west because many of the jobs that his company was now investing in were work for women, and that women in the north-west did not have the nimble fingers necessary for such work.

Mr. Thurnham: It is nonsense.

Mr. Lloyd: It is absolute nonsense for the noble Lord to talk in those terms. It demonstrates the incompetence we have in this country, and that is a real part of the problem.

Mr. Burt: The hon. Gentleman has related statistics about investment going into other areas of the United Kingdom. What do his colleagues and he intend to do to present a positive image of all the north-west to encourage those investors to come to our area, because simply relating statistics of manufacturing decline and the problems in certain areas is, as I indicated in my speech, not enough. We have much going for us in a positive way in the north-west, about which I have heard little. I have heard nothing from the hon. Gentleman to convince me that he has changed his mind. When will he see that, unless we put forward the best image of the north-west, not glossing over the problems but examining why on a hard-headed, practical basis investors should come to our area we shall never achieve anything.

Mr. Lloyd: If the hon. Gentleman is patient I will develop the many things that we can do. There are many things that we ought to do in the north-west. I welcome the injection of money that is coming in through the urban development corporation in Trafford Park, not because I necessarily think that is the right vehicle and the right mechanism for those things to be done, because I do not think that is the case. The money that is finally being put in by the Government has long been sought by those interested in the north-west. At last we have a response from the Government because they recognise the irrelevance of their policies over the past seven or eight years. It was necessary for us to say that, without sizeable public expenditure in those areas, we would not begin to resolve those problems. When we have a Government who talk about the inner cities, that is pumping no real money into those areas and that is channeling no money in any targeted way or in any meaningful sense, we have a Government who want the cosmetics of the inner cities but that want nothing to do with the large-scale social and economic problems of those areas. Headlines in local newspapers referred to a recent initiative in my area that saved £100,000 to be pumped into two local government wards in my constituency. In those two wards there are 20,000 people who are to receive that massive cash investment of £100,000, which is £5 per head of population. Conservative Members may think that £5 per head is a huge success for the Government. It actually represents £10 per head for each unemployed person in those two wards. That is the level of investment received from the private sector.

Mr. Favell: The hon. Gentleman has been saying a great deal about what the people of Brighton, Bournemouth, Bristol and London should be doing for Manchester. What is Manchester going to do for itself? May I remind the hon. Gentleman that the greatness of Manchester was built on the backs of Mancunians and the greatness of Liverpool was built on the backs of Liverpudlians and not on the backs of Brighton, Bristol and Basingstoke? It is nonsense to suggest that there should be more public sector spending in Manchester. Statistics show that Manchester council already spends more per head of population than any other city in the country. Manchester should start setting out its stall and getting back the sort of image that it used to have, which is hard-headed business-like devotion to making brass instead of bleating that the south owes it a living.

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) is a relative newcomer to the north-west and does not fully understand what goes on there. For example, the one thing that Conservative Members always parade as a triumph of north-west ingenuity is Manchester airport. That has been run, virtually since its inception, by the local authority. It is the fastest growing enterprise in the area and it has been run by the public sector, by municipal Socialism. Conservative Members find that difficult to accept. We hear the occasional accolade from the more sensible Conservative Members who accept that the local authority, when given a chance to do such things, does them very well.

The reality is—Conservative Members cannot shirk this—that when we see the withdrawal of what amounts to £1 million per week from just one local authority, which happens to be one of the bigger local authorities in the north-west, inevitably we see a massive withdrawal of purchasing power from the local economy and we see a downward cycle created that affects service industry, manufacturing industry and so on.

Manchester, indeed the whole community in the north-west, wants the ability to spend its own money and create it own jobs. That is right and proper. We want the institutions. For example, we want the institutions that have been given to Scotland and funded by the Government. We want a development agency. Scotland, quite legitimately, has the Scottish Development Agency. I do not begrudge Scotland that for one second. However, the Government look at the north-west as a mere colony and are not prepared to let it have such facilities. When local authorities such as Manchester and Liverpool make decisions about economic development the Government say that they will truncate that development and prevent the local authorities developing enterprise in their own areas. They do that, ironically, at the expense of the private sector that Conservative Members claim that they support and want to help.

In economies such as ours the private sector depends on the public sector because there is an inter-relationship. The idea that the private and public sectors operate as wholly independent sectors is not only nonsense, but is completely irrelevant to the sort of economy that we operate.

The largest private sector company in Britain, GEC, still has a significant involvement in the public sector whether through the railway system, the CEGB, the arms trade or whatever. We heard the row not so long about GEC when the discussion was raging as to whether we had bought from GEC in this country or whether we had bought American technology. Once again, the public sector determined whether the private sector would make a profit. That is the reality of the modern economy. We want a relationship between the public and private sector where they work together.

Mr. Favell: The hon. Gentleman has put his finger on the problem. The problem in the north-west is that there are Socialist controlled areas, that believe that the private sector depends on the public sector. In fact, the reverse is true. The public sector depends on the private sector. It depends on the enterprise of private individuals and of private companies, of people who go out and make the money on which the public sector depends. A town's prosperity does not grow out of the town hall. The town hall exists on the back of the prosperity of a town or city and once places such as Manchester and Liverpool, the great Socialist citadels of the north realise that, they will re-install the sort of prosperity from which those towns and cities grew. The prosperity of Liverpool and Manchester come not out of the town halls but out of individual private enterprise. The sooner those cities realise that, the sooner they will get back to where they should be.

Mr. Lloyd: The reality of the north-west is slightly different. Once again, the hon. Gentleman demonstrated his ignorance.

The city of Manchester, certainly on its southern edge, relied on Trafford park for its employment. That was the manufacturing base. Trafford park, as the hon. Gentleman probably does not realise, is in the borough of Trafford. Historically, the borough of Trafford was a Conservative-controlled, low rating authority. The borough of Trafford underwent a job shedding, the like of which was never seen in any other parts of greater Manchester, not because of the high rating city of Manchester or the low rating borough of Trafford, but simply the damage that was done to the manufacturing sector. I have seen horrendous levels of unemployment in my part of the city of Manchester and in my part of Trafford. The idea that the hon. Gentleman somehow has the mechanism of private sector development ready to set up market stalls in old Trafford and McDonalds take-aways in Moss Side is a nonsense. Business is starting in Moss Side and Trafford. We welcome that. I welcome it when Conservative Members manage to get their Government to eke out the money that will invest in such areas.

There is no substitute for a real and sensible pattern of public sector investment — a real programme that is organised around the public and private sectors working together to bring in that kind of investment. The private sector in the north-west has failed the north-west. It will continue to fail the north-west if we do not get new investment in new technology on a regular and consistent basis where it is needed. That is not happening. That is why we need the private sector to work with the public sector, and for the public sector to be given the institutions and mechanisms to invest in that area.

Give us our north-west development agency. Give us institutional financial agencies. Give money to local authorities. Give money to the public sector mechanisms that are prepared to make the economy work. We shall then have a chance. I freely concede what the hon. Gentleman said. There is a lot of good in the north-west —there is a lot of good in my area — and we have to enhance it. To turn away from the real problems that exist in manufacturing and service sectors blinds not only our community but central Government to the needs of our area. It is desperately important that we have a recognition. Let us enhance what we have. Let us enhance what is good there. Let us make sure that what is good there can thrive. It must be accepted by Conservative Members that, even now, it is not always in the state that we would like it to be in. Let us also not kid ourselves that when there are pockets of deprivation, if we are not prepared to make the public sector work, if we are not prepared to allow the public sector to help the private sector to work, we shall not be able to get investment in the areas that need it. We will not create the north-west that we want.

Opposition Members despair when Conservative Members claim what they want. As things stand, as long as they talk the rhetoric of a rosy future for the north, we shall not get that type of effort from the private and public sectors. A recognition of the real problems is what matters. We do not want simple words, whether they be from the Prime Minister or from anyone else. We want real action that is targeted to the unemployment problem, the need to create skills and the need to create investment in such key areas. That is not yet happening, and the north-west must begin to demand it.

We shall have the Government for the next four years. We have to work with them. We shall continue to press them not to kid themselves—they have their sycophants on the Government Back Benches — that things are going well in the north-west. The hon. Member for Stockport knows that he has one of the lowest rates of unemployment in the north-west, in his constituency. Nevertheless, without Government targeted action, unemployment in the north-west will not go away. The future of the north-west without the Government doing considerably more than they are now doing, will continue to be the social cancer, the social malaise from which we suffer. Conservative Members will do us all a favour if they press their Government to do more — privately; out of the headlines; we do not mind; simply do it. Without that, the north-west will not have the opportunity to go in the way that we all would want.

8.15 am

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) on his choice of the performance of the economy of the north-west as the subject for debate and on the excellent way in which he described the growth of the north-west, in contrast to what we heard from the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd). I could not disagree more with the hon. Gentleman's comment that the north-west depends upon being spoon-fed by the Government.

I am very familiar with the turbo-generator industry, and I was working at Trafford Park at a time when I suspect that the hon. Gentleman was still in his pram. I know the industry there and I have worked in the Trafford plant. The future of that industry lies in competing in worldwide markets, not on the pattern of ordering power stations in this country.

If the Government have not ordered power stations in the past five years, it is because sufficient electricity has been generated by existing power stations. There is no point in building a power station that is not needed. The future of the industry depends upon the needs of the worldwide market, and that is where its success will lie.

The north-west economy depends upon the performance of individuals and firms which can see their opportunities to develop.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman touching on a fundamental point. When we have a world economy that does not want to order power stations, and a Government who deliberately choose not to order them, what do we do with an industry such as that? Do we say, "OK, that industry is finished; it is no longer needed," or do we say, "By the time the 1990s come round we will want to order power stations and we will want those skills and technology, therefore we need to maintain the viability of that industry so that we can produce cheaply and efficiently at home"? The hon. Gentleman talked about world markets, but they have not been there. Unfortunately, that industry has hung on, both in the north-east and in the north-west, but not because of action by the Government.

Mr. Thurnham: This country's exports would not be at a record level and our share of world trade would not be rising if we were not able to take advantage of new markets that are developing. It is no good looking back to previous markets and imagining that in some way we can fossilise industries which were previously in demand. I am sure that if industries offer the best products they will always find markets for them. We should develop new products for new markets.

I invite hon. Members and my hon. Friend the Minister to visit Bolton to see what is happening there. Bolton and Bury are linked, because we are in the same travel-to-work area. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North spoke very well about what is happening in Bury. He will be well aware of the changing skyline in Bolton. There is a new mood of confidence developing in Bolton, and it is evident from the skyline.

The new town centre development is a visible sign of what is happening. We have a £60 million investment based on a £3,250,000 urban development grant. It was the biggest urban development grant of its kind when it was obtained, and it is an example of the leverage that can be obtained by successful partnership between central Government, local government and the private sector. I congratulate my noble Friend the Duke of Westminster on the enormous investment that he has made in bringing about this new town centre development, which provides almost 250,000 sq ft of shopping space.

[Mr. Thurnham]

Bolton is an old-established market centre and that development provides visible evidence of its success. It is part of over £150 million of new investment that is in the pipeline for Bolton and the surrounding area. We have new transport links with the £30 million route 225 to the west, and a new rail link, of which my hon. Friend will be well aware. The Windsor link will provide a through line for the first time from Bolton to London. There is a £30 million investment in that line, in new rolling stock and in a new railway station at Bolton, which contributes to the advantages of the town for new industries.

I commend to my hon. Friend the Minister the new "Quarterly Economic Review" produced by Bolton district council. It is evidence of the strength and diversity of the economy and it lists some of the inquiries for industrial space and the sorts of industries which are seeking to come to Bolton. The industries vary from curtaining to carpets, cricket to computers, paint to pharmaceuticals and plastics to putty, as well as gas storage, tent manufacture and administrative facilities for a children's charity. We can see the enormous diversity that is the basis of the strength of the economy.

The hon. Member for Stretford appeared to doubt the growth in self-employment. I draw his attention to a booklet that has just been published by the Conservative Political Centre, based on the community programme schemes in Bolton which I was able to persuade the previous Minister to back. I recommend to the hon. Gentleman "Operation Longstop". He should note the figures for the growth of self-employment in the north-west. It has steadily increased year by year from 214,000 in 1979 to 280,000 in 1986. That is evidence of the way in which new jobs can be provided by people themselves, rather than looking to other employers or to the public sector.

The review described Bolton as being on the move and said that the most buoyant part of the property market was in small units. In 1986, 700,000 sq ft of property was let, but 70,000 sq ft of that was in units of fewer than 2,000 sq ft. Again, that is evidence of the growing demand by new and small firms. My hon. Friend the Minister will be well aware that Bolton Business Ventures is one of the leading enterprise agencies in the country, and claims to have helped to create more than 700 jobs since it was set up in 1983. I commend to my hon. Friend the work done by that agency to create new jobs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North, in his excellent speech, spoke of the film makers sometimes giving the wrong image of the north. I am pleased to say that there are now signs of the film-making industry developing in the north-west, and it can create an image of what is happening there as part of the new industries arriving in the area.

Tourism is creating 50,000 jobs a year in the country as a whole. I am pleased that Opposition Members are no longer deriding the tourist industry as a candyfloss industry. It is making the most of our industrial heritage and showing what can be done. Real jobs of lasting value can be created. At the moment, Bolton has a heritage centre being built in the Lion Yard, and that will add a feature to the town. One of the best attractions of the north-west is that the people can come to see the old industries actually working, as is evident at Styal Mill.

Unemployment in Bolton is now at its lowest level for five years. That shows that we are winning the battle to develop the economy, to generate new jobs and to show the town as one where prosperity will increase. I commend the efforts of the Bolton chamber of commerce, which celebrates its centenary this year, in helping to bring that about and showing the town in the way that my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North said it must show itself. It must no longer denigrate itself or ask for its future to be dependent on Government handouts.

It is evident that the future of Bolton and other towns in the north-west is in the hands of the people. They are taking advantage of that, and other people should also come and take advantage while they can. Large properties are still on the market—some of the old mills have been demolished, but there are still mill spaces that provide economical areas for people who want to move there. However, they will not be available for much longer. I join my hon. Friend in his call to people to come to the north-west to see what can be done and to live in an area which I feel is a much more pleasant area in which to live than the congested areas of the south-east.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): It is not often that one can make an unusual announcement at the beginning of a debate of this nature, but I wish to inform my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State and others that the north-west has recently been visited by a man from Mars. Luckily he did not arrive in any form of extra-terrestrial vehicle. Instead, he was the guest of Granada Television as a member of the delegation that it brought to Blackburn as part of its "State of the Region" series.

I watched the programme with keen interest. The company took a delegation from Slough, included in which was a representative of Mars, the confectionery company. The members of it saw the low-cost housing, the low-cost industrial units and the help that had been given to the area. The reporter then put a microphone under the nose of a man from Mars and asked, "What do you think of it?" He replied, "I never knew that it was like this." The reporter asked, "What should we do in the north-west to try to promote the advantages which you have seen?" He replied, rather irreverently. "Get off your bums and go and sell it." That was a man from a highly successful company from a highly successful part of the country. He was impressed, and he told us in the north-west to put forward our message.

I found the message of the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) most depressing. I sent out a letter to the industrialists in Fylde asking them to set out the barriers to job creation in the north. I was staggered by the replies that I received. The managing director of a company called Dudley Industries, which produces the air dryers that we see at motorway servce areas, wrote,

"The north-south divide has no relevance to my company. It is simply the competitiveness with which we can produce that will get us the jobs."

It is that attitude of mind that is so important.

The hon. Member for Stretford referred to GEC. Perhaps he has not left the Manchester area to observe that GEC has substantial investments in Fylde with its specialist mouldings division and in Preston with the traction division. It is necessary to travel around to get to know our region before making comments about where investment will take place.

I think that our constituents will be impressed that we choose to rise at an early hour to discuss the problems of the north-west. Many of those who are employed by the 3,500 manufacturing companies in Lancashire will be travelling to work now. I have a book entitled "Lancashire at Work," in which the phrase "county of opportunity" is used. That is a much more up-beat, positive message to put forward than that of the hon. Member for Stretford. Fifty of the 3,500 manufacturing companies employ between 500 and 45,000 people. That is not a message of depression.

It is interesting that earnings in the north-west were the third highest in the United Kingdom in 1986 at £198 per week. That says something about the strength of north-west industry and what it is doing. Value added is an interesting measure that relates to the sophistication of businesses in the region. In other words, how much can we contribute in value to basic raw materials? For the United Kingdom last year, value added per employee in manufacturing industry was £14,052. It was £14,266 in north-west, which took the region ahead of the west midlands, the east midlands and Yorkshre and Humberside. That is a sign of the strength of the region's economic performance.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will respond to certain messages because I believe that the Government still have an important contribution to make in the development and renaissance of north-west industry. I ask them to remember the power of the public pound in terms of purchasing power with companies such as British Aerospace and British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. There is an opportunity for BNFL to receive orders for pressurised water fuel elements for the new power station at Sizewell. There will be new export opportunities. I hope that the Minister will bear his purchasing power in mind.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Jack: I shall not give way. I am sure that my hon. Friend understands that only a short time is available to me.

I wish to thank the Government for their continued support of the motor industry and their efforts to keep it moving. It is pleasing that over 50 per cent. of United Kingdom car production is produced at home. The spin-offs from help to that national industry affect the north-west. In Fylde, one small company called Sykes Pickavant won the garage tool of the year award. It is a little-known award that may seem to be insignificant but it is an example of how employment has been created by the help that has been given to the motor industry in even the smallest ways.

When Ministers talk with industry they should also talk to the financial markets. The Guardian Royal Exchange in my constituency is the classic example of the decampment of work down telephone lines, via the company's electronic office, to the company's data processing headquarters in Fylde. I wish that more people in the City would make such a move. It is a relatively easy one and the benefits, highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt), of low cost houses and leisure facilities would be an attraction to anyone to get out of the overcrowded south-east.

I make a special plea for those parts of the north-west which are benefiting from tourism, but which still have high seasonal levels of unemployment. With regard to the Fylde coast, stretching from Fleetwood through to Blackpool, will the Minister give serious consideration to restoring its assisted area status? The Peel industrial estate, phase one, was fully let when that facility was available. However, now that assisted area status has been removed, phase two of the development of the industrial estate is struggling. I ask the Minister to reconsider sympathetically the Fylde coast.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: A Tory begging bowl.

Mr. Jack: I am not begging. I am making a request for consideration, and I know that the Minister will take greater note of the comments of my hon. Friends and myself than those from the Opposition Benches.

I wish to pay a compliment to a Cinderella industry that does not get discussed often — produce pre-packing. Produce pre-packing reflects the fact that, in Lancashire, we have the second largest amount of grade 1 agricultural land in the country. That land produces some splendid crops and they are packed by companies, such as L. O. Jeffs, which is part of Northern Foods, and has a turnover of £16 million. That company, through its managing director and its entrepreneurial spirit, has shown that the natural advantages of the north-west, the locational advantages of the north-west, entrepreneurial spirit reacting to the needs of the major supermarkets and innovation are key elements in creating a company that started with a turnover of £5,000 after the war and now has a turnover of £16 million and employs 450 people.

That is the type of success story that I believe we should be promulgating throughout the north-west. I trust that the Minister will not just consider horticulture as part of agriculture. Horticulture is not party to the problems of the common agricultural policy. Horticulture provides a real opportunity for the north-west to exploit its natural advantages and create jobs.

8.32 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Robert Atkins): I welcome the initiative of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) in highlighting the performance of the economy of the north-west. I represent part of the north-west and the red rose county of Lancashire and I am pleased that my hon. Friend has had the opportunity to raise this matter.

I was delighted by the support that was given by my hon. Friends the Members for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) for Fylde (Mr. Jack) and for Stockport (Mr. Favell). That support comprehensively saw off the speech of the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) who adopted what we have come to expect as the traditional Labour approach to these matters. I believe that it is about time that the Labour party moved into the 20th century and realised that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Fylde rightly said, the north-west needs to be talked up and sold.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North has already said that there is a great deal of good news that needs to be told with conviction if the extensive assets of the north-west are to be capitalised upon with increasing effectiveness. The continuing upswing in the economy as a whole provides the region with particular opportunities.

The north-west, with its broadly based manufacturing and commercial activities, is well placed to tackle the new market opportunities at home and abroad. The United Kingdom economy is in its strongest position for years and the north-west is sharing in this economic resurgence that has been stimulated by Government policies of the past few years. We believe that the talents and skills of the individual can be released to create new wealth by adding value and finding new markets. Those policies are now paying dividends as output, productivity and profitability rise in the north-west in line with the rest of the country.

Inevitably, over the past two decades, employment in manufacturing has had to decline as a proportion of total employment in all major industrialised countries. In the late 1970s, overmanning and low productivity were especially prevalent in the United Kingdom. Therefore, with the onset of a world recession, which was not just confined to this country, there was bound to be a reduction in the numbers employed in companies that were aiming to survive. The north-west's manufacturing industry had to shed substantial numbers as a consequence, as we all know.

However, we need to see that in a wider perspective. Unemployment persists in all major EEC countries, but in the north-west new jobs are being created in the service industries through business start-ups and self-employment. The rate of unemployment is, therefore, declining. In June 1986 it stood at 14·6 per cent. and now it is down to 13·3 per cent. Overall, we do the region a great disservice if we fail to acknowledge that the north-west has successfully been creating a great many new jobs.

It is the Government's view that real economic growth can be sustained in the north-west, and elsewhere, only through the enterprise culture. The enterprise allowance scheme has, for example, done a great deal to encourage the growth in self-employment. In Manchester, for example, more than 4,000 people are now running their own businesses with the aid of the scheme.

At the same time, this large region retains a formidable range of major companies, underpinned by networks of smaller firms. Outside the south-east the north-west contributes the most in terms of GDP manufacturing output and employment to the United Kingdom as a whole. Over three quarters of the Financial Times top 100 companies are represented in the north-west. Companies from abroad have come to the region, liked what they found, and invested on a permanent basis.

As my hon. Friends have said, the region has an unrivalled transport network and the only international gateway airport outside London. Its highly skilled work force is better suited to advanced industrial activities than almost anywhere else in the world. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North said, in the north-west we have the largest campus in western Europe, encompassing the universities of Manchester and Salford, the University of Manchester Institute of Science and Technology, and various polytechnics.

However, I know that, despite those strengths, much of the region's industry has had to go through a major process of rationalisation over a protracted period. As part of that adjustment process, successive Governments have made regional financial assistance available. The north-west is receiving more of this type of assistance than any other English region. It has received £113 million in regional development grant for 1986-87 and £19 million in regional selective assistance in the same period.

My hon. Friend the Member for Fylde made the case for the Fylde coast and Blackpool, and as one who lives not a million miles from the area, as he well knows, I am sympathetic to the points that he has made. However, at this stage, I see no reason to change the map with the travel-to-work areas considered as he has referred to them.

The Merseyside development corporation was set up by the Government in 1981 to revive a depressed area of Liverpool. The corporation has spent in excess of £100 million. The private sector has responded to that, and the results are there for all to see. Indeed, only yesterday, on a visit to Liverpool, I was able to see a great deal of the tremendous work that has been done there. Liverpool successfully mounted the country's first international garden festival in 1984 which gave a lot of people in the north-west and other parts of the country a great deal of pleasure. The corporation also managed to restore the Albert dock warehouses, which is one of the finest groups of historic buildings in the country. I recommend anyone to go to see it because it is the most marvellous attraction. Partnership with the private sector is providing high-quality commercial development.

I recently had the opportunity of looking round the Salford quays project where an extensive derelict area is being transformed by commercial development, following Government funds to reclaim the infrastructure of the site. Again, it is well worth seeing the transformation that is taking place.

Back in Liverpool, the Wavertree technology park, which again I saw yesterday, has been created from 60 acres of derelict land with the help of a £6 million reclamation grant. At Speke, there is a proposal for Baltic Developments to colloborate with English Estates to develop yet another derelict site, which will eventually create 4,000 new jobs.

In Manchester, the Government have set up an urban development corporation at Trafford park, where, once more, Government help with infrastructure improvements is confidently expected to lead to about £500 million of new investment and up to 16,000 new jobs.

Even more recently, a private sector initiative has been announced to redevelop the Prince's and Waterloo docks in Liverpool with an investment of over £300 million, creating jobs for an estimated 5,000 people. Such expressions of confidence give me encouragement for the future of the north-west. Recently, announcements were made about setting up task forces in Preston and Rochdale to focus help on the local communities' attempts to restore pride, initiative and success to those deprived areas.

However, I must stress that we see the future performance of the north-west economy as relying at the end of the day on the enterprise of companies and individuals, not on Government intervention. We are trying to release the real potential and entrepreneurial energies of people in the north-west by creating an environment where they see genuine incentives for individual effort. I wish that some local authorities in the area could do more to recognise the importance of economic development. A crippling rates bill in some areas does not help companies to create jobs.

I emphasise yet again that we wish to co-operate with local authorities, not to confront them in the context of our inner-cities initiative. It was, therefore, instructive to go to Salford, as I did and meet the council which is co-operating in a big way. At the launch of the task-force initiative in Preston the Labour-controlled council made it clear that it wishes to co-operate, and it is doing so. That is all to the good. It is much better to co-operate and take advantage of what is happening than to have a policy of confrontation and to refuse to accept that the Government's initiatives can be successful.

There are many signs that the economy in the north-west region is becoming stronger and that it has emerged from the recession in the early 1980s in much better shape to face the years ahead. Overall business confidence is strong and there is a general expectation that recent improvements will be sustained. The rate of investment has increased. The Ford motor company has recently spent £87 million on its Halewood plant in Merseyside. Again, I had the opportunity to visit that plant yesterday. Despite the history of the plant in years gone by when it featured largely in the public prints and the media for its problems, it has developed extremely well. There is a lesson in that for Ford and the rest of Merseyside. It has made achievements in personnel, industrial relations, investment and the quality of its products. I recommend all hon. Members to go and see what has been achieved by Ford.

Nabisco is investing more than £25 million in its biscuit factory at Aintree. Philips Dupont Optical is investing heavily in a new compact disc plant at Blackburn. In Workington, British Alcan Aluminium has recently announced a major modernisation of its high-duty aluminium extrusion plant. Many hon. Members will know how pleased I am that the British aerospace industry has had a successful year in the region not just with the major companies, but with the various supporting companies which play such a large part. I know how much my hon. Friends appreciate that.

Equally, British Nuclear Fuels, an important company, has done well. Its future might have been threatened if the Labour party had come to power, but not with the return of the Conservative Government. I know how pleased it is that things are going well and how successful and important the Springfield site is, which is located in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Fylde and employs some of my constituents.

At the same time, we have had difficulties in the motor industry. I know full well the particular problems of Leyland Bus and Leyland Truck, now Leyland DAF, how they have faced those difficulties and are now on the road to greater profits and security. Other high technology industries are equally vigorous in the area. Both ICL and Ferranti are respected worldwide as companies whose technology is as advanced as any of their international competitors.

Many companies in the more traditional sectors are also showing that it is possible to compete effectively against all comers by a combination of good management, marketing and timely investment in the latest manufacturing technologies. Coats Viyella is now spearheading a resurgence of the textile industry and Coloroll has become a major force in the home furnishing sector.

The service sector is also buoyant. Manchester is the biggest financial centre outside London. More than 40 international, foreign and merchant and other banks are represented in Manchester, including three major international banks that have very recently come to the city. As hon. Members have said, Manchester international airport is growing rapidly, handling at present between 8 million and 9 million passengers a year. I cannot forgo the opportunity to mention in glowing terms the albeit smaller success that is brewing for Blackpool airport, so crucial to the Fylde coastal area, which often gets forgotten in the consideration of aviation activities in the north-west. I hope that that airport will continue to develop successfully.

The north-west has forged an increasingly effective regional policy in Inward which is promoting the region as an excellent location for inward investment. It is working closely with English Estates in the north-west to ensure that suitable locations are available for overseas companies to assess.

After what has been, even at this early hour, a sparkling debate, with many hon. Members putting the case for the north-west and arguing that the region has a lot going for it which perhaps other people do not appreciate, I recognise that a great many challenges still lie ahead, particularly in old urban areas where we must focus the experience and resources of the wider business community on identifying new market opportunities which, with imagination and determination, can attract new enterprises and generate additional employment.

I accept the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Fylde who, in his maiden speech not so long ago, used the expression directed at business men and others in the country to "Think North-West". That is extremely important. Talking down the north and the north-west does not help our prospects. We have a great deal going for us and we should make people realise our strengths, not our weaknesses. We are no different from other parts of the country in terms of the problems that face us. However, we want to ensure that people are aware that the north-west has an enormous amount going for it. People should come to us not only for communications reasons, but because the region is ideally located. I moved to the area 11 years ago and I would not move away for all the tea in China. It is a successful and attractive part of the country which should have more attention.

I believe that with the right approach the public and private sectors can work together to build on the natural strengths of the region and its people and bring real prosperity. In the long run, the health of the economy in the north-west must depend on giving the people who live there the opportunity to exercise their natural talents for entrepreneurialism, industry and commerce. If we can create the right conditions in which interprise can flourish, I know that the north-west will have a strong and prosperous future.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North on raising this subject for debate. I hope that his constituents and the constituents of other hon. Members who are present today will realise how much we care about the north-west and how important the north-west is to the future policies of the Government.

Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold

8.47 am

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): I offer my generous thanks to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the previous Conservative speakers for allowing me a little more than the five minutes I would have had had the previous debate run its full length. If my debate had taken place in a genuine sense, it would not have been related simply to the title that I have had to use, but would have referred to what is to happen to the remaining 7 tonnes of gold looted by the Nazis in the last war from the treasure chests of Europe and currently held in the Bank of England and the United States Federal Reserve, and when.

I understand that there are some 7,136 kg — approximately 7 tonnes — of gold, valued at Friday's gold price at about $100 million. I have never been able to understand why part of the gold is across the Atlantic. There is only one claim on that gold, that of the Albanian Government for about 2,400 kg. That leaves some 4,600 kg, almost 4·5 tonnes, of gold unclaimed and unused.

It was not my intention to develop the argument about the Albanian gold as a central issue. I intended to refer to it only in passing. I make it clear that I have no interest to declare other than curiosity, which arose after I talked to Ian Sayer, the author of "Nazi Gold", published in 1984. His book is essentially about the theft of gold from the German National Reserve in 1945. But some of that gold would have been destined for the body to be set up by the victorious allied powers — the tripartite commission referred to in the title of the debate. The commission's task was to distribute the gold stolen by the Nazis as restitution to countries in proportion to their respective losses through looting or wrongful removal to Germany. The tripartite commission did not make up the pool of gold, and it cannot be held responsible for any gold that it did not receive. That is another story altogether.

The commission, as records show, was set up under the 1946 Paris agreement on reparations. I do not believe that the authors of the eight short paragraphs, A to G, that make up part III of the agreement, relating to monetary gold, could have conceived in their wildest dreams that 41 years later the tripartite commission would still be in operation, and there would still be a pool of gold. The commission's function relates solely to the gold. It reminds me of the telling phrase used by Sir James Callaghan in 1979, during an exchange in the House about the Blunt affair, when he said that it was like the rustle of dead leaves.

Over the years much of the gold has been restored to its rightful owners, the last large shipment being of about 18 tonnes to the Czechs in 1982. I do not know what the total pool ever was. The tripartite commission works in secret, and I doubt that it will welcome today's parliamentary searchlight — or tiny spotlight — on its workings. I should like the Minister to tell me at some time, perhaps in correspondence, why it works in such secrecy. I do not know whether annual reports are made to anyone, but I know that the commission corresponds only with Governments, because from time to time inquiries are made to it about checking its records on the delivery of specific consignments of gold.

In short, the tripartite commission is an instrument of Government, the three commissioners answering to their respective Governments. We have had several commissioners over the years. At one time I expressed an interest in the expenses of the commission, which it obtains as a first charge on the pool of gold. That was a by-product of my inquiries. Late last year the Minister's predecessor, who is now at the Home Office, promised to check on the matter for me, but in March this year he finally wrote to me saying:

"We cannot get the permission of our fellow Commissioners to release the information you requested".

The Minister kindly offered me another chat at the Foreign Office, following the one in March 1985 which the Prime Minister had arranged for me. However, I took the view then that after I had waited so long and had had protracted correspondence with the Prime Minister on the matter, it should have an airing in the House of Commons. It is all taking too long, in too much secrecy. It is about time that we put as much as possible of the second world war behind us.

I asked my first parliamentary question on the matter in May 1984. Between then and last Friday, the value of the gold pool increased by $40 million. I assume, therefore, that the commission's expenses have been met from that increase.

I am aware, from several exchanges with the Prime Minister and from meetings with Foreign Office officials, that the Government would like to settle the Albanian question, because that would release the rest of the gold for distribution. The Albanian question is tied up with matters which I would not dream of going into now, but which relate to the Corfu channel incident in 1946, when 44 British seamen and officers lost their lives after the mining of two ships. The Albanians will not pay the International Court of Justice claim until they get their gold, and the International Court of Justice has said that they should get the gold. It is a question of the chicken and the egg that is holding up the distribution of the other 4·5 tonnes of gold. That is why I felt that the issue should be raised.

I made a suggestion, which the Government have considered. Our claim against the Albanians is for less than £1 million in 1946 figures, which is very little compared with the value of the gold that the Albanians will receive from the tripartite commission. It would be quite easy to suggest taking it out before it had passed across. That suggestion has been considered, but it is not possible. One of the main reasons is that the French will not allow it. The French have good diplomatic relations and, as I have reminded Ministers, damned good trading relations, with Albania, which serves to keep out the British competition. That is partly what concerns me — that the stalemate of our present position could affect our trade.

It is a simplistic view, and I put it very briefly to the Minister. I shall send to him the speech that I would have made, so that we can discuss some of the questions that I ask in it.

The Prime Minister told me that the relatives of those who were killed in the Corfu channel incident would probably not understand the action, which seemed to be cutting corners in an effort to reach a settlement. The dependants will not gain from a settlement of the dispute, even though the Foreign Office has changed its language over the years — from a flat refusal, to the line that the dependants are unlikely to benefit. I believe that they ought to benefit, because at that time the compensation was unfair. Wartime allowances were made for a peacetime incident, for which the allowances are different.

The Italians have placed a veto on a tripartite commission consisting of the French, the British and the Americans, simply because of the relationship between the Albanians and the Italian banks, where the gold was deposited, before the war. It is almost a quadripartite commission.

I want to place just a few of my questions to the Minister on the record. I do not intend to speak until 9 o'clock; that would be grossly discourteous to him. Discounting the Albanian gold, I want to know why the balance of the gold has to be held by the tripartite commission until the Albanian issue is settled and there are no more claims. Also, what is the precise weight of the remaining gold, excluding the Albanian gold, and it current value? Are my figures correct? Is the gold physically separated and labelled in the Bank of England, or is it just an accountancy matter, to keep it out of the reserves?

Does the Minister know, or do the Government know, how much of that gold has been used over the years for expenses, or is it a fact that the tripartite commission will tell nobody about this — even the allied Governments who form the commission? Is there any problem over interest claims on the United Kingdom award by the International Court of Justice against Albania, or is there a dispute about the value of the gold, which has vastly increased over the years? It was $35 an ounce in the 1940s; it is now between $440 and $446 an ounce.

Are the claimant countries all aware that the tripartite commission is holding gold that ultimately will be distributed to the claimant countries? Six Common Market countries, and also Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Jugoslavia will share the remaining gold after the disbursement to Albania. What, if any, steps are being taken to inform the recipients of the procedure that will be used for the final distribution? If there are none, are there any plans to do so?

I have two final questions, one of which relates to a parliamentary answer in April 1987. Why is it not possible to state now what procedures will be used for the final distribution? Are the procedures yet to be decided by the tripartite commission? I referred in my parliamentary question to the fact that they had not been fixed. Does this mean that the procedures that were adopted for the earlier distributions of gold — which probably amounted, according to one private estimate, to 250 million tonnes — are to be varied? If that is so, why? Why is it not to be simply a pro rata percentage of the claim that was met by the commission in the first place?

Finally, will the 30-year rule on the official papers run from the date of the Albanian settlement and the final distribution by the tripartite commission, or will they be disclosed immediately, given that the whole issue has now lasted for more than 40 years? Indeed, will such papers ever be released?

8.57 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): I am extremely grateful to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) for allowing me three minutes in which to deal with this question, which has bedevilled various individuals for the last 41 years. It is absolutely typical of the hon. Member that, his attention having been caught by this interesting matter, he should have pursued it consistently and thoroughly.

In the short time that is available to me, I cannot deal with all the questions that the hon. Member has asked. I undertake to write to him, to comment on his questions and to deal with the full text of the speech that he would have made, had he had time to make it. I shall try to be as helpful as I can in my answers. Having pursued the matter over the past few years, he will be aware of the very severe constraints under which the Government operate in dealing with answers to these questions.

The commission consists of the United Kingdom, the United States and France. The commissioners are the respective commercial councillors in the relevant embassies in Brussels. They meet from time to time as and when the meetings become necessary.

The amount that is currently held by the commission is some 7,000 kg. Once the Albanian portion has been delivered the residue will be handed to the various local original claimant countries in proportion to their earlier allocation. The procedures to be used when this time arrives have not been established but will be determined by the tripartite commission. The twin problems of the gold allocated to Albania that is held in the custody of the tripartite commission and the payment by Albania of the Corfu channel claim have bedevilled relations between the United Kingdom and Albania and have bedevilled efforts to try to wind up the tripartite commission.

It being Nine o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Dyslexia

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

9 am

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): Dyslexic or not dyslexic, that is the question. At least, it is a question that is posed by many parents who are desperately concerned about the progress that their offspring are making at school.

I shall not waste time by discussing whether the Department of Education accepts that there is such a thing as dyslexia; I shall assume that it does.

Many right hon. and hon. Members are concerned about this matter. I am delighted to note the presence of the Father of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine). My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) is present and I am aware that my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point hopes to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, during the debate. Many hon. Members have contacted me about this debate, including the hon. Member for Bolton, South-West (Mr. Sackville), who also wishes to catch your eye briefly. My hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame Peggy Fenner) has a related constituency problem. She hoped to be here this morning and I know that it is a subject that she wishes to take up with the Minister in due course.

Some 30 years ago I was a child with special learning difficulties. I fully appreciate how lucky I was to be identified as such a child and have the problem dealt with quickly. At the age of five I was apparently known as "Double Dutch". I had a very bad stutter and could not make the sound "ST" and "TH" and I needed my sister to act as my interpreter.

I attended St. Anthony's school in Forest Gate and sat in a class of about 50 children. My teacher, Miss Grey, asked to see my mother after school and explained to her that she thought that I had special learning difficulties.

For about three years I went to a speech therapist and the dentist fixed me up with braces on my teeth. If today I am able to communicate it is due to the dedication of that teacher and the provision that I was afforded.

For 18 months I taught at a junior mixed school, St. John the Baptist in Bonner Road, Bethnal Green. I specialised in teaching children who were described as ESN. They often turned out to be the most unruly children in classes and unfortunately were all lumped together, but I did my best under difficult circumstances.

Dyslexia is a special learning difficulty that results in a specific and persistent difficulty with reading, spelling, written prose and sometimes arithmetic. There is a discrepancy between the child's literary skills and his intelligence and abilities in other spheres. It occurs in spite of adequate educational provision and is independent of socio-cultural background. In addition to difficulties with the written language the individual may also have difficulties with orientation, time, short-term memory, sequencing, auditory or visual perception and motor skills.

There is a danger that some parents who feel that their children are not making progress will automatically assume that their child is dyslexic. I would not wish to be part to an outbreak of dyslexia throughout Essex or the country. My hon. Friends and I fully understand parents' anxieties about their children not making the progress their parents expect. I willingly pay tribute to the work of the British Dyslexia Association for the way in which it has tried to help parents who have experienced difficulties in obtaining adequate educational provision for their children. I have had the honour of being made the first president of the Essex Dyslexia Association which was formed to assist parents with information on how to get the right help for the children.

As we all know, the Education At 1981 requires local education authorities to provide for proper assessment of children. That procedure can take a long time. We have already experienced some unfortunate delays in Essex and in my constituency of Basildon. After the assessment stage, the child must have a statement of his disability drawn up. From the time of the recognition of the problem to the final statement of disability, over two years may have passed. To alleviate some of the problems, an informal assessment can be made, but if the child shows signs of disability, he must go on to a formal assessment so that he can have a statement made. Even after that, it can often prove difficult to get adequate help for him.

I pay tribute to Essex county council and its education department. They are trying to provide education in difficult circumstances in the largest county in the country and to cope with ever-changing needs. However, I shall ask them to do more for children with special learning difficulties. At the moment, parents in Essex have to hope that a place is available for their child in a boarding school in another county or, if their child has not been diagnosed behaviourally disturbed as well as afflicted with a learning disability, they must be content with remedial teachers working with the child a few hours a week. Remedial teachers, however, are not necessarily trained in the methods of multi-sensory programmes used to assist dyslexic children to learn.

Because of the delays in assessments and statements and in locating proper facilities for teaching, a child may be almost ready to leave school before adequate training has been found. There is a clear need in Essex for more provision for special education for those with learning disabilities. Although I would not wish such children to be labelled "different", with may cases there is little alternative than to provide special tuition in a separate school.

I particularly welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens), who has a special interest in this matter. I should have thought that there was a strong case for Essex county council to turn one of the schools which, unfortunately, had to close because of falling numbers into a centre for the provision of intensive tuition for chidren with special educational needs. Such an arrangement would surely make sense from an educational and a financial point of view. Naturally, I would be particularly delighted if the centre were sited near my constituency of Basildon and that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point.

It is difficult to know how many children are affected by learning disorders, as the assessment statement process includes all ranges of physical handicaps. When children with physical handicaps are evaluated, it is often easier to assess their needs and adequate provision is more easily arranged. I ask for those with learning disabilities to be given the same consideration and opportunities as other children. When a dyslexic person takes a driving test, if he presents the evaluator with a note saying that he is dyslexic, his test will be arranged to suit his condition and circumstances. Essex university's open university programme will make special provision for dyslexic people. However, I am concerned that few dyslexic people will reach the stage where they seriously consider university education, because they believe that the education they have already received is adequate. I believe that there are nowhere near enough teachers who are trained in regard to special learning difficulties.

Mr. Tom Sackville (Bolton, West): I have a particular interest in this subject because we have a dyslexia institute at Horwich in my constituency where there are skilled teachers. The institute is for the children of parents who can afford to pay to have their children specially coached. Children who are referred to the education authority as dyslexic are not taught in that specialist manner. Whether it is a matter of teachers or psychologists getting their act together I am not sure, but I know that there is an injustice that dyslexic children in my constituency are not getting the help that they deserve.

Mr. Amess: I welcome my hon. Friend's intervention and support what he says.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister, who has visited my constituency and seen some of the excellent work that is being done in some schools there, will encourage local education authorities to release teachers for training in this important area. If local education authorities put a programme for training teachers into effect immediately, I should like my hon. Friend to tell me whether there would be enough staff to meet the needs of children. Does the Department intend to have remedial teachers sufficient to meet children's needs in a certain number of schools, does it intend to release dyslexic children for private tuition for which the local education authority will cover the cost, or does it intend education authorities to set up their own units which dyslexic children can attend full or part-time according to need?

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important debate. Does he think that it would be sensible to enable dyslexic children to take examinations by having the questions read to them by specially trained teachers or a tape recording? Now, they may be able to pass an examination but cannot read the questions.

Mr. Amess: I am grateful for that intervention. My initial reaction is that I have no objection to that. We have oral French examinations and an oral part of the English examination already.

I am not entirely convinced that this important subject has been given enough attention. I draw on my own experience 30 years ago when I was one of the lucky children. I hope that, after this debate, others will be given extra help.

9.12 am

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): I am sure that the House is grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) for raising the subject of dyslexia with such sensitivity and understanding.

It is high time that the plight of children who have a normal intelligence quotient but who suffer from learning difficulties which have grown worse because they were not identified early enough—despite pleas from their parents—was properly examined by the authorities.

Two cases have been brought to my attention recently by frustrated parents. These suggest that the Essex education authority is failing in its statutory duty to ensure that such children receive their right under the Education Act 1944 to be educated according to their needs. One reason is that no directive is given to teachers to identify such children early and to refer them without delay to an educational psychologist. Essex does not seem to recognise—and I am speaking more bluntly than did my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon—that special teaching is required for dyslexic children and that to lump them together with other under-achievers in what was called before the 1981 Act a school for educationally sub-normal children is utterly wrong and should be changed.

One child in my constituency has been right the way through the system without any help. He is now 16. He is intelligent, he is capable of verbal reasoning, he understands his condition and he can converse sensibly, but he has been turned out educationally backward because of the absence of special teaching that only properly qualified teachers can provide. It is a disgraceful state of affairs and I wonder how many more children are affected.

Another child in my constituency has an above average IQ. He needs what is called a multi-sensory programme, of which there are a number of variations, which can be geared to individuals. Nothing like that is provided in Essex. There is a complete failure so far on the part of the local education authority to understand the problem. Intervention takes place only when a child becomes so frustrated and his behavioural problems become so distressing that he has to be sent away outside the county to a boarding school, at great expense to the ratepayers. That is madness and should stop. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to take the matter seriously and to put in hand steps to improve the situation.

The time has come for a directive to local education authorities. I hope that heed will be paid to the practical suggestions that were made by my hon. Friend. There is a great deal of sense in what my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) said only a few moments ago. These children deserve a much better deal than they have been getting.

9.16 am

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. Does the hon. Member have the agreement of the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) and the Minister to intervene? I gather that he does.

Mr. Wilshire: I thank the House for allowing me to intervene without giving notice. It was brought to my attention overnight that an institute based in Staines in my constituency specialises internationally in training teachers as well as helping children. It trains teachers to teach dyslexic children in ordinary state schools, and it has now launched an appeal for £1,500,000.

The best way of helping people is for the Department to contribute to that appeal, rather than to set up another training scheme. That institution has an international reputation, is visited by presidents, royalty and celebrities and is supported by charitable contributions. If the House wishes to make progress in the training of teachers so that children do not have to be sent away, this institute in Staines can help. Therefore, I wonder whether the Minister will see if the Department can support that appeal.

9.18 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Robert Dunn): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) on his superb election victory in Basildon recently and on his success in obtaining the Adjournment debate this morning on a subject of long-standing interest and concern to the House, and to the parents of children with specific learning difficulties all over the country. My hon. Friend has shown a particular concern for children with a range of special education needs and learning difficulties. No one could fail to be moved by the account that he gave of his own experiences over 30 years ago.

I open my response to this short but important debate by trying to dispel a myth — that the Department of Education and Science and its Ministers do not recognise dyslexia as a problem. The Government recognise dyslexia and recognise the importance to the education progress of dyslexic children, their long-term welfare and successful function in adult life, that they should have their needs identified at an early stage. Once the assessment has been made — and I note the points made by my hon. and right hon. Friends today — the appropriate treatment should be forthcoming.

I know that there are some local education authorities, which as a matter of policy, refuse to accept the word dyslexia. They argue that there are very few children who present a common pattern of dyslexic symptoms. Certainly there is no one characteristic which defines a child as dyslexic or not dyslexic. There is a range of criteria, and a child who shows a particular pattern of difficulties may be termed dyslexic. Whether or not the term is used, the important thing is to be sure that something is being done about the problem.

So, what are we doing? Perhaps I can best start by using the definition which the noble Lord Ritchie used when introducing a debate on this subject in another place earlier this year. He said that dyslexia is a disorder in children who, despite conventional classroom experience, fail to attain the language skills of reading, writing and spelling commensurate with their intellectual abilities. That definition was made by the World Federation of Neurology as long ago as 1968, and some experts have subsequently added to that definition difficulty in handling figures.

The House will know that the issue has been considered by a number of committees who have advised successive Secretaries of State. In the light of this advice, the Department of Education and Science takes the view that there are children with severe and long-term difficulties in one or more areas whose general ability is at least average and for whom distinctive special arrangements are necessary. This normally takes the form of good remedial teaching in ordinary schools. The term "specific learning difficulties" seems to provide the best description of these children's problems, since it denotes the existence of an educational problem for which help is required, but without implying any definite cause or exclusive category.

Under the Education Act 1981, which came into force on 1 April 1983, local education authorities are under a duty to assess the needs of those children brought to their attention as having, or possibly having, special educational needs. Parents too, may ask for an assessment of their child's educational needs, and local education authorities must comply with the request unless it is, in their opinion, unreasonable. Such educational needs, of course, include dyslexia, as well as blindness, deafness and physical handicaps among other things. I should add that health authorities also have a duty to inform local education authorities of any child under the age of five who may have special educational needs. Those duties cover children with all forms of hearing difficulties, including those associated with dyslexia. What is more important, the 1981 Act requires local education authorities to ensure that the needs of children who have been identified as having special educational need are met.

Section 1 of the Act defines a child who has special educational needs as a child who has a learning difficulty which calls for special educational provision to be made for him. The section goes on to define a "learning difficulty" by reference to a child with a significantly greater difficulty in learning than the majority of children of his age, or one who has a difficulty which either prevents him or hinders him from making use of educational facilities of a kind generally provided in school, within the area of his local education authority for children of his age. Thus, special educational provision is defined as educational provision which is additional to, or otherwise different from, the educational provision made generally for children of his age in schools maintained by the LEA concerned.

The Warnock committee estimated that up to 20 per cent. of school children might have some kind of special educational need at some time during their school days. It does not, however, follow that all 20 per cent. will be the subject of a statement made and maintained under the procedures in sections 5 and 7 of the 1981 Act. That is necessary only for those children whose educational needs are such as to call for the LEA to determine the provision which needs to be made for them.

The provisions of the Education (Special Needs) Regulations 1983 made under the Act are perhaps less well known than the provisions of the Act itself. Under the regulations, it is required that the people making assessments of children are qualified educational psychologists. All such educational psychologists will have been teachers before taking up the specialism. Also included must be the advice of a qualified medical practitioner and of the headteacher. Consequently, the people involved in making assessment are, or I truly believe should be, well qualified to reach the right decision.

There will be complaints that different authorities will make different provision for children presenting with broadly the same range of problems. Let me emphasise again that LEAs are under a duty to make available appropriate provision to meet the needs of all children identified as having special educational needs, whether or not they are the subject of a statement. The Department's circular 1/83 indicates that a statement is appropriate for all those children who have complex learning difficulties, as well as in all cases where a child is based in a special unit attached to an ordinary school, a special school, a non-maintained special school or an independent school approved by the Secretary of State for the purpose. On the other hand, formal procedures are not appropriate where ordinary schools make special educational provision from their own resources in the form of additional tuition or remedial provision, nor in normal circumstances for those children who attend a reading centre or a unit for disruptive pupils.

That is all well-known to hon. Members; but, in response to the comments made by my right hon. and hon. Friends, I shall bring to the attention of the Secretary of State the points that they have urged upon us in terms of direct action. If there is anything that we can do to tighten up any of the procedures that lie before us in the form of statutory or legal requirements, we shall be more than willing to consider such action as is represented to us on this occasion and from time to time in future. The 1981 Act, which governs most of the debate, was a major step forward. Clearly, concerns have been echoed by many hon. Members, not just today but in the past and, I am sure, will be echoed in the future. I undertake to bring this important matter immediately to the attention of the Secretary of State.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

Departmental Legislation

1. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received about proposals in the Queen's Speech for which he has responsibility; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Younger): I believe that the Government's defence policy as set out in the Gracious Speech has received wide support.

Mr. Thurnham: Following the clear statement of support for Trident in the Queen's Speech and the placing of further contracts for the development of the Trident base, will my right hon. Friend tell us the value of those contracts and how many jobs can be expected to arise from them?

Mr. Younger: The contract to which my hon. Friend refers is worth £120 million and will bring 600 jobs to the west of Scotland. That will take the total value of contracts awarded to date for the development of Faslane and Coulport to £255 million. At its peak, this development programme will create 2,500 construction jobs in the west of Scotland. It is worth recording that had the Queen's Speech reflected the views of the Opposition parties, none of that investment would be taking place and Scotland would have been robbed of thousands of job opportunities.

Mr. Douglas: The Secretary of State will be aware of the launch of a type 23 frigate at Yarrows. Notwithstanding his comments on Trident, when does the right hon. Gentleman expect to place further orders for type 23 frigates and fulfil his commitment to order at least three frigates a year?

Mr. Younger: I note the hon. Gentleman's questions. We shall give further consideration to the ordering of type 23 frigates later this year, and we have given a clear undertaking to maintain the Royal Navy at about 50 frigates, at which it has been for some time.

Sir Antony Buck: My right hon. Friend is right to say that what was outlined in the Queen's Speech about defence caused considerable satisfaction to all Conservative Members and to many reasonable Members on the Opposition Benches, too. Does he agree that if the Opposition's defence policies were to be adopted there would be little chance of making progress with the mutual and balanced force reduction and strategic arms reduction talks and obtaining what we all want—disarmament on both sides of the iron curtain?

Mr. Younger: I entirely agree with my hon. and learned Friend. I understand that the official Opposition would have given away all our bargaining counters before they started negotiations.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The House will be intrigued by the Secretary of State's statement that there was wide support for the Government's defence policy. That certainly did not extend to the constituency of Ayr. However, we are pleased that after three recounts the Secretary of State was able to return to the House of Commons.

Why is the right hon. Gentleman postponing the debate on the defence White Paper until the end of the year? Clearly there must be a major defence review, which will leave our armed forces much weaker than they were a few years ago.

Mr. Younger: I warmly welcome the right hon. Gentleman back to his position in the House in his new role as the reluctant debutante on the Opposition Front Bench. I assure him that we shall do our best to make his stay there as pleasant as possible.

The right hon. Gentleman knows that the Gracious Speech clearly stated the Government's commitment to a strong defence policy. That is what we propose to proceed with in future.

The matter of a debate is for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House.

European Fighter Aircraft

2. Mr. Jack asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the European fighter aircraft project.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): The project definition phase for the European fighter aircraft ended last September. The four nations are currently assessing the outcome of this phase before deciding whether to proceed to full development. We expect to be in a position to take our decision in the autumn.

Mr. Jack: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply, because Fylde houses the headquarters of the British Aerospace military aircraft division and it has no doubt about the benefits of the European fighter aircraft programme. Will my hon. Friend confirm that he is eager to see British firms participating in the European fighter aircraft programme? And, to that end, will he be holding discussions with Rolls-Royce, British Aerospace and the three NATO countries that are participating in the project?

Mr. Sainsbury: I am sure that my hon. Friend — as was his predecessor — and his neighbour, my hon.

Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins), will be energetic spokesmen for their constituencies' interests. I can assure my hon. Friend that the Government are planning on the basis of the United Kingdom playing a full part in the EFA programme. Discussions with our NATO Allies and the principal contractors continue, particularly through the forum of the international programme office.

Mr. Cryer: Will the European fighter aircraft be a better aircraft than the Jaguar or the Tornado, 49 of which have been lost since 1979 at a cost of about £430 million? Will the Minister tell us why we need these sophisticated aircraft when one can fly to Red Square in a single-engined Cessna?

Mr. Sainsbury: The hon. Gentleman will find that the aircraft to which he refers are highly thought of, and our success in selling the Tornado overseas is testimony to the effectiveness of that aircraft.

Mr. Stern: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his new post. Did he notice during the recent election campaign how the only substitute that the principal Opposition party could find for its defence policy was to talk down EFA at every opportunity? That was especially the Labour party's policy in constituencies such as mine where parts of the aircraft are being built. Will my hon. Friend confirm, not only that an existing engine—the RB 199—has been chosen as the pre-production engine, but that the Government have the faith in the EFA that the Opposition are determined to try to destroy at every opportunity?

Mr. Sainsbury: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind remarks. It is regrettable that, all too often, Opposition Members seem to find satisfaction in criticising British products, in defence or other areas. The Government are determined that British firms will play a full part in the project. We believe that, both in engines and other parts, we have some excellent products to contribute to the EFA programme.

Mr. McNamara: I welcome the Minister to the Dispatch Box and say that we think that his is a good appointment, so far as the Prime Minister's appointments go.

The hon. Gentleman will be aware that, far from running down the EFA, the Opposition said that it was going to be a possible casualty because of the Government's foolishness in pursuing the Trident programme. How firm is the RAF's commitment to the EFA?

Mr. Sainsbury: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his somewhat barbed compliments. He has a novel way of putting these things.

The Government's commitment to the EFA project, which, as I said, obviously reflects the commitment of the services, is very strong indeed. It is surprising that the hon. Gentleman should think that the project might be a casualty of the Trident programme. He should recall that the Tornado programme was a larger part of the total defence procurement programme than Trident is or is likely to be.

Mr. Wilkinson: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the European fighter aircraft is in the long-term costings? Although there has been no decision on the development of the aircraft as yet, will he give some indication of the numbers that he would expect to come into the front line were an order to go ahead for the development phase?

Mr. Sainsbury: I can confirm that the European fighter aircraft is in the long-term costings. Obviously, it is too early to forecast with certainty the eventual size of a United Kingdom purchase. However, the work-sharing agreement for development is based on our declared requirement for 250 aircraft.

Strategic Defence Initiative

3. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the level of British participation in strategic defence initiative research funded by the Government of the United States of America.

Mr. Younger: A sound start was made in 1986 in the first year of participation. A broadly-based series of awards were placed on contract to the value of $34 million. Vigorous efforts continue to be made to secure SDI research business, both by industry and by the academic community in the United Kingdom, with the active and day-to-day support of my staff in the SDI participation office.

Mr. Wallace: The right hon. Gentleman's predecessor is on record as saying that he fully expected British participation to be on a scale commensurate with Britain's industrial base. Does the Secretary of State feel that the $34 million contract so far gained is on that scale, and, if not, how far does it fall short? Is is not becoming increasingly clear that the Americans were far more interested in getting a cloak of political respectability for their project through British participation than in the project having anything to do with the advancement of Britain's technological interests, which, as the Select Committee on Defence said, would be better achieved through non-military collaborative projects?

Mr. Younger: I note what the hon. Gentleman said, but I do not agree with the latter part of his question. I am disappointed that during the last six months there have not been further announcements of contracts under the SDI programme. The participation office is making every effort to progress the other applications that are in the pipeline and that will be coming forward in the next few months. The reason for this lack of contracts is due largely to the drop in funding of the SDI programme in the United States. I very much hope that British participation will revive when that picks up.

Sir John Farr: Is my right hon. Friend aware that British arms exporters who have been doing so brilliantly in recent months are becoming very disillusioned with the rewards from SDI? The net return now and in the immediate future seems to be negligible compared with that promised by my hon. Friend's predecessor two or three years ago.

Mr. Younger: I do not agree with my hon. Friend that the returns will be negligible. We must remember that this is a very long-term programme stretching over many years. We made a good start in getting participation for British firms, but there has been an unsatisfactory response in the last six months. We very much hope that this will improve. My hon. Friend is perfectly correct about defence export sales generally. Our export sales are going extremely well.

It is worth recording that had they won the election the Opposition proposed to wind up the defence export sales organisation. That would have been very bad news.

Mr. Heffer: Has the right hon. Gentleman taken note of the exchange in the proceedings in Washington involving Colonel Oliver North, in which he talked about some unofficial British organisation tied up with the [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should make his supplementary relevant to the question.

Mr. Heffer: It is very relevant, Mr. Speaker, because I want to know whether this has had anything to do with the discussions with the United States on this very question of SDI.

Mr. Younger: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is no. I do not think that it has. I have seen the report of a press conference about this and it seems to be in the realms of pure fantasy.

Mr. Hill: No doubt my right hon. Friend will recall that we had hoped to participate far more in the research and development programme for SDI, stretching into the mid-1990s. Will he tell his counterparts in the United States that the whole House is rather disappointed at the amount of contracts that are coming our way? Will there be any diminution in the programme if a President who is not quite so pro-SDI is elected at the next presidential election?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I shall certainly draw the attention of my colleagues in the United States to the points that he has made in the House today. I do not think it likely that any United States Administration will abandon research into these important techniques, because that would leave this area entirely free to the Soviet Union, which has a large research programme in this sphere.

Low-Flying Aircraft

4. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many representations he has received on the question of low-flying aircraft since the beginning of June.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Roger Freeman): Between 1 June and 7 July 1987 the Ministry of Defence received 542 inquiries or complaints about military aircraft flying. This compares with 683 for the same period in 1986.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: If the number of pilots has not increased since 1979, why has the number of low-flying sorties increased from 71,000 in 1979 to 156,000 this year? Could the answer lie in the Robson report, which suggests that morale among military pilots is collapsing and that 57 per cent. of pilots who fulfilled eight years of training have now left the service? Could it be that the Ministry is now having to train pilots far more to ensure that it has fully-trained pilots to replace those who have left? Is that why the Lake District is being plagued by low-flying exercises?

Mr. Freeman: No, Sir. Morale in the Royal Air Force is excellent. The premature voluntary retirement rates for pilots are decreasing and are substantially lower in absolute terms than they were when the Labour Government were last in power. We need more sorties because we have introduced the Tornado aircraft into service. Clearly, pilots need to be trained to use them. However, it would seem that the number of low-flying sorties needed has now reached a plateau.

Mr. Jopling: I recognise that low-flying exercises are both militarily necessary and dangerous, but there have been reports that the recent tragic accident over Keswick in the constituency of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) was caused by a head-on collision. Will the Minister set up an inquiry to establish whether it is really necessary for aircraft to fly in opposite directions in these essential but dangerous exercises?

Mr. Freeman: I can tell my right hon. Friend that the accident trend is definitely down, and that 1986 was the best year — [Interruption.] I am coming on to answer the question. As I said, 1986 was the best year for the lowest number of aircraft accidents. As regards the tragic accident in Cumbria, I have to await the board of inquiry report, but I shall bear in mind what my right hon. Friend has said.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: Will the Minister and the House join me in ensuring that our sympathy is extended to the family of Flight Lieutenant Hill from RAF Lossiemouth in my constituency, who was the most recent victim of such an accident, which involved a Jaguar jet? Will he advise me what prior warning is now being given to those in the direct flight path of aircraft on such exercises in the light of the incident over Orkney last year when air traffic control at Kirkwall was not notified of such an exercise taking place? Will the Minister assure me that he will reject the blandishments of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) to the effect that all such exercises should be directed over the Highlands and Islands of Scotland? The people in that area are just as vulnerable as people elsewhere.

Mr. Freeman: I am sure that the whole House will join the hon. Lady in paying tribute to the loyalty, skill and bravery of Royal Air Force pilots. The Ministry of Defence writes to hon. Members, representatives of the National Farmers Union and the press to warn them of low-flying exercises, but we cannot do that for each individual sortie.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that the reason why the Royal Air Force has to conduct such sorties is that in modern fighter pilot conditions and raiding environments with strike aircraft the only way to survive is to fly low and fast? It is essential that our pilots are capable of doing that in peacetime in case they are ever exposed to wartime conditions in which, if we were not prepared, the ghastly attrition rate would be far more than we could afford.

Mr. Freeman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Low-flying training is the price of freedom, which the RAF has to pay on our behalf in order to defend our skies. Low-flying exercises are necessary to train our pilots to fly underneath enemy radar, and in wartime they would have to fly considerably lower than 250 ft.

Mr. McNamara: I am sure that the Opposition welcome the Minister's statement that RAF pilots flying conventional aircraft are the price of freedom, as opposed to the Government's policy that the price of freedom is mass extermination. The Minister is reported to have said, while the House was in recess, that a certain attrition rate was to be expected in this type of training. What rate of attrition in terms of men, machines and cost is the RAF prepared to accept in this context, and is the Minister satisfied with the present training procedures?

Mr. Freeman: Yes, we are satisfied with the present safety procedures. Sadly, with military aircraft, the attrition rate will clearly be higher than with civil aircraft, but, as I have said, we have an excellent safety record. The trend is down and our record is admired by many other countries and air forces.

Service Establishments (Dispersal)

5. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has plans to devolve more service establishments and jobs to Scotland and the north of England.

Mr. Younger: I am anxious to improve the geographic spread of defence employment, particularly in areas of high unemployment. Such moves must, however, be justifiable in both operational and economic terms.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Does my right hon. Friend agree that moving jobs northward is helpful to the regional economy, without requiring artificial subsidies? Can he tell us what progress has been made, whether earlier plans to transfer jobs to the Glasgow area have borne fruit and to what extent the jobs have been filled by local recruitment?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The Glasgow programme is a good example of the Government's dispersal policy, with 1,330 extra jobs established there, of which 1,000 have been filled by local recruitment. The overwhelming majority of the jobs were dispersed from the south of England. We recognise that those jobs should be offset against further moves from posts out of London, but the net result at the end of the programme should be a gain of 1,400 jobs for Glasgow, offset by a similar loss of posts from London.

Mr. Cartwright: As it is Government policy to provide more rather than fewer jobs in inner London, will the Secretary of State resist the temptation to remove any defence jobs from areas such as Woolwich, which has suffered massively from the systematic transfer of defence jobs in the past few years and where unemployment is still more than 16 per cent.?

Mr. Younger: I very much appreciate that valid constituency point. It is established policy in the Department that every effort should be made to relocate work to the regions wherever it proves economically and operationally viable, but, of course, we also take into account the interests of the other areas concerned.

Mr. Robert Banks: Will my right hon. Friend give a categorical assurance that there are no plans to remove any service jobs from Harrogate to Glasgow or anywhere else?

Mr. Younger: That would certainly not be in tune with the Government's policy, which is to disperse jobs to other areas from London, not from Harrogate.

Mr. Beggs: When considering relocating jobs to the north of England and to Scotland, will the Minister bear in mind the very high rate of unemployment in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Younger: I certainly take that very much into account. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we place a large amount of defence contract work in Northern Ireland—not least the order placed by my Department with Harland and Wolff for a new auxiliary oiler replenishment vessel, which I very much hope will be completed to price and on time.

Mr. Holt: Will my right hon. Friend take note of the Government's recent commitment to augmenting the Merchant Marine in the event of war? Does he agree that it should be based in the north-east of England, preferably on Teesside, and will he ensure that it is not based in London?

Mr. Younger: I note my hon. Friend's comments. I am very conscious of the defence work carried out in my hon. Friend's area in the north-east of England. It is a highly valid part of our defence industry.

Mr. Grocott: If the Minister is keen to secure defence jobs in areas of high unemployment, will he scrap the absurd suggestion to privatise jobs at COD Donnington, threatening the livelihood of more than 400 employees?

Mr. Younger: It is a matter, not of threatening jobs in terms of the area, but of trying to obtain better value for money in the way in which existing establishments are run. That must be in everyone's interests, because if the job is done more effectively there will be more money available for other defence work.

Bramley Camp, Basingstoke

6. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of Bramley camp, near Basingstoke.

Mr. Freeman: My Department is considering the retention of part of the land for use for Army dry training and disposal of the remaining portion. It will be discussing its proposals in due course with the local authority.

Mr. Hunter: Does my hon. Friend appreciate that would were the Property Services Agency to maximise the realisation of this capital asset, there would be a wholesale housing development that would run counter to the interests of local farmers, flout the wishes of county and district planners and go against the wishes of many of my constituents, particularly those in the villages of Bramley and Sherfield on Loddon? Will my hon. Friend take those factors as well as the economic factors into account?

Mr. Freeman: I am sure that my hon. Friend will appreciate the great pressure upon the Ministry of Defence to sell surplus land. However, I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that there will be no wholesale housing development on that land. At a date convenient to my hon. Friend, I hope to be able to visit Bramley camp with him.

MINIS

7. Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the management information system for Ministers programme in the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. Younger: The MINIS programme has been evolving steadily over the four years since it was introduced into my Department in 1983. It provides Ministers and top management with an overview of organisation, costs and activities throughout the Ministry and the service commands. For the future, and in line with the information requirements of the financial management initiative, we shall be further developing our management information systems to meet the information needs of top management and generally to stimulate a more systematic approach to monitoring the cost-effective use of resources at all levels.

Mr. Forth: I thank my right hon. Friend for that most encouraging reply. What further proposals does he have for linking MINIS with further aspects of the financial management initiative to gain more benefits in efficiency and operational effectiveness?

Mr. Younger: I very much appreciate my hon. Friend's remarks. MINIS has been only loosely linked with other financial management initiatives, staff responsibility budgets and executive responsibility budgets. Proposals are currently under consideration to encourage those management initiatives within a strategic framework spanning the Department.

Ms. Clare Short: May I ask the Secretary of State to include in this review the wastage caused by the out-of-date and unjust rules of the Ministry of Defence that require pregnant women to resign? I understand that, in particular, nurses employed by the Ministry of Defence must resign and therefore lose their seniority when they become pregnant. Is not this regulation out of date and outrageous in this day and age? Surely this regulation should be reviewed in the case of women serving in the Secretary of State's Department.

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the hon. Lady's question. Of course, we review any out-of-date regulations as often as we can. I might point out that ladies in such a position as outlined by the hon. Lady are perfectly free to rejoin the services if they wish.

Mr. Conway: Has the management information system brought to my right hon. Friend's attention the fact that the Territorial Army provides more than 50 per cent. of the 1st British Corps and most of our national defence at less than 4 per cent. of the Army budget? Is that not more than enough justification for the Territorial enhancement programme to which my right hon. Friend must stick?

Mr. Younger: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Last week I was extremely glad to have the opportunity to address the Council of Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Associations and to make some of the points raised by my hon. Friend to it. There is no doubt that the contribution, both in quantity and quality, of the Territorial Army is now an absolutely major factor in the efficiency of the British Army.

Europe (Conventional Defence)

8. Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to meet the Soviet Defence Minister to discuss conventional defence in Europe.

Mr. Younger: I have no plans to meet the Soviet Defence Minister. We are, however, taking an active and positive part in the continuing negotiations on mutual and balanced force reductions dealing with conventional forces, and in the discussions on the mandate for new negotiations on conventional stability.

Mr. Burt: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Although he has no plans to see his counterpart in the Soviet Union, what progress has been made towards establishing at least a basis for future conventional arms reduction talks?

Mr. Younger: The North Atlantic Council communiqué, which was issued in June 1987, repeated the priority that NATO Foreign Ministers attach to agreeing a mandate for new negotiations covering the whole of Europe, from the Atlantic to the Urals. The new negotiations will cover both conventional stability, that is to say lower force levels and further confidence, and security-building measures building upon the Stockholm document of September 1986.

Dr. Owen: Does the Secretary of State support direct negotiations between the NATO and Warsaw Pact organisations, and if not, why not?

Mr. Younger: All the negotiations between East and West take place in different fora according to the subject of the negotiations, as I am sure the right hon. Gentleman knows. Considerable difficulties were faced in finding the right forum for the part of the negotiations that the right hon. Gentleman has in mind, but I believe that they are now resolved and that the discussions can proceed.

Mr. Ward: In any discussions on disarmament, will my right hon. Friend pay especial attention to chemical and biological weapons? Their inclusion in any negotiations is of great importance to the West.

Mr. Younger: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Government have long felt that there should be a complete worldwide ban on all chemical and biological weapons. We are making this a major feature of our suggested negotiating position for all further arms reduction talks.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Is there a common negotiating position within NATO on conventional force reductions? In other words, is NATO in a position to start negotiating? Secondly, will any negotiations in respect of battlefield nuclear weapons be linked to the conventional talks, or dealt with separately?

Mr. Younger: There is clear agreement among the NATO Allies on how to proceed with the talks. We are extremely disappointed, however, that the East has still not responded substantively to the Western proposal of December 1985 to build on areas of agreement between the two sides. Battlefield nuclear weapons will not be addressed in the current INF negotiations, but will be dealt with in subsequent negotiations.

Falkland Islands

9. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the future defence of the Falkland Islands.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Ian Stewart): As announced in the Gracious Speech, the Government will stand by their pledges to the people of the Falkland Islands, while seeking more normal relations with Argentina. We shall continue to maintain a military presence at a level necessary to deter aggression and defend the islands.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Will Ministers regularly inform the House of the progressive fall in the cost of this necessary and righteous commitment? To what extent can the use of the unrivalled training facilities in the Falklands be set against the expense?

Mr. Stewart: I can assure my hon. Friend that we shall keep the House informed in the normal way through the Defence White Paper and other means of our efforts in the Falkland Islands. I endorse what he said about the value of the Falkland Islands in providing training for all our armed forces. We fully appreciate the importance of that.

Mr. Flannery: Would it not help the cause of peace in the Falklands if the Government took a far more vigorous initiative in organising discussions with the Government of Argentina? Does the Minister realise that the position of the Falklands empowers the military caste in Argentina to be a permanent threat to President Alfonsin and the democratic forces in Argentina? It is therefore a matter of real necessity for the preservation of democracy in Argentina for us to take the initiative in discussions about the Falklands.

Mr. Stewart: Relations between the United Kingdom and Argentina are primarily a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary. We want the restoration of normal relations with Argentina, and we hope that in due course they will come about.

Mr. Roger King: Can my hon. Friend confirm that since the construction of the new Falklands airport the cost of defending the Falklands has been reduced accordingly?

Mr. Stewart: It is true that the construction of the Mount Pleasant complex and the airport permits rapid reinforcement and has enabled some reduction in force numbers to be brought about. That has reduced, and will continue to reduce, the cost of maintaining the defence of the islands.

Mr. Ashdown: For how long do the Government intend to persist in their policy of privatising the defence of the Falklands by using Bristow Helicopters and flying foreign-made aircraft to support our armed services? Are the armed services not to be excluded from the Government's obsession with privatisation? Does the Minister not realise the sense of outrage that is felt in constituencies such as mine that are suffering massive job losses because the Government will not provide the helicopters that our armed services need, while providing long-term work for private companies using foreign-made aircraft?

Mr. Stewart: We have provided a large number of new helicopters. The hon. Gentleman made his constituency point. We shall continue to provide our armed forces in the Falkland Islands, and elsewhere, with the equipment that they need.

Trident

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the ordering of a second Trident submarine.

Mr. Sainsbury: We plan to place the order for the second Trident submarine shortly.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Will my hon. Friend confirm that this second submarine, and subsequent submarines, will be at a lower price than the initial purchase? Can he add further to the comments of our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, who, in answer to the first question, spoke about the creation of jobs in Scotland? Is there not also a case for illustrating the enormous impact on employment that that will have elsewhere in the United Kingdom? Can he comment further on the cost of the programme relative to the dollar, because for many months the strong pound appears to have been making the Trident programme cheaper and cheaper?

Mr. Sainsbury: Yes, we would expect the unit priced o follow-on submarines to be lower than that for the SSBN 05. The direct job creation effect of the second Triden order will be about 7,000 jobs, which will be concentrated mainly in the north of England, and, as my right hon Friend said, in Scotland. Only a minority of the total cos reflects the purchase in dollars. Clearly, the stronger the pound against the dollar, the lower the cost in terms o sterling.

Mr. Duffy: Instead of proceeding with this order, would it not be better to equip the lead ship of the type 23 frigate programme with a close-in weapon system, as was confirmed in the press last week? Is not this cheeseparing policy the result of irreconcilable objectives rather than supreme confidence in the effectiveness of the Sea Wolf anti-missile system?

Mr. Sainsbury: The hon. Gentleman should recognise that the policies of one-sided nuclear disarmament that he and his party advocate have been decisively rejected. Therefore, there is no question of cancelling the second order for Trident.

Mr. Franks: Is my hon. Friend aware that the parliamentary constituency of Barrow and Furness was the 326th seat to be won by the Government in the recen election? Is that not a tribute to the workers in the shipyards as well as to the Government's policy o maintaining the nuclear deterrent? If, as I understand, the negotiations for Trident 2 have been concluded, will my hon. Friend ensure that the order is placed speedily without any further delay?

Mr. Sainsbury: The fact that Barrow and Furness was the 326th Conservative victory was also a tribute to my hon. Friend's energetic work on behalf of his constituents He will appreciate that such a major order takes time, but we shall certainly place the order as soon as we can.

Mr. O'Neill: As the Minister has not returned to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe, (Mr. Duffy), will he concede that i is disgraceful that our most modern frigate is leaving the docks in a condition that would render it vulnerable if it had to do any service in the Gulf? Does he not agree that our men are entitled to better protection than that which

Mr. Sainsbury: The hon. Gentleman should appreciate that the prime anti-air attack protection for the frigate is from the vertical launch Sea Wolf system, which is extremely effective. Additional protection, provided by another close-in system, which would add to the cost and the weight of the frigate, would add only little, if any additional protection from an air attack.

Helicopter Manoeuvres

11. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will restrict the extent of armed force helicopter manoeuvres in upland sheep rearing areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: We are advised by the Ministry o Agriculture, Fisheries and Food that there is no evidence that noise from low-flying aircraft has any harmful effect on sheep or lambs, during lambing or at other times. None the less, claims for damage or loss with appropriate supporting evidence are considered sympathetically.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Minister aware that not only low-flying helicopters, but helicopters that land as part of their manoeuvres, have caused abortions in sheep and, therefore, unnecessary losses for farmers? Is he further aware that the RAF locally sometimes has ad hoc agreements with the farmers union to ensure the minimising of such losses? Will he encourage the development of such agreements to keep down the losses for farmers in uplands areas?

Mr. Freeman: Yes, I agree with the hon. Gentleman, and wherever there are ad hoc agreements between the RAF and landowners and farmers I encourage them. There is an adequate compensation scheme, and if the hon. Gentleman writes to me about any particular incident I shall investigate it.

Mr. Key: Will my hon. Friend give particular attention to the problem of heavily used training areas where helicopters are part of that training, such as the Salisbury Plain training area? May I thank him for the eternal courtesy and care with which he and his officials cope with complaints from members of the public on this issue? Will he have a word with our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport about the need to increase controls over microlight aircraft, which are rightly gaining the reputation of being the most unlikely and unhelpful form of recreation?

Mr. Freeman: I shall certainly convey my hon. Friend's comments to the Department of Transport.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Fatchett asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 July.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. I was also present at Victoria station to mark the arrival of the King of Morocco. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with the Prime Minister of Sri Lanka.

Mr. Fatchett: When the Prime Minister said on 27 January 1986, in the middle of the Westland affair, that she did not expect to be Prime Minister by 6 o'clock that evening, what did she mean?

The Prime Minister: That allegation has been made many times. I have nothing further to add to the many statements and replies that I have already given.

Q2. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Howarth: At a time when teachers are widely welcoming the Government's bold reforms in education, and when the fastest growing teachers' union, the Professional Association of Teachers, is urging no-strike agreements on the Secretary of State, is it not utterly disgraceful that a small minority of teachers in England and Wales, although happily not in Staffordshire, are going on strike? Will she condemn that and urge the Secretary of State to introduce his Green Paper as soon as possible?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that teachers' strikes are damaging to the education of children, and in some cases they are meant to do just that. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science will introduce the Green Paper on new permanent machinery for negotiations as soon as possible, and it is expected that that will include the possibility of no-strike agreements.

Mr. Kinnock: When the Prime Minister visits the United States this weekend, will she buy a copy of "Spy catcher"?

The Prime Minister: I thought that the right hon. Gentleman agreed that all members of the security services, present and former, have a duty of confidentiality to the Crown and that he would endeavour to uphold that duty.

Mr. Kinnock: The duty of confidentiality is vital and it must be honoured, but does the Prime Minister seriously think that the best way to uphold it is to take action in appeal courts in Britain and Australia and to engage in action which, with the arrival of every transatlantic airliner, is being turned into high farce?

The Prime Minister: How else does the right hon. Gentleman think that one can enforce a duty of confidentiality, except in a court of law?

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: Has my right hon. Friend had a chance to study the judge's comments following the award of more than £1 million to Mr. Samir Aboul-Hosn, who suffered brain damage? Does she think that this country is in danger of entering into an era of defensive medicine? Does she think that this is the time for a Royal Commission on medical negligence and how it is treated?

The Prime Minister: We have not considered a Royal Commission on medical negligence. The case to which my hon. Friend referred was one in which the courts decided precisely the appropriate damages to be paid. My hon. Friend is aware that we cannot interfere in any way with the decision of the courts, nor, in that case, would we wish to do so. I shall consider further what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Loyden: In view of the Prime Minister's late conversion to a recognition of the crisis in inner cities, will she now consider recent reports which argue that something like £82 billion will be necessary to overcome the problems of the inner cities? Will she therefore revise the Government's non-serious approach on that matter and increase the amounts that will be available next year for local authorities to ensure that inner cities' problems are tackled by the duly democratically elected representatives of the people?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, one of the difficulties in tackling the problems of the inner cities is that some of the elected Left-wing councils are hostile to private enterprise and hostile to the very businesses that can bring in the extra jobs that the cities need so much. With regard to expenditure, this Government have spent more than £2·2 billion since 1979 and that is a very considerable increase in real terms over the expenditure under the previous Administration.

Mr. Page: Is my right hon. Friend aware that if the news regarding the reduction of gas prices or the reduction in unemployment below 3 million, or news of other benefits such as huge profits for British Steel, had come along a few weeks earlier, not only would we have needed an extension to the Tory side of the House, but the opinions polls would have been increasingly irrelevant? Will my right hon. Friend therefore either ban opinion polls at election time or, if not, will she ensure that the statistical base from which those polls are extrapolated is a little more than simply two people per constituency throughout the country?

The Prime Minister: There has been a considerable increase in future confidence in the improvement of the economy as the figures have steadily mounted and people have seen that industry is in a very fit and healthy state. I do not think that anything would be gained by banning opinion polls. I am sure that they would still be taken and they would only be leaked. It is far better that they should be open.

Mr. Steel: When the Prime Minister goes to Washington, will she note the contrast between the democratically elected Congress of the United States currently exposing the existence of a state within a state and her persistent refusal to allow any independent investigation of the quite serious charges raised in Mr. Peter Wright's book about covert operations against a former Prime Minister?

The Prime Minister: I do not answer for the United States, but I ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider which has the more effective security service.

Mr. Ward: Will my right hon. Friend reconsider her reply about the inner cities? Does she agree that the most important step to take for the inner cities is to introduce the community charge so that those who vote will be left with the financial responsibility for the way in which they have cast their vote?

The Prime Minister: Yes. When the community charge is in place and all people properly contribute to the services given by the local authority and for which the local authority is responsible, we shall have much better accountability and that will lead to a much better use of money than at present.

Q3. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Jones: Is the Prime Minister aware of the concern felt in Wales at the lack of resources in health and social services? Is she aware that the budget of Gwynedd health authority has been so stretched that ambulance journeys to clinics have been cut, hitting low-income families? Is she further aware that last week Gwynedd county council social services department had to cut back on home help services, hitting the elderly, sick and disabled? Will she encourage the Secretary of State for Wales to fight in the Cabinet for more resources in those areas?

The Prime Minister: I seem to remember that on a comparatively recent visit to Wales I went to a very new hospital, which was one of five major hospitals in Wales. With regard to health in Wales, from 1979 to March 1988 nearly £500 million will have been invested in the capital estate of the hospital and community health services. Expenditure on the National Health Service in Wales has risen by one third, after allowing for general inflation, between 1979-80 and 1987-88. Between 1979 and 1986 the National Health Service in Wales treated 23·6 per cent more patients than previously.

Mr. Oppenheim: During the course of her busy day, will my right hon. Friend, when considering the Government's economic policy, give close and careful consideration to comments made by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who said that there was a race on between the economic crisis and the general election? Will she also consider the comment by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) that there is no immediate prospect of an economic crisis? How does my right hon. Friend square that apparent disagreement? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is rather wide of the Prime Minister's responsibilities.

Mr. Winnick: Will Customs officials be authorised to take from passengers arriving from the United States copies of Mr. Wright's book? If not, what possible excuse is there for carrying on with the case in Australia? Is the Prime Minister aware that we on the Opposition Benches have no sympathy at all for Wright, a wretched man who is obviously acting out of greed and spite? Is there not now the strongest possible case for a full-scale judicial inquiry into whether MI5 officials carried out subversive and criminal activities against an elected Government in the 1970s?

The Prime Minister: It is technically possible to introduce a ban by amending the open general import licence. My noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has advised his colleagues against such action, because it is likely to be ineffective. However, the question of possible legal action for an account of profits made from publication of the book in the United States is under consideration. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the purpose of the original case was to uphold the duty of confidentiality, which is necessary for the effectiveness of the service.

With regard to the other matter, the hon. Gentleman will recall that I made an extensive statement about it on 6 May 1987.

Mr. Harris: Has my right hon. Friend seen today's report on Trident by the Comptroller and Auditor General? The report states that the estimated cost of that project is likely to be reduced by some £1,500 million. Does that projection not show the wisdom of the Conservative party in sticking to the project? Has my right hon. Friend noticed that the SDP leadership has belatedly come round to supporting Trident?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I saw that figure. It is good news that the price has come down. It is very effective expenditure on a deterrent for this country.

Westland plc

Q4. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will place in the Library a transcript of the television interview on Sunday 7 June with Mr. David Frost in which she referred to the Westland crisis.

The Prime Minister: I understand that a copy of the transcript is available in the Library.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Prime Minister make just one reference to the "many times" when she has said that she knew what she had done as an explanation of why she said that she might not be Prime Minister at 6 o'clock that evening?

The Prime Minister: I have repeatedly told the hon. Gentleman that I have nothing to add. He knows full well that I am here and that I am intending to stay.

Mr. Latham: Did not that television interview, and others over the next two or three days, help to produce an extremely satisfactory result four days later?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Prime Minister take an opportunity today—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has clearly not read the Order Paper. Supplementaries must relate to the main question.

Q5. Mr. Blair asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Blair: Whatever the original purpose of the Government's case against Mr. Wright, now that the book has been published in the United States, is widely read and distributed in every major European capital bar one, and is no doubt available for scrutiny by the Kremlin, why should Britain suffer a unique ban on this book? Is it the nation's security, or the Prime Minister's stubbornness?

The Prime Minister: As I have said many times, Mr. Wright, as a former member of the security services, owes a lifelong duty of confidentiality to the Crown. Most people accept that. Some people wish to undermine it. May I make it clear that this point is essential to the effectiveness of the security service. Some people wish to undermine the security service. On this side of the House, we wish to uphold it.

Q6. Mr. Harry Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Greenway: Further to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth), is my right hon. Friend aware that last year 24,000 teachers left the National Union of Teachers and that thousands of other teachers refused to heed its call to strike — all in the interests of children's education? Does she know that parents as well as a large number of teachers are wholeheartedly behind a no-strike deal for teachers, and will she put on all the pressure that she can to achieve such a deal in our schools?

The Prime Minister: Parents are grateful to those teachers—there are many of them—who refused to go on strike because they put children's education first. I believe that the majority of teachers would welcome a no-strike agreement.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Speaker: I have a brief statement to make. Following the question put last Thursday by the hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) and answered by the Prime Minister, an exchange took place which gave rise to points of order. I made reference to the supplementary question itself, which was disorderly in substantially inviting the Prime Minister to meet the Leader of the Opposition to discuss a matter that went beyond the Government's responsibility.

I undertook to reflect on the appropriate time for taking points of order, and in particular on whether my ruling of 12 February last on this subject needed amendment. Since then I have held some discussions and intend to hold others. At present, I am not minded to make any change and will make no final decision until after my consultations have been completed. In the meantime, I shall continue to deal with points of order in accordance with my ruling of 12 February.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, arising directly from your statement. Will you clarify two things for me? Although I appreciate the difficulty of determining in the heat of argument what is in and out of order, is it not the case that, as happened this afternoon during Question Time, you sometimes rule a question out of order immediately it has been asked? However, on Thursday, after I had asked my supplementary question, you did not rule it out of order and, in those circumstances, my right hon. Friend had no alternative but to give a very full answer.

Secondly, would it have been in order if I had confined my supplementary question on Thursday to asking my right hon. Friend whether she would discuss with the Leader of the Opposition the possible referral to the Procedure Committee——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not prepared to go back over that. I must say to the hon. Gentleman, who kindly wrote to me, that I did not appreciate the thrust of his question while he was asking it. Perhaps I should have done.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When you were elected, you said that you would be the protector of Back Benchers. May I put it to you that a question of ministerial behaviour is involved when those, however exalted, who claim that they have given answers many times and are asked for references to those answers, cannot point in Hansard or anywhere else to where those answers appear? Is this not a matter of parliamentary behaviour and is it not against the traditions of the House for people to claim to have given answers when they have done nothing of the sort?

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid that I am in the dark about that. I do not know to which answer the hon. Gentleman is referring.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Mr. Speaker: No. I think that the hon. Gentleman should come to see me, and I will try to deal with it.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Further to your statement, Mr. Speaker. I presume that it is in order to make a comment or to put a question to you—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I will take Mr. Speaker's ruling. My comment is that your present practice allows Ministers to get away with no questioning of their conduct until an hour, an hour and a half or two hours later. Some of us cannot hang about that long—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call Mr. Faulds—or we may indeed have to hang around a long time.

Mr. Faulds: Some of us, Sir, take our responsibilities extremely seriously and have a whole range of other things to do. My question is simple: would you care to widen your discussions to invite me, the hon. Member for Warley, East, to give you my advice on this matter?

Mr. Speaker: I am happy to receive advice from any hon. Member, especially the hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds). But I think that the whole House agrees that attendance in the Chamber should take precedence over all other matters.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: I will take Mr. Neil Hamilton's point of order.

Mr. Hamilton: I wonder whether you agree that, since the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) was not ruled out of order before my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister rose to reply last Thursday, she was perfectly in order to reply. In view of the fact that the memory of a former Member and member of the Conservative party was so comprehensively besmirched by a member of the Opposition, it was——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that we should go back over what occurred last Thursday.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I seek your guidance? Is it in order for the setting up of departmental Select Committees to be delayed because of the problems encountered by the SDP-Liberal alliance in resolving its problems outside this place——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a matter for me.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is a question not only of the time when points of order are put to you but of the nature of further abuses in the House. You will know that many of us on both sides of the House can be deeply offended by remarks made by hon. Members in the House under the cloak of parliamentary privilege. If you are prepared to rule on the timing of points of order, will you please make a ruling, for the guidance of all hon. Members, that the House enjoys freedom of expression but that, if that freedom is persistently abused by the Opposition, we shall be in grave danger of losing it? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a House in which many uncomfortable things are said. If they are in order, that is within the conventions of the House. All the conventions of the House exist for a good reason and the conventions about maiden speeches also exist for a good reason. The chair can enforce the rules but not the conventions.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take Mr. Banks' point of order.

Mr. Banks: We all appreciate the problems of my hon. Friend the Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) in his attempt to make a theatrical, or indeed political, comeback. The main problem with regard to your statement which I hope you will consider, Mr. Speaker, is that, when an issue is raised on which a point of order subsequently arises, one loses the context because of the delay. On one occasion, when I was grossly offended by a statement by the Secretary of State for the Environment, you would not allow me to raise a point of order at the time, but you subsequently allowed a point of order which was raised after Questions to appear in the Official Report at the point at which the Secretary of State had made the offensive remark. Perhaps, Sir, you might like to consider extending that practice, which might get us round our present problem.

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. All this is what I think the whole House seeks to avoid. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] As to points of order arising out of past events I have already said that I shall consider the matter further. I do not think that there is any profit in going on with it today.

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take Mr. Walker.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I respectfully draw your attention to question No. 10 on the Order Paper. If you read that question, you will see that it deals with the ordering of a second Trident submarine. When you read the Hansard report of the questioning, including the question put from the Opposition Front Bench, you will see that it has nothing whatever to do with Trident but that it is to do with frigates and the equipment on them. When one gets into technical areas, it is difficult for those who do not understand technicalities to remain within order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has put his finger on an important matter, which is that, so often, points of order are raised by those who, unfortunately, were not called at Question Time. I know that the hon. Gentleman was not called on question No. 10 today and his point of order illustrates what occurs if we take points of order arising immediately after Question Time. I made a careful analysis before I made my statement of 12 February. I found that virtually all points of order were raised by those who, unfortunately, had not been called during Question Time; they were not genuine points of order at all.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I first apologise to you for keeping you in the dark and, secondly, raise a matter that affects the House of Commons? The system of open questions has grown up. Frankly, with open questions, it is understandable why a Minister will not give references. I was lucky enough to have a closed question—a specific question. I asked—courteously, I thought—for references. The real answer to the question was, "Because I did not have the foggiest notion whether the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) would spill the beans on me." That is the truthful answer to the question that I asked the Prime Minister. Nevertheless, with substantial questions, should not references be given to those hon. Members who ask specific questions? What on earth could have caused the Prime Minister to have said that she might not be Prime Minister by 6 o'clock? That is a matter——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I can have no responsibility for the answers that are given to questions.

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will take Mr. Holt.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I remind you that, last week, in response to a point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark), you ruled that if male Members appeared in the House without a jacket or tie you would not call them. If your rulings are to be flouted so quickly when you call hon. Members in that way, how can we have standards in the House?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman either was not here or does not read Hansard. I certainly did not say what he has put into my mouth. I said that I never give reasons why I call or do not call hon. Members in the Chamber.

Mr. James Marshall (Leicester, South): On a different point of order, Mr. Speaker. I ask you to investigate whether the Prime Minister intentionally or unintentionally misled the House when——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has just been re-elected to the House, and he will know that no hon. Member intentionally misleads the House of Commons. In any case, answers to questions are not matters for me. I cannot help.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you give the House some guidance on a matter that gave rise to most of this exchange but has now become important in the context of what you said? A moment ago, you referred to the conventions of the House which always have value. You know better than anyone that one of the great conventions of the House is that maiden speakers should be allowed to speak uninterrupted, but on the proviso that their speeches are uncontroversial or non-provocative or do not contain the sort of substance that would normally be subject to challenge from the other side, by way of interventions or, perhaps, points of order.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that during the recent controversial maiden speech in the House my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) sought to intervene precisely because the material in that maiden speech was not only controversial but offensive. The Chair did not allow my hon. Friend to make his intervention on a point of order.

If you, Mr. Speaker, allow maiden speeches to continue to be made which contain offensive or derisory material, but which cannot be challenged, it puts the House and yourself in a difficult position. It puts all hon. Members — particularly Conservative Members, because the offences have come only from the Opposition — in a difficult poisition, and gives rise to many of the difficulties that have arisen.

Will you, Mr. Speaker, give careful consideration to the basis upon which maiden speeches are made in the House, to their content and to the ability of other hon. Members to seek to challenge them while the speech is being made?

Mr. Speaker: I read in Hansard what occurred on that day and what Mr. Deputy Speaker said. Nothing out of order occurred. Mr. Deputy Speaker did not prevent the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) from intervening. It is true that the convention of making non-controversial maiden speeches has a good basis, but if they are controversial they stand to be challenged, and that is exactly what happened. I am certainly not prepared to ask hon. Members to submit their maiden speeches to me first.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I will put together the five motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the draft Meat and Livestock Commission Levy Scheme (Confirmation) Order 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Merchant Shipping (Light Dues) (Amendment No. 2) Regulations 1987 (S.I., 1987, No. 746) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Foreign Compensation (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) (Distribution) Order 1987 (S.I., 1987, No. 663) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Grants by Local Housing Authorities (Appropriate Percentage and Exchequer Contributions) Order 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Bunk Beds (Entrapment Hazards) (Safety) Regulations 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Ryder.]

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I will put together the seven motions relating to European Community documents.

Ordered,

That European Community Documents Nos. 4083/84, 4687/84, 8599/85, 5808/86 and 6213/87 on price indicators for foodstuffs and non-food products be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents.

That European Community Document No. 7194/82 on credit insurance be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents.

That European Community Document No. 9592/86 on hazardous imitation products be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents.

That European Community Document No. 5156/82 on legal expenses insurance be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents.

That European Community Document No. 10443/86 on toy safety be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents.

That European Community Document No. 11063/86 (Part 4) on knitting yarns be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents.

That European Community Document Nos. 8006/86 and 10530/86 on health inspection of meat and poultry meat be referred to a Standing Committee on European Community Documents.—[Mr. Ryder.]

Finance Bill

Considered in Committee

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair]

Ordered,

That the Bill be considered in the following order: Clauses 1 to 17, Schedule 1, Clauses 18 to 57, Schedule 2, Clause 58, Schedule 3, Clauses 59 to 63, Schedule 4, Clauses 64 to 76, Schedule 5, Clauses 77 to 95, Schedule 6, Clause 96, Schedule 7, Clauses 97 to 101, Schedule 8, Clauses 102 to 104, new Clauses, new Schedules, Schedule 9. — [Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Clause 1

INTERPRETATION

3.47 pm

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): I beg to move amendment No. 35, in page 1, line 10, leave out

'or that part of an undertaking'.

The first chapter of the Finance Bill deals with profit-related pay and a number of amendments on the Paper relate to the first 18 clauses. For the convenience of the Committee, I intend to adhere strictly, as no doubt, you Mr. Chairman, would want me to, to the wording of the first amendment and leave a more general debate on profit-related pay and its basic principles to a clause stand part debate.

The amendment would omit from clause 1, line 10, the words

"or that part of an undertaking".

That will define an employment unit as an undertaking to which a profit-related pay scheme relates, not "an undertaking, or that part of an undertaking, to which a profit-related pay scheme relates".

The amendment has been tabled to probe the Government's intentions in defining an employment unit for the purpose of deciding how profit-related pay is to be administered. I raise those particular words because they crop up in many areas of the law, and, indeed, have given rise to considerable and significant legal confusion over the years. Since we are about to administer a large tax relief on the basis of a profit-related pay scheme, it is right that we should be sure of the scope of the profit-related pay scheme so that we can adequately determine the scope of the fiscal incentive towards profit-related pay.

Among the legislation in which the words "part of an undertaking" occur, are the Redundancy Acts and the transfer of undertakings orders which transfer the rights and obligations of employees and employers in certain employment situations where one firm takes over another. I assume—perhaps the Minister will confirm this—that the definition of part of an undertaking is supposed to be the same in the Act as it is in the industrial relations legislation more generally.

I want to give the Minister one or two examples, so that we can see the scope of what is involved. If a firm wants to introduce a profit-related pay scheme, and has its own canteen staff, do such staff form a self-contained unit such that they are part of an undertaking? For example, would the clerical side of a firm, as opposed to the shop floor shide, form a part of an undertaking? In other words, there are certain legal cases in relation to the industrial relations laws in which part of an undertaking is sometimes defined as a self-contained part—in the sense that it could even have its own profit and loss accounts. Presumably that would not arise in relation to the clerical side of a firm; could it be included? If so, could that apply merely to the white collar staff and not to the shop floor staff? What are the requirements that go to make up the definition of "part of an undertaking"? Has consideration been given to that? Is the Treasury satisfied that no one will be excluded from the ambit of the profit-related pay schemes by an over-tight definition of an undertaking or part of an undertaking?

We intend to vote against the general principle of profit-related pay and a fiscal incentive, but it is important that if we are to have profit-related pay, it is accepted on a clear basis and no-one is excluded from the ambit of profit-related schemes who should properly be within it, once the initial principle is accepted. I hope that I have adequately canvassed the difficulties that we foresee. I stress that this is a probing amendment that is designed to secure an explanation from the Government.

The Paymaster General (Mr. Peter Brooke): It may be helpful if I refer to the general subject that the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has raised. In the design of our PRP proposals, we have sought, wherever it is consistent with policy objectives, to build in as much flexibility as possible. One choice that we are allowing employers to make when preparing their PRP schemes is the nature of the employment unit. We recognise that some employers will want to have a single scheme covering the whole enterprise under which PRP is related to the profits of the whole, be it a company or group of companies, a partnership or other unincorporated business. Any employer who makes that choice may do so because he considers that his employees are likely to be better motivated if they are identified with the business as a whole. He may conclude in any event that, in his own circumstances, there would be particular disadvantages or difficulties in breaking the business down into profit centres, each with it own profit and loss account prepared in accordance with paragraphs 19 and 20 of schedule 1.

On the other hand, some businesses already operate on a basis that provides a measure of autonomy at a level lower than the whole business. They find particular advantages in such decentralisation and we have therefore provided that the employment unit need not be the whole group, company or business but can be a sub-unit of any of those. We recognise that in some businesses employees see themselves as belonging to a particular part of a business. That may be one division or even one factory. It is right that if profit figures that meet the statutory requirements can be produced for that part of the undertaking it should be permissible for that unit to be an employment unit with its own PRP scheme. It would be wrong to require that each company in a group had to belong to a group scheme despite the fact that each company made a different product and that each employee thought of himself—and was encouraged to think of himself—as employed by his own company rather than by the group.

The tax relief that we are providing is intended to encourage the widespread adoption of PRP schemes. In our judgment, removing the choice of size of employment unit would deter some employers from adopting PRP; but the essential condition, about which the hon. Member for Sedgefield asked, is the requirement that a unit should have its own profit and loss account prepared in accordance with paragraphs 19 and 20 of schedule 1.

Mr. Blair: I am grateful to the Minister for his reply. I am attempting to be helpful and to do that I need to probe a little further. Some units of an undertaking might be colloquially thought of as self-contained and would not have their own separate profit and loss account. The canteen or clerical staff in a company might not have profit and loss accounts but could form self-contained parts. The reason for our amendment is to probe whether the Government have given sufficient thought to the definition of "part of an undertaking". These words are widely used in industrial relations legislation and have given rise to considerable confusion. The Government should be clear about their legislative intent, or they will find that companies will be unduly restricted in bringing in these schemes.

Mr. Brooke: It may be helpful if I respond further to the hon. Gentleman's remarks. I should add to what I said earlier that the Bill has no specific relationship to other legislation. There is no natural read-across but, as I said before, the touchstone will be the employer's ability to produce a profit and loss account for an employment unit of the undertaking. The hon. Gentleman used the example of canteen staff. If the employer can produce accounts it is for him to make an application for a scheme. The hon. Gentleman will know from reading the rest of the legislation that it requires 80 per cent. employee participation, although I think the hon. Gentleman has another amendment about that.

Mr. Blair: Again I am grateful to the Minister. Perhaps I could ask him to give this matter further consideration. I do not think that it is a matter of controversy between us. I appreciate what he says, that these are different parts of the legislation, but I can tell him, and no doubt his advice will be to the effect, that the words in this statute will be defined and construed by a court in the same way as words are interpreted in other pieces of legislation. Therefore, the industrial relations definitions in the redundancy and transfer of undertakings regulations about an undertaking and part of an undertaking will be the same.

Situations can arise in which it is not possible to produce a separate profit and loss account but in which one could think in colloquial terms of a self-contained part of an undertaking. It may be worth paying some further attention to this to ensure that certain parts of undertakings will not be excluded from the ambit of these profit-related pay schemes. I can think of examples in my own constituency where for parts of a factory floor it would be impossible to produce a profit and loss account. However, they might well respond in different ways to a profit-related pay scheme. I ask the Minister to at least give some further attention to this. Otherwise, there will be difficulties that we both want to avoid. Subject to that, I am prepared to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Brooke: The issue that the hon. Gentleman raises was, of course, considered during the fairly lengthy gestation period that led up to this legislation. I repeat that a scheme employer will need to make an application to the board of Inland Revenue and that one of the conditions that he must satisfy under this legislation in order to be registered is the production of a separate profit and loss account. That of itself will be a determining factor.

Mr. Blair: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: As I said when I spoke to the previous amendment, the debate on clause 1 is an appropriate time to have a debate on the principle of profit-related pay and whether it is in our interests to accept as a whole the scheme that the Government intend to introduce. Profit-related pay has been much discussed among academics, and various representations were made to the Government when they first mooted this scheme. The advantages and disadvantages can be said to be in some sort of balance. We cannot be certain that the balance of advantage comes down on one side or the other.

The Bill will introduce tax relief on profit-related pay for up to one fifth or £3,000 of an employee's wage—whichever is the lower—provided that that part of the wage is paid on the basis of the employer's profits. Will the Minister confirm that the effect would be to give up to £20 a week tax-free to a person who wished to take up the full benefit of the scheme? Such a person would be likely to be a senior executive or manager, although in these days he might be working on the shop floor. At first blush, that £20 a week tax cut would be given to the person taking the maximum benefit for doing no extra work whatever. It would go straight into that person's hand; he would have produced nothing more and done no extra work.

I may be wrong, but it seems to me also that it could be possible for the £3,000 to be taken off the top rate of tax so that the person's tax relief could be greater, but at any rate a person who took the maximum could receive up to £20 a week tax-free.

The cost of the proposal has been estimated in various ways by academic bodies as well as the Treasury. The Treasury says that the costs for the full year 1988-89 will be about £50 million, but by then the scheme will just be starting up. Sam Brittan, writing in the Financial Times about the earlier limit of £1,000, thought that the cost could be anything up to £850 million to £950 million per year if profit-related pay were taken up on a large scale. Saul Estrin, writing in The Guardian, reckoned that the cost could be anything up to £1,000 million per annum. I think that it is accepted on all sides that, if profit-related pay is taken up on the scale that the Government wish, considerable fiscal incentives will attach to it. It is clear beyond argument—the Treasury accepts this—that we are talking about a fiscal incentive that could be worth hundreds of millions of pounds.

Therefore, before we accept the benefits of profit-related pay, we need to be sure that the scheme represents the best way of obtaining the benefits the Treasury seeks. Basically, the Government make three claims for profit-related pay. The first is that it would encourage a greater identification between workers and management; in other words, that it would eradicate what is popularly called the "them and us" attitude. The second claim is that employees will not be made redundant in times of recession. They will simply take lower wages because of lower profits, and unemployment will thus be avoided. The third claim is that the marginal cost to the employer of hiring staff will be diminished because the profit-related pay element will mean that, as more workers are hired, the profits will simply be spread more thinly. Therefore, it will be in the interests of management to hire more staff and produce more goods. As I remarked on Second Reading, that theory is propounded by Professor Weitzman of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Let me take each of those claims in turn and add some further objections. When the Financial Secretary replied to my Second Reading speech, he said, I thought rather unkindly, that I had barely mentioned the Bill. In fact, I find that my remarks on profit-related pay run to two or three columns of Hansard. I did not get an answer to any of my points, so I must apologise if I appear to be repeating myself.

The Government argue that there will be greater identification between workers and management. In its submission to the Government, the Institute of Personnel Management said, with some justification:

> "Profit-related pay is just one, and in our view, not particularly good, method of introducing flexibility into pay structures and it hardly seems equitable to grant it tax relief that is denied to other, perhaps better, approaches, like output-related productivity schemes or merit pay."

That is an important point. We tend to be given the idea that profit-related pay schemes have some magic attendant upon them and that they are different from other schemes. In fact, profit-related pay is a sophisticated form of bonus payment: the more profit there is, the more pay an employee gets. In that respect the scheme is not dissimilar from a bonus productivity scheme, which gives the equivalent identification between management and work force and thus provides the essential ingredient of removing the "them and us" attitude. As the Institute of Personnel Management asked, why should profit-related pay be singled out for a tax incentive? I would be grateful if the Minister would deal with that point.

The Institute of Personnel Management and the British Institute of Management made a further point. The main purpose of the profit-related pay scheme is said to be to reduce unemployment. It is very difficult to understand how the best way of reducing unemployment can be to give what could be up to £500 million to £1,000 million-worth of tax incentives for profit-related pay. There could be many better ways of spending that sum of taxpayers' money to secure a reduction in unemployment or an increase in employment. On 27 October last year, the Financial Times reported that there was no hard evidence to suggest that the profit-related pay scheme represented a good method of reducing unemployment. We are entitled to ask the Government whether they have hard evidence or empirical studies to suggest that profit-related pay will reduce unemployment, because that macroeconomic argument lies at the heart of their claims.

Given that there are to be fiscal incentives, a further point arises. Treasury Ministers have been telling us for years that, if something is to be given away, someone must pay for it. The truth is that the general body of taxpayers will pay for profit-related pay. It will be particularly inequitable because, on the highest estimates that I have seen, 12 million workers—half the work force—will be covered by the profit-related pay scheme. That means that approximately half the work force will not be covered, and the public sector accounts for most of that. The public sector, in particular will have to finance the tax relief for the private sector schemes eligible for profit-related pay.

On the identification of managers and workers, we have also to consider the whole question of employee share ownership plans. These have been used effectively in the United States and are being pioneered in this country by Unity Trust, the trade union banking institution. It is difficult to understand why profit-related pay should be singled out. When the British Institute of Management considered the employment-creating potential of profit-related pay, it said that nearly 47 per cent. of its respondents thought that the pressures to limit recruitment and investment would not be easily resisted. In other words, almost half of those responding to the British Institute of Management survey said that, so far from increasing employment, the profit-related pay scheme would limit recruitment and investment.

The reason is not difficult to find. This was highlighted by Professor Meade, who is an acknowledged expert on these matters and to whom I pay attention, despite the fact that he is an adviser to the SDP. There seems to be a good deal of truth in his view that a profit-related pay scheme means that those already employed by a company will have a vested interest in resisting further recruitment because it will spread the jam more thinly. If more workers are taken on, the proportion of the profit going to each worker will be diminished. Professor Meade therefore suggested a different scheme, in which a distinction was made between insiders and outsiders coming in, the latter receiving a lower return in profit-related pay.

The marginal cost of hiring workers may be reduced for the employer, but existing employees will have an interest in resisting further recruitment so as to maximise their own slice of the profits. It may be argued that management rules and will wish to take advantage of the lower marginal cost of hiring staff, but despite some people's fantasies about the way in which firms are run, most of us appreciate that in the majority of firms there is a fairly common identity between workers and management. The "them and us" attitude can be overplayed, and the notion that workers and management will automatically take opposing views seems highly academic and unreal. In reality, management and workers—whether unionised or not—will consider the matter together.

It should be remembered, too, that managers are not precluded from participating in the scheme. Indeed, they will almost certainly be involved in it, so both they and the shop floor will have a community of interest in resisting further recruitment. At the very least, therefore, it is difficult to see how anyone can state with certainty that profit-related pay will reduce unemployment, because there is a clear counterweight to that proposition.

Finally, it is argued that in a recession a profit-related pay scheme will mean that workers will take a smaller share of the profit rather than being made redundant, but I am not entirely sure that it will work like that in practice. People might well go for voluntary redundancies so as to keep the same amount of profit per worker. Moreover, from the Government point of view it is not even clear that the results that they claim will be desirable. If profits are reduced and a firm gets into difficulties, it may not necessarily be a good thing to stagnate the work force in that way. Looking at the macro-economy as a whole, the only effect of profit-related pay in a recession is to produce wage cuts. That is not a novel proposition. It was tried in the 1930s and it failed. The recession then becomes deeper. I am therefore not persuaded that profit-related pay is the panacea that it is claimed to be.

Before agreeing to the introduction of such a potentially large fiscal incentive as would be involved, therefore, we must be extremely sure that we are going down the right route. We are far from convinced that it will diminish unemployment or increase investment. We are also not convinced that it will deal with the underlying problems of the economy. In particular, we are totally unpersuaded that this is the best way to spend the potentially very large sums involved.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): In my view, the speech of the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) was thorougly dull, unimaginative, negative stuff.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): You have not heard anything yet.

Mr. Tim Smith: I cannot wait to hear the contribution of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). We have just heard the spokesman from the Opposition Front Bench pouring cold water on what he claims others — presumably the Government — have described as a panacea. No one has described profit-related pay as a panacea, but it is one of a number of measures that could help reduce inflexibility in the labour market. Various schemes with the same objective are already in place, including employee share schemes and the Finance Act 1978 and other schemes which seek to bring together workforce and management.

It was good to hear from the Labour party spokesman that there is not a great divide or a "them and us" situation in industry, as Labour Members generally spend most of their time playing on that. Nevertheless, in some companies there are divisions and we need to bring the two sides together. Profit-related pay, with other schemes, could go some way towards that, because employees who participate will take a new interest in the overall profitability of the company. The argument for greater identification is thus an important one and I certainly find it attractive.

4.15 pm

With regard to the argument that there will be fewer redundancies, I am not sure that the hon. Member for Sedgefield has any experience in industry but when wage costs become excessive there are very few solutions available. At present, employers simply cut the number of employees by 5 per cent., 10 per cent. or whatever percentage is deemed necessary to keep the company afloat. Redundancy is a very blunt, crude instrument to deal with the problem and I should not have expected the Labour party to find it attractive. If a tax-related scheme goes some way to meeting the difficulty and providing other possibilities for employers in that situation, I should have thought that it would be welcome.

It was interesting to hear the various figures suggested for the cost of the scheme. They varied from £50 million by the Treasury to about £1,000 million by Sam Brittan, who apparently commented before the relief was made more attractive. If the take-up is anything like as big as that, the scheme will be a runaway success because it will mean that every eligible company is taking part. I do not believe that the costs will be anywhere near £1,000 million, but I believe that the experiment is worth trying. No one claims that the scheme will be an overnight success, but many companies have already expressed interest in it. If it encourages employees to take a greater interest in the overall welfare of the company or of the part of the company in which they work, I believe that we should pursue it. I shall therefore support clause 1 and the following clauses.

Mr. Ronnie Fearn (Southport): My question to the Minister relates to the incentive aspect of the scheme. The alliance is basically in favour of the scheme and will support it. To provide an incentive to set up the administrative and negotiating machinery needed to begin such a scheme and to promote its beneficial effects, would it not be wise to provide for a rebate of employer national insurance contributions, not just on the qualifying profit-related pay but on the basic pay? Employers will be looking for such an incentive. If the Minister can show that it exists, we shall fully support the clause.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I do not know a great deal about the scheme, but I have read Professor Weizman's book — I occasionally read items of SDP literature — with great interest and attended his meeting in the House of Commons. Prior to that, I had thought that profit-related pay was something to do with the Ayatollah Khomeini.

I was not immediately attracted to the scheme by the way in which it was presented by the Government. Clearly, anyone in his right mind is sympathetic to a proposal that will produce greater involvement by workers in their firms and greater identification with the future of those firms, but we must ask whether the proposed scheme is the best way to bring about the identification that we all wish.

The principle has widespread support. The problem is whether this proposal is the best way of serving that principle. Therefore, it is unrealistic to brush aside the objections in the way that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) has sought to do. The question is whether, by spending a similar amount of money or even less money — the amount that we will spend has not been measured — we could get even greater benefits and produce the identification that is wanted by all sides of the House.

The idea within the proposal springs from a half-baked analysis of the reasons for Japanese industrial success. The Japanese firms that were considered are the biggest, those that dominate a third of the economy. The smaller firms have not been considered yet it is from those that all the sacrifices are demanded when economic difficulties arise. What we are discussing is the identification between workers and management in the biggest firms that dominate a third of the Japanese economy. The argument is that, in times of economic difficulties, Japanese workers are prepared to take cuts in pay. That is true. It has been a formula for success in Japan. However, that formula for success exists because Japanese firms accept responsibility for the workers on a far wider scale than British firms.

In Japan, indentification and commitment can be built up because firms are prepared to carry the workers through lean times. They are prepared to take risks, to diversify, to provide the work force with the real bond of identification — a successful company. The bond of identification is provided by a company that is going places and one that is attempting to provide a future for its workers. Therefore, the whole system is much more integrated than in Britain. It is unrealistic to take one aspect — wage and salary cuts in times of economic difficulty — and ask how we can achieve that in the United Kingdom.

The Government believe that the answer is profit-related pay. They believe that that will provide the formula for success that has been used by Japan in the past. That idea is totally unrealistic and half-baked. Either we accept the total commitment of firms to workers or we accept that the present proposal is inadequate.

Although we support the principle of involvement, it is perfectly reasonable for us to raise doubts about the way in which the principle is propounded in this country. The true aim of this measure is to cut earnings. I believe that this is a proposal from a Government that have run out of solutions for Britain's economic difficulties. The Government's economic policies have ground to a halt and they are seeking a new beginning. They are clutching at straws. In the 1970s, when the Conservatives had run out of ideas, they clutched at the work of one American economist. Lo and behold, along came Friedman and all the disasters that followed. Now, the Government are clutching at another American economist, Weizman and suggesting that he holds the key. This proposal accords with a deep and distinctive prejudice on the Tory Benches — to cut wages and earnings.

The Government speak with two tongues. In the run-up to the election it was useful that earnings and wages were increasing ahead of inflation. Indeed, I remember the mysterious advertisement with 23 reasons for voting Conservative — the Conservatives dredged round, but all they could get were 23 reasons, not even 24 and indeed, most of those were wrong — and one of those reasons was that earnings had increased by 26 per cent. or 24 per cent. — the figures are not important. The fact was that earnings had increased ahead of inflation. Then, of course, it was a cause for congratulation and a useful weapon to win the election. Now, it has become an anathema.

Our costs, inflation rate and earnings are increasing faster than most of our competitors. For that reason, it makes it incomprehensible that the Government are now trying desperately to peg the exchange rate to the deutschmark. The Government are attempting to join the European monetary system without declaring for the EMS. The Government have said that the pound will be held to 2·80 or 3 DM. The Government's decision to peg the pound means that every time our inflation increases ahead of our competitors — each day it edges ahead of our competitors — the real exchange rate, given that the nominal exchange rate has been pegged in that fashion, increases. Our real exchange rate is now 10 per cent. up on what it was last October. We are gradually squeezing our competitors——

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. We are a long way away from profit-related pay.

Mr. Mitchell: I am glad that you have brought me back, Mr. Walker. I was arriving at my point via West Germany — a most interesting excursion. However, my point was germane.

In the Government's eyes the reason for the proposal is that it holds down wages. That is why the Government are so enthusiastic about it. However, I must point out that, if the Government are, at the same time, holding down the exchange rate as wages go up, they will be putting British industry in a squeeze that will remove the last vestige of our competitiveness and strangle British industry. Therefore, there will not be any profits to be distributed as a result of the profit-related pay proposal. If competitiveness is eroded in this manner, profits will go out the window. However, at your behest, Mr. Walker, I shall return to the argument.

This proposal is not what the Chancellor had in mind when he set out to be the great reforming Chancellor when he took over the office in 1983. Then, he wanted to be a tax reformer and wished to make the whole system neutral. This proposal does not represent neutrality. A fairly large tax concession has been produced, but the extent of that tax concession is unknown. The estimate of the cost of the scheme for 1988-89 has been put at £50 million, but the Treasury has accepted that the final cost could be substantially greater.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has already said, Sam Brittan estimated in the Financial Times that the final cost could be £800 million. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield was wrong when he suggested that Sam Brittan put the final cost at £1 billion. It was The Guardian that estimated that the final cost would be £1 billion, so it must be true. The Guardian's assessment is more realistic than that contained in the Financial Times. However, whether the cost is £800 million or £1,000 million it is far greater than the estimates we have had from the Government or from the Treasury.

We are signing a blank cheque for a proposal that is not neutral in the manner in which the Chancellor set out to be neutral. There are far better ways of spending this money for the purposes of the economy—for instance, on job creation. However, for a Chancellor who wants to encourage identification between workers and firms there are far more effective ways of spending this money.

We must also consider whether firms, given their ability under this scheme to cut wages, will keep jobs. It is interesting to consider what the Government are now putting forward as this country's future. Will we face a situation in which firms, having already shed 28 per cent. of manufacturing jobs in the period 1979-83, and gone through that bloodbath, will, in all probability, shed more jobs in the future? Is this the future that the Government are preparing for us?

Are the Government saying that, in the years ahead, the economy, under their management, will be so difficult that there will be a great need for firms to face the choice between shedding labour or keeping labour on lower earnings? If that is to be the future, it is rather different from the one that the Government were projecting before the general election, which took place only a few weeks ago. During the election campaign, the Conservative party offered a future of almost limitless expansion, with the British economy competing effectively with the German economy. The picture that the Government have presented is entirely unrealistic and I am sure that the Government are right when they say now that economic difficulties lie ahead. I am sure that that will be the position under their management.

4.30 pm

Old habits do not change overnight. If we find ourselves in economic difficulties, firms will shed everything that can be thrown overboard. That has happened in the past and it will happen again. Everything that makes for non-price competitiveness will be thrown out, including research, design work, investment and labour. If life becomes difficult economically, the old bloodbath will be repeated, and a profit-related pay system will not obviate the need, as some perceive it, for that to happen. That will be the position if economic difficulties develop, and I am sure that they will.

I do not wish to appear churlish in my response to profit-related pay, but it is the responsibility of the Opposition to ask the necessary questions. Our questions are a reaction to the high hopes that the Government have reflected in their propagation of the scheme. If the Government are selling the scheme as an answer to the economic difficulties that they will create in future, they have a responsibility to ensure that the prospects that they are presenting will become reality.

The scheme has been oversold, as monetarism was oversold in the 1970s. There has been overselling by the Social Democratic party and the Liberal party, which have seen the scheme as a substitute for an economic policy. The Government have taken it on for the same reason.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): At the beginning of his remarks the hon. Gentleman said that there was a real interest across the Floor of the Chamber in trying to relate the interests of employees with those of their employers within their place of work. Unfortunately, the hon. Gentleman has not advanced any of the new thinking of the Labour party to explain how this will be achieved. Instead, he is attacking the Government. Does he intend to end his speech with some positive and constructive proposals?

Mr. Mitchell rose

The Chairman of Ways and Means: Order. If the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) were to take up the invitation of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), I would have to remind him that we are discussing profit-related pay within the terms of clause 1.

Mr. Mitchell: It is interesting to hear that there is new thinking going on in the Labour party as against the over-acting and over-emoting that is taking place within the alliance. It is surely possible to say on the basis of rational calculation that clause 1 is not the best approach to implementing and encouraging the greater involvement that we all wish to see. It is true that the Government see involvement as share options that are focused on top management and on the board of directors, but we want involvement within firms, which means democracy, consultation and giving unions and workers a legitimate place in the decision making that takes place within a firm. It involves also the profit-sharing proposals that Liberals have advanced for years and which were implemented only by a Labour Government during 1977-78, when the first great advance in that direction was made. I support the concept and I am sympathetic to it. I am merely saying that that is the right road and the way forward, and not the one that the Government have overpraised and for which they have made too many claims. The Government's scheme will not live up to the prospects that have been held out for it to us. It is characteristic of a Government and an alliance who have run out of ideas.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): Having listened to the hon. Members for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) and for Great

[Mr. John Redwood]

Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), I feel that the Opposition have run out of problems to allege that the Government are running into and not that the Government have run out of solutions to problems. It is extraodinary that profit-sharing pay should be represented as a scheme to cut wages. It is a scheme to allow employees to participate in the success of their enterprise. Profits are rising substantially because demand is good and because industrialists and those in commerce are responding to that demand. There are profits, and if the scheme is introduced employees will be better off. I am staggered that Opposition Members wish to deny people the opportunity to participate in such a scheme.

The Opposition tell us that a different lesson should be drawn from the Japanese experience than the one that the Government have presented. The Opposition always take a selective view of the Japanese experience. They focus on the few large firms at the top of the Japanese economy that account for about 20 per cent. of output and activity and not on the 80 per cent. that is represented by small and medium-sized enterprises in a highly competitive environment without the many protections that are accorded to the privileged few who work in the large companies at the top. I think that the Opposition would be well advised to study the Japanese economy rather more thoroughly before drawing hasty conclusions from the Japanese experience.

The Opposition tell us that it would be better to offer tax relief for merit pay than to introduce profit-related pay. Merit pay is a scheme that enables individual managers to say to individuals within the work force, "You are worth this much extra and you are not." Accordingly, a manager would have tremendous power and control over individual employees or groups of employees under that scheme. Is that really what the Opposition wish to write into the statute book? Do they not accept that merit pay would be difficult for the Treasury to control? Without firm limits it would be possible to allege that all parts of an individual's remuneration were related in some way to his merit. It would be extremely difficult to tie the net tightly around such a scheme to ensure that judgment was not involved. One of the advantages of profit-related pay is that it is relatively easy for those who frame legislation to produce a scheme that does not allow people to bend the rules too often or too regularly.

I am delighted that the Opposition now understand the value of employee share option-type schemes. They should do a little more homework, however, because the ESOP schemes in the United States of America have produced many drawbacks for the employees who have been part of them who wish to change their jobs or who find that values are problematic when they come to value their stake when there is no ready market.

I hope that the Government will introduce more proposals in the next Budget to strengthen share ownership for all employees in all companies. I hope, however, that they will not introduce a simple clone of the ESOP scheme. Instead, we should have a good British scheme that does not have the weaknesses and injustices that ESOPs perpetrate on employees.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The contributions from the Opposition Benches of the hon. Members for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) and for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) were united only in their deep conservatism. Their diagnosis of the condition of British industry and companies produced different results. The hon. Member for Sedgefield, who spoke from the Opposition Front Bench, alleged that there was no problem to be dealt with, because British firms were united and that it was artificial to talk about bringing forward a scheme to deal with the "them and us" problem. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby claimed that the position was entirely opposite to that, and that firms were so divided and managers so remote from the interests of their employees that they could not proceed along the lines of Japanese companies. It seems that there is a need for Labour Members to get together to try to work out a common approach to these problems. They do not speak with one voice.

Profit-related pay is not a panacea for industrial relations difficulties. I should be interested to know why the Institute of Personnel Management took the view that it did. Is it defending its members' interests? Does it think that the only way to overcome management problems is through its beneficent intervention? I find its unsubstantiated arguments rather unpersuasive. The reality is that profit-related pay is not advanced as a means of resolving industrial relations difficulties or as a means of tackling unemployment. It is not a back-door method of reducing pay. It is a system that relates rewards to the returns of a business, which seems to be a profoundly sensible approach. Indeed, if one puts that proposition conversely — that pay should be unrelated to profit — the ridiculousness of opposition to that suggestion becomes obvious.

I should like to ask the Government a more factual question about take-up. There have been suggestions that the scheme might cost about £50 million per annum from the Treasury, which seems a modest amount. If that were to be the case, will the Government reveal some of their premises about the extent of take-up? How many firms and employees do they envisage as being affected in the first years that the scheme is in operation? That is an important question because of the range of estimates that have been canvassed in the debate and outside the House.

The wilder suggestions by the hon. Member for Sedgefield on Labour's Front Bench have not been supported by the Government. However, I should be happier if the figures were somewhat more substantial than those that have come from the Treasury because they are not altogether satisfactory if this is purely a token scheme.

As I said on Second Reading, the scheme seems an attractive idea. Not only would it offer encouragement to the employees through tax relief: it would also encourage the employers to go through the complexities of establishing the schemes and participating in the negotiations that will be necessary to make those schemes a success. I am not sure that the somewhat abstract advantages that the Government have deployed in support of their view that the employers will find the scheme attractive are sufficient, in practice, to make many take the initiative in setting up profit-related pay schemes.

If one took only the evidence of the inquiries that have been made, it would be quite encouraging. I understand that between 50,000 and 60,000 inquiries have been made of the Inland Revenue. However, those are initial probing inquiries to see what lies behind the scheme. Therefore, we cannot assume that those inquiries will necessarily be followed up by firm commitments to introduce the schemes. Perhaps the Minister can give us a little more information about the premises upon which the Treasury has based its estimate of the expected take-up.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): I rise briefly to urge my hon. Friend the Paymaster General not to accept the amendment. I understand the argument of the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). On the question of cost, the figures that he gave were roughly between £50 million and, at the top limit, £100 million, but one must consider net cost and the real cost that will affect the Inland Revenue. One hopes that, with such a scheme, activity, enterprise and productivity will increase. Therefore, profit will increase and the corporation tax take will increase in total. In his speech—I am afraid that I had to leave at the end of it—the hon. Gentleman asked for empirical evidence. Surely the evidence of the past two years, and of the past year especially, is that, despite decreasing the income tax rate, the total income tax take has increased. I hope that that will happen with this scheme.

On the relationship between profit-related pay and bonuses, it is important for people to see the clear identification between them. This scheme would be strictly related to profit, whereas a bonus is often related to merit and sometimes involves quite a large element of subjective judgment. However, this scheme hits a different section of the market than do bonuses and would play, therefore, an important part in motivation. It would be in the interests only of the management or of the group concerned to ensure that it is successful and that it has a motivating, as opposed to a demotivating, effect.

Therefore, I urge my hon. Friend not to accept this amendment. I know that it is a probing amendment and I do not mean to be hostile in saying this, but I feel that my points are relevant.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): I wish to take up the remarks of Opposition Members about the benefit, or the denial to the rest of the community of the benefit, of individual profit-related pay schemes. Perhaps we shall have an opportunity later to discuss the omission of the public sector from the proposals, which we understand, and on which hon. Members have already commented. It would be dangerous and churlish—perhaps characteristically churlish of certain hon. Members—to assume that, just because the benefits of such a proposal are not available to everyone—either as a matter of choice, definition or exclusion—the scheme would not, benefit the community.

4.45 pm

My belief, which is based on study and work that I have completed over a number of years and on my continuing interest in the subject, is that the introduction of profit-related pay could be of positive benefit to the economy. Therefore, it is directly of benefit to those who participate in it. Equally, it is indirectly of benefit to those in the public and private sectors who are not signed up on the scheme. It is in that spirit that I add my support to the proposals and hope that they will form the basis of a new look at the way in which we give new life and further stimulation to the expansion of our economy.

Mr. Brooke: I rise to respond to the debate which, I advise my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) is on clause 1 stand part, rather than on the amendment. It may be easiest if I respond in the order in which various points were made, which means that I begin with the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair).

The hon. Member raised a specific arithmetical question at the beginning, in the context of £3,000 or £20 a week. To make certain that there is common cause between us and that we are singing from the same hymn sheet, I advise him that profit-related pay would of course apply to half that figure. The application would be on the basis of £1,500 and if a person is on the top rate of tax, we should be talking about a figure of £20 a week. Profit-related pay would not apply to all the £3,000 because the relief is available on only half that figure.

In answer to his question about a specific individual who is on that income—such a person would need to be on a particular salary level for that to apply—the hon. Gentleman knows that the purpose of the scheme is to embrace, in principle, all the people in a particular employment unit, provided that that is above the 80 per cent. figure that is required for qualification.

The purpose of the scheme is to stimulate commitment to the activities of the business on the part of the entire work force and to stimulate also their interest in its profitability. It would be wrong to generalise in any way about specific experience, but, having been profit-accountable for a business for 18 years, having lived in a profit-related environment during those 18 years, and having seen the payroll for which I was responsible in that capacity rise a thousandfold in cash terms during that period, I am conscious that one can achieve a community of endeavour in a business in which there is a relationship to profitability in the pay of those involved.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield went on to ask me about costs. As the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said, the hon. Gentleman was referring specifically to the quotation that appeared in The Guardian. Cost will obviously depend on take-up. The incidence of costs in financial years will depend on the growth over time in the number of employees who are covered by registered schemes, and by the amount of profit-related pay that they receive. There will be a lead time before new schemes can be operational and it is expected that costs will grow over time. Therefore, on that count alone, the estimate given in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" of a negligible cost in 1987-88, and a cost of £50 million in 1988-89, cannot reflect the costs in the long term. I am the first to acknowledge that.

The incidence of costs between years will depend also on the pattern of take-up between the schemes that make profit-related payments continuously, perhaps with weekly or monthly payments, and those that pay sums less frequently. As the schemes must be registered in advance of the start of the first profit period for which tax relief profit-related pay will be paid, and as firms are likely to align profit-related pay periods with their normal accounting periods, the start date of the accounting periods among the participating firms will also affect the pattern of cost between the financial years.

For those reasons, the cost in 1988-89 is also likely to underestimate annual costs in the long term. If 2 million employees taking 10 per cent. of their pay as profit-related pay, for example, were covered by registered schemes by the end of 1988-89, the full annual tax costs would be about £300 million, but costs in 1988-89 would be much less, as many of the schemes would not make payments until the following year or later. Long-term costings must be highly speculative and if the tax relief cost is high, it will be because there has been a valuable major change for the better in our pay systems. A tax relief which secured that would be money well spent.

An intention of the legislation, to which the hon. Member for Sedgefield also referred, is that of greater identification, to which I have in part alluded from my personal experience. He asked about the circumstances where there was a downturn in a business and asked about the marginal cost involved. I noted that the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) drew attention to the difference of opinion between the hon. Members for Sedgefield and for Great Grimsby, about employee identification. I do not want, the words of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby, to oversell the issue of a downturn, but imagine a business in which labour costs account for 70 per cent. of value added. Let us say that profit-related pay is 10 per cent. of labour costs which makes it 7 per cent. of value added. I find it inconceivable that it is not helpful to that business to have that margin of 7 per cent. flexibility, that it will not give some room for manoeuvre on output prices if input prices rise, and that that manoeuvring with output prices will not help to sustain output. It goes without saying that profit-related pay could be a higher proportion of pay than that, which would give more flexibility. The benefits are not just about downturns; pay flexibility can give more confidence about expansion in an upturn because of the security which it gives in a downturn. Again, I can endorse that from personal experience.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield quoted from the Institute of Personnel Management and the British Institute of Management, as he did on Second Reading. I congratulate him on having read the submissions in response to the consultative document. I shall not remotely accuse him of selective quotation, because I am confident that he has read all the submissions. He will know that there were a large number of submissions on a whole series of different points, some of which contradicted the ones which he quoted.

On motivation which is already secured from bonus schemes and, indeed, from share ownership, we are already encouraging share ownership successfully, but we need complementary incentives for cash profit-related pay. Bonus schemes not involving profit do not bring the external benefits that profit-related pay can. There is a need to get employees to identify with the overall commercial success of the business, and profit is the best measure of that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) made a helpful speech on flexibility in the labour market and the whole supply side issue. The hon. Member for Sedgefield had cast doubt on this issue and argued, drawing on Sir James Meade, that there would be the danger of insiders preventing extra recruitment. He will know that schemes will be able to exclude new recruits from profit-related pay until they have served for a time if that is desired. However, I doubt whether the hon. Gentleman is arguing that a union would be prepared to organise resistance to extra recruitment. I doubt if any union would argue that as an objective. Business expansion, which is what this legislation is about, is not a zero sum game: it benefits everybody.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield supported the Government on flexibility and I join him in not wishing to make exaggerated claims for what the legislation will do and in believing that it will make a difference in terms of flexibility and on the supply side. We are envisaging the same sort of steady growth that has been seen in the share schemes which go back to the Finance Act 1978—that scheme was a product of the Lib-Lab pact and I pay tribute to the Liberal party for its influence on the then Labour Government—and to the all-employee share option scheme that we introduced in 1980. There are 666 schemes signed up under the 1978 Act and 647 under the 1980 Act. That is an increase which has occurred during the past decade and I envisage that we shall see the same sort of steady growth in the schemes that we are introducing on this occasion.

The hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn) raised specific questions that arise from alliance policy. Employers should need no persuading or reminding of the importance of relating pay to profits, but some encouragement—that is what this scheme is about—is appropriate to help employees see the value of linking a part of their pay to the success of the enterprise. The hon. Gentleman asked about national insurance contributions and suggested that there should be a relief from them. However, national insurance contributions are not a tax; they determine a benefit entitlement, so they are not an appropriate instrument to encourage the spread of profit-related pay.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby has read Professor Weitzman; I congratulate him on that. The hon. Member for Sedgefield was somewhat disparaging about American economists on Second Reading, but I remember growing up when Professor Galbraith, who started as a Canadian and only later became an American, was frequently quoted by Opposition Members. It would be a mistake if any anti-Americanism in academic thought were to creep into our affairs. We welcome suggestions from wherever they come.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby took up an issue which was less present in the speech of the hon. Member for Sedgefield and argued that this was a plan to cut wages and not to help profits rise and pay with them, as we intend. Certainly I would deny the hon. Gentleman's comments that the issue has been oversold. He denounced clause 1 as the bedrock of the legislation, but I am not sure whether he has looked at it, because clause 1 simply relates to interpretation. It was a slight piece of overselling to build the whole Opposition attack on that.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) asked specifically about take-up. In 1985 the organisation Industrial Facts and Forecasts carried out a survey for the Department of Employment on the use of profit-sharing and share ownership schemes by large companies. It showed that 6 per cent. of respondents had a cash-based profits scheme. It has since estimated that 8 to 9 per cent. of employees in these companies had some profit-related element in their pay in 1985.

I have already referred to the make-up of the cost estimates. However, of the £50 million, perhaps one half may derive from companies which already have cash payment profit-related schemes. About 1 million employees out of 15 million in the private sector are in existing schemes which might be altered for purposes of registration as profit-related pay schemes and one third of those brought into the tax relief in 1988-89 could account for the one half of the £50 million estimate that I referred to earlier. I also alluded to how we expect the figures to expand.

In these matters as in others, the Social Democratic party is a little over-optimistic. The Inland Revenue received something in excess of 20,000 inquiries rather than the 60,000. However, I am delighted to say that more than 300 of The Times 1,000 largest companies in the country have shown interest at some level or another in the scheme. That is encouraging.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) made several most thoughtful comments in support of the scheme. My hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) joined my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester in support of the Government's proposals. In essence,. we are aiming for an economy with high performance, high employment and high living standards. That will be achieved through a combination of measures and it is important that we get the total environment right. The proposals in the 17 clauses in the Bill and schedule 1 are a contribution to that process.

Mr. Maclennan: Will the Minister address directly the question about inducements for employers? He has only said that he believes employers will see the advantages of profit-related pay and that they need no inducement to enter into such schemes. Does he really believe that the only obstacle to the entry to such schemes is the employees' reluctance?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman's question relates to an issue that was raised by the official Opposition. As the hon. Member for Sedgefield asked earlier, if profit-related pay was so beneficial, why did we need tax relief? I know that the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland will agree that plenty of companies run profit-related pay schemes already. The purpose of providing tax relief to secure employee interest and demand is to encourage employees to take up such schemes. Employees may be unfamiliar with the benefits. The emphasis throughout the proposals is on encouragement rather than imposition. We do not believe in dictating incomes policies and — I direct this remark to the hon. Member for Dagenham— we do not believe in the apparatus of a command economy, however disguised.

Mr. Blair: We have had an interesting and wide-ranging debate. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), in his usual way made an offensive point because he was unable to make a telling point. He began by saying that the scheme would bring about greater identification between employees and employers. He never satisfactorily explained what great advantage this scheme has over others. His central argument was based on the cost of the scheme. That is the heart of the argument between us.

We are not debating whether profit-related pay is good or bad. People can enter into profit-related pay schemes now; many companies have such schemes, and their employees are free and entitled to enter them. As I explained to alliance Members, the question that we are debating is whether this scheme is the best use of public money. Is this the best way to make use of this tax incentive?

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield unwittingly put his finger on the dilemma. If the take-up of the scheme is low and the scheme is inexpensive, it has failed because the basis of the scheme's success must be that it is taken up in sufficiently large numbers to make an impact on the macroeconomy. That is the claim that has been made for the scheme. It is claimed that it will make an impact on the nation's economy. If the take-up is low and expense is low, it has failed. We are only debating the success of the scheme if the take-up is high and therefore—by its very nature—the expense is high. If the scheme is successful, we will be talking about hundreds of millions of pounds, not £50 million.

Conservative Members wanted to know Labour's ideas for spending the money. We have put those ideas forward constantly. Indeed, the alliance has put forward similar schemes for spending public money to create employment. We can agree or disagree about those ideas, but they exist.

The question is whether this fiscal incentive will have the desired effect. I repeat that I remain completely unconvinced about it. This is not a question of modern ideas versus backward ideas. We should not simply take the first idea off the peg and use it just because it has a modern sounding ring to it, like profit-related pay. We should inquire—as it is our duty to inquire in the House — when debating the Finance Bill whether public expenditure is being made wisely. We remain unconvinced by the proposals.

The hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) made some telling points. However, at the beginning of his speech he made a point that I must not allow to pass without comment. He said that the Opposition had run out of problems with which to tax the Government on the economy. I appreciate that the position in Wokingham is different from that in Sedgefield, but it does not lie in the mouth of any hon. Member to say that we do not have economic problems to deal with when there are 3 million unemployed.

Being lectured on the virtues of unity by what is left of the Liberal-SDP alliance is a bit like being lectured on the virtues of being a recluse by the under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie). The notion that the Liberal-SDP alliance put forward any convincing argument for profit-related pay is comic. The alliance did not even deal with the objections made by its principal economic adviser, Sir James Meade, who has criticised the Government's plans for profit-related pay on the basis that I outlined.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) asked me on what basis the Institute of Personnel Management or the British Institute of Management could come forward with objections to profit-related pay. They did that on the basis of experience, and we should listen to those organisations.

When we discuss profit-related pay and its obvious and self-evident advantages, we are told by the Treasury Minister that he cannot understand how any trade union could possibly resist recruitment to a firm on the basis that profits were to be spread more thinly. The trade union officials will not be the focus of that resistance. As anyone knows who has seen the large amount of overtime worked even in certain factories in my constituency, there is definitely a clear perception by many workers of their vested interests on the inside as against those on the outside.

[Mr. Blair]

We do not claim that profit-related pay is bad. I would not make that case. I know companies in my constituency that operate profit-related pay schemes and I wish them the best of luck. The question we are debating is whether this scheme, taken on the basis of it being a success—and on that basis it must be expensive—is the best way to spend public money. Unless we are persuaded of that, we will vote against the profit-related pay scheme. I must say from Labour's Front Bench that we are unpersuaded; we will therefore vote against it.

Question accordingly agreed to.
Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2

TAXATION OF PROFIT RELATED PAY

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I repeat a question to the Minister which he did not answer in the debate on clause 1 stand part. I should have thought that, during the past 10 years, the profits of British companies have been related not so much to the efficiency of companies, although clearly that is a factor, as to the Government's macroeconomic running of the economy. The pattern seems to be that if the pound is overvalued, as it was grievously from 1979 to 1982, profits are squeezed, firms go bankrupt and jettison everything that can be thrown overboard and a hard time is had by all. But if the pound comes down, as it manifestly has come down since 1983—by about 20 to 25 per cent. from the rate prevailing at the end of 1982—profits re-emerge, especially in firms which are exporting. I am talking primarily about manufacturing, but it also affects the service sector. Profits have boomed because firms are competitive because exports pay and because they can squeeze more profits out of exports.

In neither case is this essentially related to the performance of the firm or the work force. Therefore, under this scheme, workers are being rewarded for the consequences of the Government's macroeconomic policy instead of their endeavours. The rewards are coming from increased taxation, because the burden must be spread on those in the public sector who will get no benefit from this.

If profits increase after a devaluation, pay that is related to profits will increase after devaluation. Therefore, we shall be in a less effective position to do what is necessary after a devaluation—keep costs down. After the 1967 devaluation, the Labour Government squeezed costs to free resources for exports and to stop competitiveness being eroded. But this proposal would do exactly the opposite. We shall be pumping out more money, increasing take-home pay and accelerating the rate of inflation simply because the consequences of the Government's profit-related pay scheme will put more money in workers' pockets. How does the Minister answer those points?

Mr. Brooke: I am delighted to welcome you to the Chair, Mr. Knox. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) spent his speech on clause 1 stand part accusing the Government of overselling this legislation. I would be the last person to oversell this legislation or the achievement of the Government in providing the framework for the economic prosperity that we have been enjoying in recent years. But I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for paying tribute to the Government for the success being enjoyed by the economy and by individual companies within it.

This is a wider question than the issues covered in clause 2, so I am responding generally without notice. My recollection is that, at the microeconomic level, industrial and commercial corporations are enjoying a higher rate of return than they have enjoyed since 1964. The same is true for manufacturing companies since 1973. The quarter of a century that is embraced by the figures for industrial and commercial corporations saw several Governments of different colours, and it would be wrong to generalise about the pattern during those 25 years. All that I can say is that I am delighted that, within the framework which the Government have provided, the profitability and returns being secured are the highest for nearly 25 years.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby gave us a trailer of the issues relating to the private and public sectors which we shall debate when we come to Opposition amendments as well as an amendment from my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith). It would be a mistake for me to give the hon. Gentleman a general answer. At the microeconomic level, greater profitability in corporations, accompanied by profit-related pay, will ensure a greater commitment among the entire work force to the success of the company and is likely to increase the prosperity of those who work in the company.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 2 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3

RELIEF FROM TAX

Mr. Blair: I beg to move amendment No. 31, in page 2, line 39, leave out '£3,000' and insert '£1,500'.

The amendment is drafted to probe the Government for more information on their profit-related pay schemes. When we debated clause 1, the Minister said that the tax relief would allow those on higher earnings to claim tax relief off the top of their incomes. I should be obliged if he would confirm that. Those on higher rates of tax would gain more from profit-related pay than those on the basic rate of tax.

The Minister also said, rightly, that only half the amount of profit-related pay would be eligible for tax relief. If the maximum amount of profit-related pay was £3,000, the maximum level for tax relief would be £1,500. We agreed that, at the top rate, that could give about £20 a week tax-free to those on higher pay, which is a considerable sum. We quizzed the Minister on this, and he dealt in some detail with the Government's estimate of the cost of the profit-related pay scheme.

Various figures were bandied about. I quoted figures from the Treasury, which started at £50 million, and from various columnists and academics, who took the level much higher. I should like to probe a little on this matter. The Paymaster General thought that £3 million would be about the top amount that could be claimed under the schemes. I should be obliged if he will tell us whether the Treasury has made a precise study of the costs and what empirical evidence it has adduced so that we know exactly what sums we are considering. This is important when considering the amount of tax relief.

5.30 pm

When the proposals were first promulgated, the maximum relief for profit-related pay was £1,000, and it has increased considerably since then. I should be obliged if the Paymaster General will tell us why the Government felt it necessary to raise the amount. The hon. Gentleman may say that the reason was the many representations by employers to the effect that they did not want to engage in those schemes unless the relief was much higher, so it was obviously parti pris. It is very much in the interests of those who engage in profit-related pay schemes to have the highest maximum tax relief available. The Treasury has to be satisfied about what maximum limit will encourage the maximum number of people to take up profit-related pay. Plainly, there must be a balance between meeting the interests of the taxpayer and encouraging the PRP schemes. I am not sure that the balance is right. There has ben a considerable uplift in the schemes' limits. At the very least, we are owed an explanation before we let this pass without comment.

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has returned to an issue to which he alluded in the debate on clause 1 stand part. It may be helpful if I specifically answer his question, because he has said that amendment No. 31 is a probing amendment. On £900 per annum, which would be 60 per cent. of the £1,500 proposed, we would be talking about £17·30 a week rather than the £20 mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. Nevertheless, the figures are obviously of the same magnitude.

The hon. Gentleman said that those on high incomes would gain more. That is, of course, a function of a progressive taxation system, but taxation rates will have their effect.

Mr. Blair: Is it not right that if people pay the higher tax rates they will obtain these higher amounts without doing any additional work for them? Without any greater productivity or extra work, they will get more than those on the basic rate.

Mr. Brooke: I took that point when the hon. Gentleman made it in the debate on clause 1 stand part. I said that we were looking at a community of interest, with everyone working within a particular company. Of course, the income is a function of contribution. As the hon. Gentleman knows, there is a cut-off at £15,000. Although it is possible for a company to have more profit-related pay than the £3,000 limit, there would be no tax relief on it.

I should like to avoid any misunderstanding. I did not say that £300 million was our likely long-term figure. I said that it would be perfectly reasonable to have a certain cost in 1988-89, as stated in the projections, yet have the scheme running by the end of that period at a level that, in the fullness of time—obviously it is phased—would produce a full annual cost of £300 million. That simply extends our £50 million figure to a long-term basis. Any take-up beyond the immediate projections will be speculative, just as were any projections made in the context of the 1978 share scheme introduced by the Labour Administration. I have not looked at the forecasts made by that Administration when the scheme was introduced, but it would have been difficult to predict precisely the figures expected over the 10-year period.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept the argument that those who will benefit to the maximum extent from the £900 possible profit-related pay, because they are likely to be near the top of the companies concerned, have less need of this general scheme to provide some incentive and some community of interest? It seems a little peverse that the Minister did not restrict the taxation benefit to the standard rate of tax.

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Member for Sedgefield asked me why we had extended the relief in our proposals in this year's Budget as against those in last year's Green Paper. We decided on the basis of our wide-ranging consultation, which embraced organisations such as the Institute of Personnel Management and the British Institute of Management, which were not wholly favourable to the scheme. I think that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) makes a slightly over-cynical suggestion. The Government's judgment in terms of the proposals arising from the Green Paper and the consultation exercise was that it was a balanced package, with the intention of securing certain objectives.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Obviously, there are Conservative Members who are very much in favour of this scheme. We think that it is an excellent addition to the incentives which are necessary within taxation generally. Is my right hon. Friend able to tell the House whether there has been any prognostication about the number of people who might be affected in 1988-89 or 1989-90? This is obviously important in terms of the effects.

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, just as I was to the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan, for kindly ascribing right honourable status.

Sir Peter Emery: It will come in time.

Mr. Brooke: In the debate on clause 1 stand part, I said that, if 2 million employees with 10 per cent. of their pay as profit-related pay were covered by registered schemes by the end of 1988-89, the full annual tax cost would be about £300 million, but the cost that would fall in 1988-89 in terms of relief would be about £50 million, because many of the schemes would not make payments until the following year or later. I referred to 2 million employees.

Sir Peter Emery: As I said, right honourable status will come in time. I am sorry to press the point. I heard my hon. Friend make that statement. But is that the estimate of take-up that the Treasury believes will come about, or does my hon. Friend think that it is likely to be much less? I am afraid that it may be much less. I hope that my hon. Friend will tell us what he believes the actual take-up will be.

Mr. Brooke: We needed a figure to put into the forecast, and that was the one we took. There was a degree of underlying arithmetical logic to it, but I acknowledge that it was speculative. There are 20,000 employers who have said that when the Inland Revenue produces its guidance notes shortly, assuming this legislation is passed, they would like to receive a copy. That is an index of the fairly widespread interest among employers.

Mr. Blair: The hon. Gentleman raised an important point. I do not wish to rehearse the arguments that were put earlier, but there is bound to be an element of speculation in deciding what the take-up is. If we are talking about 2 million people with 10 per cent. of their pay—that is, about £300 million—it is important to be sure of the basis upon which we are working and to ensure that there is evidence to support our view. As I made clear earlier, I have my doubts about how successful this will be in any event. It is absolutely clear from the figures that we have been given that we are talking about substantial sums of money.

I asked the Minister for an explanation of why, when the Government first put forward this scheme, there was a maximum of £1,000 as the top amount that is able to come within the profit-related pay. It is now £3,000. He indicated that the reason was the representations that were made. I still say that that is a significant mark-up to have occurred as a result of such representations. In the initial term, profit-related pay schemes will be introduced and people will get an immediate tax-free benefit in their hand for not producing or doing anything more at all. That is why, when profit-related pay was introduced, some people suggested that it should ensure that people will not get any more money in their hands as a result of the introduction of the tax incentive. I still think that the figure is extremely high. However, we have made our position clear in the vote on clause 1, so it is not necessary to divide the Committee on the amendment.

Mr. Brooke: To avoid misunderstanding, I would say that the £1,000 to which the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) referred, in terms of the original proposals, was the total available tax relief. I agree that there was a difference in the manner in which it was expressed. Therefore, half of the £3,000, which is inherent in the legislation now, is a 50 per cent. improvement and not a case of tripling.

Mr. Blair: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 4

EXCEPTIONS FROM RELIEF

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: I have a couple of brief questions on clause 4. As I understand it, the principal purpose of clause 4 is to ensure that, if an employee has more than one employment and if, in that other employment, he already enjoys the benefits of a profit-related pay scheme, he cannot, in the second employment, also have the same benefits of a profit-related pay scheme. I assume that that is to do with an anti-avoidance measure, but I would welcome the Minister's confirmation of that.

I also assume that there are perfectly genuine cases in which people have two separate employments. I assume that, under clause 4, even though profit-related pay is not able to be enjoyed in both employments, other types of bonus scheme or productivity scheme, running in conjunction with a profit-related pay scheme will be perfectly all right. In subsection (3) of clause 4 there is a statement, the effect of which is to ensure that subsection (2) does not apply to those whose earnings are below the lower earnings limit for class 1 contributions. I assume that the purpose of that is to ensure that those on lower pay with below class 1 contribution levels can still enjoy profit-related pay. I should be grateful if the Minister would confirm the points that have been put to me.

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has stated what he believes to be the proposals. We certainly consider that it is right to encourage the spread of profit-related pay by introducing a measure of relief, but we believe that there should be upper limits to the amount of the relief. To prevent people avoiding such limits by accident or design—I freely acknowledge that it might be either—by arranging to receive profit-related pay from more than one scheme, clause 4 provides that an employee will not be eligible for tax relief on his profit-related pay if he is already receiving such relief on profit-related pay from another scheme.

As to bonuses or any other arrangements, I repeat what I said on the amendment that we have just discussed. We do not intend to interfere with the arrangements that employers may have. It is just that the tax relief will be limited to what is contained within the scheme. On the national insurance contribution point, I confirm that the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right.

Clause 5 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 6

EXCLUDED EMPLOYMENTS

5.45 pm

Mr. Tim Smith: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 3, leave out lines 41 and 42.

The Chairman of Ways and Means: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 32, in page 3, line 43, leave out paragraphs (c) and (d).

No. 2, in page 4, leave out lines 1 to 3.

Mr. Smith: Clause 6 deals with excluded employments and states that no person who has employment in an office under the Crown or in the service of the Crown, or is employed by an excluded employer, can participate in a profit-related pay scheme. Sub-section (2)(b) states that an excluded employer means

"a body under the control of the Crown".

Subsection 3*(b)* states that in the case of a body having a share capital—which is what I am interested in—control means that "he holds more than half of its issued share capital".

It was put to me by Price Waterhouse, to whom I am an adviser, that that would cover any plc owned by the state. For example, it would include the Rover Group. I am not sure, but I think it would include Harland and Wolff and a number of other plcs owned by the state because the Crown controls more than half of their share capital. I can understand why the Government want to exclude certain employments. It seems that, in certain cases, it would be inappropriate for employments to qualify for a profit-related scheme.

That is not the only way in which a scheme can be excluded. To qualify, a scheme must be with an employer who is in the business of making a profit in the first place. Obviously, that would exclude many employments under the Crown. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to look at the matter. If I am right about the matter, it is quite wrong that, just because people happen to work for plcs that are owned by the Crown, they should be excluded from the scheme.

Mr. Blair: I have some sympathy with the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Beconsfield (Mr. Smith). Similar related points were raised in the debate on the amendments that are tabled in my name and have been taken together. Of course it is the case that, on the whole the public sector will be excluded from profit-related pay. Indeed, if clause 6 is passed as it stands at present, it will be totally excluded. One of the things that Professor Weitzman put forward—I confess that I did not totally understand the basis upon which he managed to do it—was some profit-related pay scheme for the public sector as well as the private sector. I hesitate to recommend that the Government turn their minds to that matter at this stage.

It is of course the case that the public sector will have no such profit-related pay scheme at all and will be unable to participate in it. One of the traditional reasons for that is that the public sector has much greater security of tenure than the private sector has and, therefore, profit-related pay is a more intelligent way of rewarding in the private sector rather than in the public sector, quite apart from the fact that, obviously, public sector profits have to be made. I am not entirely sure that that traditional argument would apply so much nowadays.

As I understand it, the question raised by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield concerns bodies under Government or local authority control with a fairly autonomous existence which can make profits. I join him in his question to the Minister about the purpose of excluding a body under central or local government control which makes profits and is therefore susceptible of engaging in a profit-related pay scheme. Why, if we wish for efficiency in the public sector and believe that that is the method of obtaining it, and if there are public sector bodies that are susceptible of being in these schemes, should not we allow them to participate?

As well as the point raised by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield, my amendment deals with, for example, local authorities' direct labour organisations which can tender for and perform contracts, and which, in certain circumstances, may be able to participate in these schemes. Once we have accepted, as the Committee has by its decision earlier, that profit-related pay schemes are to be encouraged, the net should be cast as widely as possible. If the Government believe that that is a good idea which will encourage productivity at the work place, the burden is upon them to show why certain categories of people should be excluded. At present, there seems to be doubt over at least those two categories.

Mr. Boswell: I want to associate myself with the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) and substantially with many of the remarks made by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair).

We have a real problem here which goes to the heart of any analysis or attempt to help stimulate profit-related pay. Where profit does not exist it is difficult, by definition, to contrive some profit-related pay scheme. Nevertheless, it gives me some concern that about one quarter of the labour force which remains within the public sector under its different heads is excluded from what is a substantial advance.

Earlier, I had an opportunity to speak about the fact that I do not believe that the benefits of profit-related pay are purely internal to the schemes of the beneficiaries thereof. Nevertheless, an anomaly is created to which we should address ourselves. My purpose in rising is not in any sense to solve the problem, but to invite the Government to put down a marker to see what can be done in subsequent years to balance the position as far as it can be.

There are some grades of Government-controlled bodies at rather different levels. One is the plc with a largely public shareholding, such as the Rover Group. The next level would be Government trading funds, going through to organisations partly or entirely identified with public sector bodies, such as local authorities or the Civil Service. I have recently had the privilege of working alongside the Civil Service and I see the importance of encouraging motivation. However, one or two Opposition Members have shown a marked lack of interest in the Government's attempts to introduce incentive schemes for efficency in the public sector. Without solving these problems, I invite the Government to address themselves to them and to see whether, in a subsequent Finance Bill, they can bring forward some measures which would shadow profit-related pay.

As hon. Members have mentioned earlier, there is the problem of creating a personal incentive because of the difficulty of allocation and the invidiousness which that may sometimes bring. That may go to some of the anxieties that some hon. Members have mentioned about incentive schemes in the public sector. Nevertheless, it is unfortunate if about a quarter of the labour force cannot participate in these schemes. I understand the reason for that and the accountancy principles which make it impossible at this stage, but I hope that it will be possible to find a way to extend the benefits of what is a considerable social advance to other groups of employees in subsequent Finance Bills.

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) for his amendments and for the manner in which he moved them. He asked me a specific question about the Rover Group and I can confirm that such a body would be excluded by the legislation as it is now composed.

The exclusion of the bodies addressed in the amendment is not a reflection of prejudice but of a careful consideration of the economic merits and consequences of profit-related pay in this sector of the economy. As my hon. Friend said, many of the employees concerned would, in any event, be excluded from access to the tax relief by other profit-related pay provisions. Those provisions require that the undertaking is carried on with a view to profit; they also exclude tax relief in respect of losses. The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) made similar points in the context of local authorities and I give the same observations in response.

Some trading bodies covered by the amendment show an accounting profit and compete directly with the private sector, but even those are not generally wholly comparable with the private sector. Some public concerns can achieve profit targets by raising prices in situations where the absence of other suppliers means that they are comparatively less vulnerable to losing business. Even where conditions are similar, there are often cultural differences. The full benefits of profit-related pay will flow where a concern operates fully in the disciplines of the market economy, as, if I may remark in parenthesis, privatisation shows.

We take the view that, wherever it can be done, such bodies should be freed from Government control through privatisation, after which they are fully exposed to the benefits and disciplines of the market, including the benefits of a registered profit-related pay scheme.

The matter has been carefully considered. In general, the potential benefits of profit-related pay schemes in the concerns covered by the amendment are likely to be significantly less than in the private sector, and the concentration of an innovative tax relief, such as profit-related pay, on the private sector, where the benefits of pay flexibility are most likely to have the greatest impact, has been regarded as the first priority by the Government.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield referred to local authorities. What I said about other aspects of this scheme to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield applies equally to local authority employees. There are areas in the local authority sector where there are similarities with the private sector. I am not suggesting that it is possible to make simple straightforward distinctions. But while there are similarities, there are important differences of culture and of competitive tendering in the local authority sector for all the work cannot yet be said to have been achieved.

I said in the debate on clause 1 stand part that we shall be watching with interest the evolution of profit-related pay. We expect it to be a gradual process. I hope that it will be a success. We shall certainly look at its evolution, not simply in the private sector, in terms of what is achieved there, but in terms of its potential application elsewhere. I hope that in the spirit of that response my hon. Friend will feel able to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Tim Smith: I can see the difficulties that arise with trading funds and, to a lesser extent, with direct labour organisations of local authorities, although they are not necessarily insuperable. After all, they would have to meet various requirements in schedule 1 in order to qualify. Their accounts would have to show a true and fair view.

[Mr. Tim Smith]

There would have to be an independent accountant's report and they would have to be profit-making in the first place.

But when it comes to plcs in the public sector, I am a little disappointed by my hon. Friend's reply. I was expecting him to say not that he disagreed with me in principle, but that the Government had looked at the matter and had not been able to find a practical way to deal with the problem. In most cases there would be no question of profit-related pay. For a plc such as the Rover Group, or a nationalised industry in receipt of a Government subsidy that is loss-making, the question does not arise. If it is a nationalised industry, or a plc, which has advanced beyond that and is being prepared for transfer to the private sector and making a profit, it stands wholly apart from Government; it is not in receipt of Government subsidy. Apart from ownership, I cannot see the distinction between that plc and one in the private sector or one that is listed on the Stock Exchange. I do not wish to press this, but will my hon. Friend re-examine the sector of plcs that are 100 per cent. owned by the Crown?

Mr. Blair: I understood a part of the Minister's speech; then there was a part that lapsed into pure ideology. That brought to mind what I believe the noble Lord Ross said when welcoming the shadow Secretary of State for Scotland during the period of the 1974-79 Government. He said that he had read his first speech; he had not read it well; and it had not been worth reading anyway. That summed up the part in which the Minister was talking about trading plcs.

I would put the case of Austin Rover differently from the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith). If an organisation is not making a profit, the issue hides itself and there is no question of profit-related pay. However, if Austin Rover moves into profit, or if other organisations in the public sector are in profit, why on earth should they not participate in the schemes? It is extremely difficult to see how one can justify excluding bodies from profit-related pay merely on the basis that they operate in the public sector.

We voted earlier against the principle of profit-related pay, but now that it has been accepted, it is our duty to make it as effective as possible. At the moment, those in the public sector who have to operate on the basis of profit along commercial lines will feel aggrieved if they are unable to obtain the tax perk that arises from profit-related pay while others in the private sector can do so.

So I did not find the Minister's explanation wholly convincing. Will the Treasury keep the matter under review and bend some of its considerable resources to finding a way around the problem?

Mr. Brooke: I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) and to the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) that it goes without saying that if companies such as those that were the concern of my hon. Friend can be privatised, that will of itself resolve the problem. I do not want to imply that that is the sole objective of privatisation, because the benefits that can be secured through privatisation are common cause on this side of the House.

I tried to answer my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) by saying that the Government would keep the matter under review. It would be pleasing if, by the time we came to discuss this issue next, the problem had been solved by the privatisation of the companies concerned, but I said that we sought to take a balanced view, and that is what we shall continue to do when examining what both sides of the House have admitted is a difficult problem.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 6 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 7, 8 and 9 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 10

CANCELLATION OF REGISTRATION

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: I have a small point to make about clause 10 that is important for anti-avoidance purposes. It may be dealt with in schedule 1. If so, I apologise for raising it here. Clause 10(4) provides:

"If the scheme employer, by written notice, requests the Board to cancel the registration of the scheme with effect from the beginning of a profit period specified in the notice, the Board shall comply with the request."

It seems to me that a major part of the Government's case on profit-related pay must be that the scheme exists in bad times as well as in good. There is not much point in having a profit-related pay scheme if it exists only in the good times. It must exist in the bad times, too. That is what is supposed to give firms the benefit of not needing to make redundancies when recession hits them and profitability drops. When those bad times come, what is to prevent an employer saying that he intends to cancel the profit-related pay scheme? In other words, employers obtain the benefit when times are good and profits are rising, but, as soon as profits go down, they cancel the scheme, and thus avoid any of the microeconomic benefits that are supposed to accrue under the scheme. Is that provided for anywhere else? If not, does clause 10(4) open that scheme of avoidance to them?

Mr. Brooke: At first blush, I do not see what the attraction of making such a change would be from the point of view of the employer. Of course, there may be circumstances that call for the cancellation of the registration that arise out of the economic performance of the company, but those are dealt with in terms of the legislation as a whole. As the Government argued that potential benefits to employers and employees flow from having profit-related pay schemes at a time of downturn, I do not understand why there would be a benefit for the employer in effecting such a change at such a time.

Mr. Blair: I appreciate that there is perhaps a difference between us as to how great a community of interest there will be between the workers and management in these profit-related pay schemes. However, if the profits of the firm drop under a PRP scheme, so the wages of the workers drop. It may be agreed between the workers and management that, rather than let their pay drop, which is the effect at present, they will engage in voluntary redundancies and keep paying at the same level and cancel the profit-related pay scheme for that reason. When it is so easily cancelled by the employer, it might be in the interests of employers and employees to do that. That would militate against the better purposes of the scheme.

Will the Minister give consideration to the problem of those scheme employers who decide that it is in their interests to engage in a PRP scheme for a limited period and then, if it is clear that profits will accrue only over a limited period, halt that scheme and move into a different scheme with a different company? When the scheme can be easily cancelled, there is surely a risk that it will be entered into not for the benefit of the official purpose of PRP but for purposes of avoidance.

Mr. Brooke: I have a continuing problem with the hypothesis advanced by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). The act of cancellation, just like the act of going into loss under one of the methods detailed in the schedule, produces a discontinuity of the scheme. If one found that things were improving fairly soon thereafter, one would not be able to maintain the benefit in the way in which one would if there had been continuity through the bad periods. Clearly, it is possible for a company to make an application for cancellation of registration, and subsection (4) puts the board under an obligation to respond to that request.

It may be helpful if I say something about the consequences of cancellation of registration. It obviously depends on the rules of the profit-related pay scheme, but some companies might continue to provide profit-related pay to employees even in respect of periods after the effective date of cancellation, though entitlement to tax relief would no longer exist. Payments of profit-related pay made after the effective date of cancellation may continue to enjoy tax relief where they relate to profit periods preceding the cancellation date. In respect of any such periods, the scheme employer will remain obliged to account to the Inland Revenue for the operation of his scheme. Payments of profit-related pay made after the effective date of cancellation may not enjoy tax relief where they relate to profit periods after that date. If any tax relief had been given for such periods, the employer would be liable to repay it to the Inland Revenue under the provisions of clause 11, which we shall shortly be debating.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 10 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 11 and 12 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 13

OTHER INFORMATION

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: I have a short point on the detail of clause 13. It is fair to say that this clause is fairly broadly drafted. It says:

> "The Board may by written notice require any person to give them, within a period of thirty days or such longer period as may be specified in the notice, any information which is so specified and which—
> (a) that person has or can reasonably be required to obtain, and
> (b) the Board consider they need to have in order to perform their functions under this Chapter."

The clause says that the board may require by written notice "any person" to give information. Is that provision limited to those people who are employed by the scheme employer and who are engaged in the profit-related pay scheme, or does it mean any person at all? For example, does it mean a customer of the employer? When we come to schedule 1, we will see more clearly the computations about the profit and loss account, and we will need to ensure that we get the proper profit and loss account upon which to base profit-related pay. Before we give the Inland Revenue such broad powers, we should ask from whom it can require information. On the present drafting, the Bill appears to mean people who are not even employed by the scheme employer.

Mr. Brooke: We have passed over a number of clauses fairly quickly, and it may be helpful if I say a brief word about the Inland Revenue's attitude to the management of the scheme as a whole. This is the background to the clause that we are discussing. As the hon. Gentleman implies, this clause empowers the board to obtain information in connection with profit-related pay schemes additional to that provided by the return and the report which are covered in clause 12.

The Inland Revenue will not normally be involved in the day-to-day running of profit-related pay schemes. On occasions when the Inland Revenue needs to become more closely involved, adequate information powers are clearly necessary. Clause 13(1) provides a general authority to seek information.

Specific anticipated examples of that are cited in subsection (2), and subsection (3) lays an obligation on a scheme employer to pass certain information to the board. The general authority permits the board to require information related to a profit-related pay scheme from any person who has that information or who can reasonably be required to obtain it, provided the requirement is in writing, allows the person at least 30 days to reply and is information which the board considers that it needs about that scheme.

The cited examples deal with situations where such information is likely to be needed. The first case concerns information related to concellation of a scheme. Situations in which this might occur are dealt with in clause 10. The second case is about information related to employee or employer tax liability. This is to ensure access to all pay documents for profit-related pay purposes. The third case concerns information related to the administration of a scheme and this may be especially necessary where one scheme covers several employers in a group of companies. The fourth case concerns information related to changes of persons paying profit-related pay under a scheme. This may be relevant to reorganisations within groups.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) asked a specific question about any person giving information. A wide variety of circumstances may call into question the operation of a registered scheme and the continued entitlement to tax relief. Therefore, the powers provided are wide and permit information to be obtained from any person about a profit-related pay scheme. Such powers are especially likely to be needed in group situations. The employer who registers a scheme may be the parent company, but it will be the subsidiaries who hold details of administration and payment. I hope that it will reassure the hon. Gentleman when I tell him that this information provision is closely modelled on the equivalent authority in respect of approved share option schemes in schedule 12(14) to the Finance Act 1984. The 1984 legislation did not prove contentious in Committee and has posed no significant problems in operation.

Mr. Blair: The Minister is right in thinking that I require reassurance. A profit-related pay scheme is different from an employee share ownership scheme because by its very nature a PRP scheme deals with the computation of profit. That exercise is different from dealing with the dividends paid under a share scheme. The powers proposed here are broad and the Revenue will be able to require any person to give it any information that it wishes. There is no requirement upon the Revenue even to act reasonably in doing so.

Mr. Tim Smith: The person has to have the information that the Revenue is seeking or has to be able reasonably to acquire it.

Mr. Blair: It is true that the person has to be reasonably able to obtain the information, but there is no duty upon the Revenue to act reasonably in obtaining the information that it requires. The matter of a customer has been raised. As I understand it, the Minister says that the Inland Revenue is entitled under clause 12 to require information from customers, presumably about a sale deal or a contract. That does not arise in employee share ownership schemes and they are wide powers for the Revenue.

One of the dangers of debating the Bill in the way that we are is that things can slip through without the Committee requiring some fairly stringent limitations on the powers of the Inland Revenue. I should like to know whether solicitors or other third parties could be required by the board to give information. If they are, that constitutes a broad power for the Inland Revenue. If we are to involve people who have nothing whatever to do with the scheme, it is important that we at least get a statement of intent from the Minister that the powers will not be abused or used to require information from people who are not participating in any way in a scheme. I should be obliged to the Minister if he could give me that assurance.

Mr. Brooke: I am not sure that I can afford the hon. Gentleman all the assurances that he wants. Effectively, he is asking whether somebody to whom the Revenue made a request for information will be able to resist that request. In this area, enforcement by means of penalties has to be sanctioned by the special commissioners of income tax, the independent appellate body. Therefore, there is an appeal against such a request if it is unreasonable. I am reluctant to accept that it would be unreasonable; that hypothesis was adumbrated by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Blair: With respect, will the Minister answer my two specific questions? Do the provisions apply to customers and to other third parties such as solicitors?

Mr. Brooke: Subject to correction, yes, but I shall certainly let the hon. Gentleman know if I have given him an incorrect answer. Earlier, I referred to the phrase "any person" and I stand by that wording.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: This is an extremely important point. Is the Minister now saying that access to solicitors' records and a requirement on solicitors to give information about their clients are implicit in the Bill?

Mr. Brooke: I have been seeking to say that, while the Revenue will have a relatively light control over the process, if circumstances arose in which they needed information, they could seek it. I continue to make the observation that there will be the opportunity to resist the provision of that information by reference to the special commissioners for income tax, should the request be regarded as unreasonable.

Mr. Mitchell: Does the Minister realise that he is abrogating an extremely important professional principle? It is true that some of my best friends are solicitors and I would not wish to seem to be speaking in defence of their interests, but the principle of confidentiality is vital to the solicitors' profession, and, indeed, to other professions. Yet the Minister blithely tells us—with no contradictory message coming along the supply lines from the Olympian powers that usually rescue Ministers — that he is abrogating that essential professional principle. That surely cannot be correct.

Mr. Brooke: I repeat that the information provision is closely modelled on the equivalent authority in respect of approved share option schemes in the Finance Act 1984. That was self-evidently before my time; I was not involved with the Committee on the Bill, although I dare say that the hon. Members for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) were. I do not know what they said in similar circumstances in 1984, but I know that this was not a contentious issue in 1984. That provision has worked perfectly satisfactorily and I hope that the Committee will be confident that this provision will work similarly.

Mr. Blair: I shall not labour the point, but I am really not persuaded by the analogy with the employee share option provision; for the simple reason that in that case the board would not be engaged in the same calculation. The whole purpose of profit-related pay schemes is to tie pay to profits; that involves a wholly different set of computations.

I think that we very often allow the Revenue to get away with much greater powers than it needs and it is a serious matter if we are about to pass a clause which will allow the Revenue to interfere with the normal rights of confidentiality of clients and solicitors and to obtain information from people who have nothing whatever to do with the profit-related pay scheme. The Minister says that they will have a right of appeal, but they will have that right only within the terms of the statute. The board's powers are qualified only by subsections (1)(a) and (1)(b). The person can be required to give information that he "can reasonably be required to obtain".

There will be a lot of information that a person can reasonably obtain, because it is to hand, but he may not want to divulge that information and perhaps should not be forced to do so.

The second qualification is that "the Board consider they need to have" the information

"in order to perform their functions"

under the Bill. That is very wide indeed, and I hope that we have at the very least put down a marker to make it clear to the Inland Revenue that the provision is not intended to give it carte blanche to trawl the accounts of people who have nothing to do with the profit-related pay scheme.

It is incumbent upon the Government and the Revenue to ensure that legislation of his nature is drawn as narrowly as possible. It should give the Revenue only the powers that it needs to perform its duties adequately. This provision is drawn much more widely than it need be.

Mr. Brooke: As I said in my opening remarks, there is a potential marginal disadvantage in passing over a number of clauses without debate, because the framework for the Revenue's involvement has not been discussed or described.

As I said earlier, the purpose is that there should be minimum and minimal Revenue interference and involvement in the scheme, to leave maximum flexibility and freedom to employers. As is apparent from the rest of the provisions, this is very much a employer-orientated scheme.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield is worried lest people who could be placed in an embarrassing position with regard to confidentiality were obliged to provide information under the arrangements, although he recognises that the wording is such that the board may require a person to give it information only that "that person has or can reasonably be required to obtain".

The debate has demonstrated that the Revenue would be most unlikely to ask someone for information to which a degree of controversy or drama was attached without first asking those in the employing organisation who might be expected to provide the information to do so. We are talking about an unusual case, because in a scheme intended to be run with minimum Revenue involvement and maximum flexibility and freedom for the employer, the first source of information will clearly be the employer. However, I understand why the hon. Member for Sedgefield wished to pursue the question of the wording.

The Revenue will go to those who are most likely to have the information readily to hand. However, it needs some residual powers so that it can secure the information that the House would properly expect it to secure to ensure that the relief is provided properly. This is an unusual case, but I am grateful to the hon. Member for Sedgefield for raising it in these terms and this tone. I am sure that the Revenue will have heard what he has said.

Mr. Kirkwood: I am sorry to prolong the debate. The Committee will be grateful to the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) for raising this matter. The point had certainly not occurred to me during our cursory examination of the Bill. Will the Treasury Bench re-examine the matter and come up with a slightly more convincing series of answers on Report? As a solicitor—albeit of the Scots variety—I would like to ask the Minister what sactions he thinks the Inland Revenue will have at its disposal if a solicitor pleads professional privilege. That would put both the solicitor and the Inland Revenue in a very difficult position.

I therefore echo the fears expressed by the hon. Member for Sedgefield and others, because I am not satisfied either. There seems little point in pressing the matter to a Division today, although if the hon. Member for Sedgefield has a mind to do so I shall certainly support him. A more positive approach might be for the Government to look at the matter in more detail and to return to it on Report.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I echo the remarks of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood). The Minister's reply was unsatisfactory. It is in this way that liberties are thrown away—with blithe assurances that the circumstances will be highly exceptional, that the provisions will be invoked with sensitivity and that the Inland Revenue, that well-known instrument of sensitivity, care and kid-glove handling, will operate will all due processes in this instance. On the basis of such assurances, essential professional practices and liberties can easily be lost.

6.30 pm

If a Labour Government had proposed a similar provision in a Finance Bill Committee there would have been howls of outrage from the Conservative Opposition. A heart-rending, tear-jerking picture would have been painted of the demise of liberty in this country as a result of the terrible powers being invoked by Somerset house. I heard just such harangues on the Finance Bills of 1977, 1978 and 1979 until my heart bled for the poor British people subjected to such tyrannical powers. Yet a Conservative Minister now blithely invokes just such powers.

The precedent from 1984 that the Minister cited is not adequate because these are more trenchant, more wide-ranging powers. The Minister may be riding them in on the back of the 1984 concession, but that concession cannot be claimed as a precedent because he is extending the circles of tyranny. Perhaps more important, the Minister's argument that the Revenue would go first to the directors of the firm and only secondarily to the legal advisers is not satisfactory either. If the Revenue does not obtain satisfaction from the directors there will be an ever-widening circle of inquiry which will lead directly to the infringement of an essential professional practice. The confidentiality of the relationship between professional adviser and client will be infringed and abrogated by the clause.

There is not a great deal that we can do about the matter today, but I hope that we can return to it on Report as the Minister's reply was not satisfactory.

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to the hon. Members for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) and for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) for prolonging the debate. In the context of the latter's earlier reference to over-selling, I hugely enjoyed his reference to "circles of tyranny", a phrase which we shall no doubt read in other places.

A sinister quality has been read into the clause which it does not possess, but it is absolutely right that the Committee should be vigilant in these matters. The Inland Revenue proposes to manage and oversee the scheme on behalf of taxpayers everywhere with a light touch, but feels that residual powers are necessary. The hon. Members for Great Grimsby and for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) said that the 1984 case to which I alluded was not an adequate support for the argument that I was advancing. I can only say that the 1984 case exists and has not given rise to the dramas and ever-widening circles of tyranny to which the hon. Member for Great Grimsby has referred.

Of course, this is an issue of public moment. The Keith committee, with which we have been concerned in other contexts, has made various proposals on professional privilege. Those proposals are still under consideration, but I accept the spirit in which the Opposition have raised this matter. I shall, of course, look at it again to see whether any greater reassurance can be given.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 13 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 14 to 17 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 1

PROFIT-RELATED PAY SCHEMES: CONDITIONS FOR REGISTRATION

Mr. Blair: I beg to move amendment No. 33, in page 70, line 23, leave out '80 per cent.' and insert '50 per cent.'.

This is clearly a probing amendment but it is worth discussing to ascertain the basis on which the Government have drawn up the rules on profit-related pay. At first blush, it is difficult to see why profit-related pay can operate only if 80 per cent. of the work force agrees to it. Presumably employers are able to have different pay systems for those taking part and for the remainder up to 20 per cent. Why must 80 per cent. agree?

I could see an argument for saying that, unless everyone agreed, the scheme could not be introduced because of the administrative difficulties involved in calculating two different bases of pay, but it is plainly accepted that up to 20 per cent. of people within the same employment unit and presumably doing the same type of work under the same terms and conditions can nevertheless opt out of the scheme. So why has the figure of 80 per cent. been chosen? Why should not anyone who so wishes be allowed to participate and the others be allowed to opt out? I see no rational basis for seizing upon the figure of 80 per cent. The real distinction must be between having everyone or no one in the employment unit on profit-related pay or allowing diversity within the same unit. I should be obliged if the Minister would explain that to me.

Mr. Tim Smith: I sympathise with the comments of the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). It is not clear to me why 80 per cent. has been chosen. I am also not sure exactly what the words mean. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will clarify that.

"to whom the scheme relates"

My hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) asked me to raise a number of points about schedule 1 which were put to him by a firm which for 15 years has operated in the specialist area of employee participation arrangements, particularly employee share schemes, and which numbers about 350 of the top 500 United Kingdom companies among its clients. One of its concerns is the 80 per cent. rule. The firm says:

"It appears that Inland Revenue will interpret this Rule to mean not that such plans must be 'available' to at least 80 per cent. of employees but that 80 per cent. of employees must actually receive payments thereunder. Companies are very conscious that a dissident minority of 20·1 per cent. of the work force could effectively lose the tax efficacy of an otherwise splendid scheme for the majority of their colleagues."

I rather agree with the hon. Member for Sedgefield that once one concedes the principle that 100 per cent. of employees are not needed to participate in the scheme, why not simply say that all those who wish to participate may do so regardless of the proportion?

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has moved a probing amendment and my hon. friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) supported him.

The profits to which pay will be related are the profits of the whole employment unit. Therefore, as the hon. Member for Sedgefield implied, ideally all the employees of an employment unit would participate in profit-related pay because the profits relate to the efforts of all of the employees. However, when the Green Paper was published last year we recognised that there would be circumstances in which it would not be appropriate or possible for all the employees to be eligible. Therefore, there is a need for some flexibility for employers.

The benefits that we believe will flow from the widespread adoption of profit-related pay will be best achieved if a substantial majority of the employees in each unit participate. That goes back to the discussions that we had on clause 1 stand part.

The Government considered that 80 per cent. was a reasonable, minimum level if tax relief is to be made available. I appreciate that the hon. Member for Sedgefield was arguing that his figure of 50 per cent. was chosen simply as a probe against the Government's figure of 80 per cent., but I am puzzled that the Opposition are seeking to reduce the percentage. The lower the figure is taken the easier it is to have what I would euphemistically describe as an arrangement. The more people who are required to take part in the scheme, the less likely it is that some artificial arrangement will be reached.

Mr. Blair: Let me explain our position straight away. I do not believe that there is any inconsistency. Indeed, it is in the best tradition of constructive opposition that, having lost the vote on clause 1 stand part, with the result that profit-related pay schemes will come into existence if the Bill is carried, the Opposition should try to make the scheme work as effectively as possible. It was in that spirit that I moved the amendment. I believe that it is important that we should be given a good reason why, if the scheme is to be generally available, it should not be made available on the widest possible basis.

Mr. Brooke: The disadvantage in the proposal of the hon. Member for Sedgefield is that if the scheme were required to cover only 50 per cent. of employees to secure tax relief, the scheme would be much more selective and would not embrace the totality of the work force. I suspect that if it were the other way around, if we had come up with the figure of 50 per cent., the hon. Member for Sedgefield would have proposed 80 per cent. on the basis that the 50 per cent. could lead to artificially structured schemes.

Essentially, I believe that the proof of the pudding is in the eating. We put the figure of 80 per cent. in the Green Paper. The hon. Member for Sedgefield will be aware that we had a wide variety of comment on all aspects of the Green Paper, but few respondents saw any difficulty with the 80 per cent. requirement.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield that a blocking minority of 20·1 per cent. would be a complication. However, the Government believe that that complication would apply whatever the figure as there would still be a problem regarding what would happen on either side of the line.

The Government believe that 80 per cent. is a sensible figure to get the global advantages of the scheme within the employment unit. We did not receive significant objections to that figure during the consultation period. For that reason, we stand by that figure.

Mr. Blair: I believe that it is unfair to say that, had the Government suggested 50 per cent., I would have moved an amendment to the effect that we should make it 80 per cent. I moved this amendment on the basis that, if it were thought that profit-related pay was a good idea, it would be positively beneficial for those who were not working on profit-related pay to see how well those on profit-related pay were doing. Perhaps there would be an element of contagion. I accept the Minister's arguments. It is fairly clear that the figure of 80 per cent. has been plucked out of the air. However, as that figure was not objected to extremely strongly, other than in the terms mentioned by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), I am content to let the amendment fall.

Mr. Brooke: I failed to answer one other question that was raised in the course of the debate regarding "employees to whom the scheme relates".
That is defined in clause 1(2) which states:

"References in this Chapter to the employees to whom a profit-related pay scheme relates are references to the employees who will receive any payments of profit-related pay under the scheme."

Mr. Blair: I am grateful to the Minister for his reply. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

6.45 pm

Mr. Blair: I beg to move amendment No. 34 in, page 73, line 28, after 'must', insert
'in the view of the Board'.

I entirely accept that, given all the comments made about the powers of the Inland Revenue in an earlier amendment, this should demonstrate the degree of objectivity I have towards the Inland Revenue. This amendment would, if anything, give the Inland Revenue greater powers than it would otherwise possess.

The purpose of this amendment is to ask the Minister whether he is satisfied with the Government's anti-avoidance provisions. The Institute of Personnel Management and others have recognised that one of the difficulties with the profit-related pay scheme is the potential for tax avoidance.

I vaguely recall in my dim and distant youth—long before I got to the House of Commons—that there were debates on incomes policy and how the pay that people received could effectively be related to productivity. There were all sorts of arguments about how people could get round the rules that related to wage structures.

With profit-related pay there is a clear potential for avoidance unless the Inland Revenue is extremely careful that the profit and loss accounts give a fair and true view. I know that there are a myriad of different arguments advanced in relation to proper auditing and accounting procedures. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) will know more about that than I do. However, it is the case that when one is computing pay on the basis of profit and when tax relief is given, there is clear scope for avoidance.

The purpose of this probing amendment is to ask the Minister for his assurance that the rules are drawn as tight as possible to minimise the risk of avoidance.

Mr. Brooke: Obviously, the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has drawn attention to a central issue and I shall therefore reply at some length.

Paragraph 19 of the schedule deals with how the measure of profit for profit-related pay purposes is to be ascertained. Essentially, a profit and loss account must be produced that follows the rules and requirements of schedule 4 to the Companies Act 1985, which governs the production of a profit and loss account by a company. This provision ensures a standard approach to the production of such accounts using widely accepted rules. The Companies Act 1985 also requires a profit and loss account to show a "true and fair" view of the profit. That is broadly understood as an accounting concept and it is central to a qualified accountant's duty that he establishes that the accounts meet that requirement.

There is no requirement in the 1985 Act that any Government body should confirm that the account produced under that legislation meets the "true and fair" criterion. To insert such a requirement in the profit-related pay legislation would have the effect of supplanting the approach adopted in these proposals for ensuring a minimum of official intervention in the day-to-day operation of registeredschemes and relying on independent accountants to verify the adequacy of profit-related pay accounts and the operation of profit-related pay schemes. It would place a major burden on the Inland Revenue and increase substantially the administrative complexity of the scheme for the employer as well as for the Revenue. In any event, the Revenue will have the power to call for a check on profit-related pay accounts under clause 13, which the hon. Member for Sedgefield will recall vividly, whenever it believes that to be necessary.

The amendment would leave the provisions for an independent accountant's audit in place. We see the provisions as adequte. The statement that a profit is or is not "true and fair" will be made by the independent accountant, not by the employer, as such a statement cannot be made authoritatively by a person unqualified in audit matters. Who may act as independent accountant is closely constrained by clause 17. The individual must be properly qualified and must not be closely connected with the scheme. The statement of a "true and fair" view is one that we have taken pains to make independent of the employer concerned. The employer is responsible for all profit-related pay matters, and he must obtain and submit to the Revenue a report by an independent and properly qualified accountant.

If the hon. Member for Sedgefield is concerned that the employer is the person who decides what is or is not "true and fair", I trust that this explanation of objective and external reference allays his fears. The Government feel that there is no point in introducing another level of checking by the Inland Revenue, which could only adopt the same principles of accountancy and audit as those that would be adopted under this proposed legislation by the independent accountant.

Mr. Tim Smith: I wanted to hear what my hon. Friend the Paymaster General had to say about the amendment before commenting briefly upon it. I like the novel idea that is incorporated in it, that the Inland Revenue would offer its own view on whether the accounts showed a "true and fair view". Even if we were to give the Revenue that power, we would not strengthen its hand. Pretty high standards of accounting are required and the accounts will have to comply in all respects with company law.

There will have to be an independent auditors' certificate that will state whether the auditors consider that the accounts show a "true and fair view". That happens a great deal now and I have no doubt that the Revenue takes a view on the firm of accountants concerned. Firms of accountants, like other undertakings, vary in quality and the Revenue will not rely on the accounts that are presented. It can always demand further information, and we know from a previous debate that it has substantial powers to do so. It will not accept unchallenged the statement that the accounts give a "true and fair view" and conclude from that that there are no further questions to be asked. It will always have the opportunity to go behind that statement, and I think that that will happen in practice. Although the amendment contains an interesting and novel idea, it probably is not necessary.

Mr. Blair: I largely accept the statement of the Paymaster General and the comments of the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith). I thought it right—this is still my view — that we should not leave our consideration of profit-related pay, and especially the schedule that deals with its implementation, without making it clear that every measure that can reasonably be taken is taken to ensure that there is not tax avoidance. It is clear that there are opportunities for tax avoidance when a scheme such as that proposed by the Government is introduced. I hope that the rules that appear in schedule 3 balance adequately the rights of individuals with the rights of the Revenue to act successfully and adequately on behalf of the taxpayer. In view of what the Minister has said, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Question proposed, That this schedule be the first schedule to the Bill.

Mr. Tim Smith: The firm to which I referred in an earlier debate has three further concerns about the schedule. We have passed over paragraphs 13 and 14, which deal with the two profit-sharing formulae, and anyone who considers the text of those paragraphs will agree, I am sure, that they are extremely complex. Surely it is desirable that the formulae for determining profits should be as simple as possible. It is obviously desirable that participants should be able to understand them easily. The firm that is concerned about these matters considers paragraph 14 to be almost unintelligible. I wonder why it is necessary for the formulae to be so complex.

Secondly, the firm says that the 80 per cent. rule that we discussed earlier effectively precludes the 750 or more companies that have already implemented equity-linked profit-sharing plans under the Finance Act 1978 from offering employees participation either in that plan or in the new profit-linked pay arrangements. I am not sure whether that is exactly what the firm means, and it may be that it is trying to say that if a compny participates already in the 1978 arrangements it cannot participate in these arrangements. I do not know whether that is true and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to deal with the matter. The firm may have it completely wrong. It is alleging that there are two mutually contradictory profit-related plans on offer.

Thirdly, the firm says that it must be appreciated that lower-paid employees who have previously participated in a trust-related profit-sharing plan under which no national insurance deductions were made will receive less cash under the new arrangement than under the old scheme. The firm contends that while a fellow of All Souls may be able to make the distinction between a national insurance deduction and an income tax liability—there may be a few others who are able to do so—the majority will not. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to deal with these three issues.

Mr. Blair: First, I wish, like the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), to draw attention to the complexity of the two formulae for determining the distributable pool of profits. I found them to verge on the incomprehensible.

I think that I understand the basic principles in method A and method B. It appears that under method A the pool is equal to a fixed percentage of the profits of the employment unit in the profit period. Method B is based on the first profit period to which the scheme relates, or the distributable pool for the previous profit period. In other words, that method fixes a base year by which the distributable pool is to be computed.

I should like to know what steps the Treasury intends to take to make the schemes more understandable to those who will be called upon to use them. If profit-related pay is to be encouraged, I hope that it will not be a privilege that is confined to those employed by large companies. It must be open to small companies as well. There are many small companies with 10 or 15 employees that will read schedule 3, and whatever greater productivity arises through profit-related pay will be negated immediately by the time that the firm has to spend discovering how to administer the scheme.

I do not fully take on board the points made by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield about the employee share ownership plan. I cannot see any inconsistency, although there may be one, but that is obviously something to which it is right for us to address our minds.

I should be grateful if the Minister could inform us of the steps that he will take to ensure that people can understand and administer the schemes easily. We may have the greatest theories and plans, but if they are difficult to implement in practice, they will be of little practical use.

Mr. Brooke: My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) asked me several questions relating to correspondence that I too have had the pleasure of seeing, and I shall respond to his questions. The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) asked me some specific questions in reinforcement of the profit sharing formulae.

I shall respond first to the questions raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield about the overlap of the schemes and their potential complications. The Committee knows that tax incentives for share schemes already exist, but the new tax relief is for cash. For it to be effective in terms of pay flexibility, the relief must be targeted on employees in business units in which the great majority of employees participate in a PRP scheme. We discussed this point a moment or two ago. There is, of course, nothing to stop a separate share scheme from running at the same time and in that case the benefits would be complementary. However, it would be quite wrong to try to combine into a single scheme the different tax incentives for share schemes with those that are proposed for profit-related pay. The result would be a muddle and it is, and would be, unnecessary to try to do that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield raised the subject of method A and method B, which are described in the correspondence as the complex profit-sharing formulae. The hon. Member for Sedgefield also alluded to that. There is a paradox in that the simpler and more flexible one seeks to make the arrangements, the relatively more complicated is the legislation. However, when employers have had some time to grow to know and to love this legislation, I am sure that they will acknowledge that under its umbrella, a fundamental flexibility and simplicity exists.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield raised the question of the ways in which we could make the schemes simpler, although I do not know whether he acknowledges the paradox that I have just explained. However, we shall pay attention to that. I referred earlier to the guidance notes that the Inland Revenue is to send out. We shall seek to explore whether there is a way in which we can provide a child's guide element.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield returned to the issue of national insurance contribution and said that some employees would be worse off as a result of the changes. However, that is a separate issue. The decision to withdraw certain concessions that relate to trusts, which flow out of what has happened since the 1985 changes to the upper earnings limit, is unrelated to the propositions that we are now considering. Some of the literature and some of the representations that have been made have missed some of the fundamental points about the schemes in quoting the sums of money that would be at risk or that would be involved in terms of the changes that we are making. That is an unrelated issue. I hope that those companies that have a tradition of profit-related pay will feel able to embrace the arrangements that are contained in this legislation for the generality of their employees and assuming that they take the fullest advantage of the profit-related pay arrangements, they should be able to do very satisfactorily.

Question put and agreed to.

Schedule 1 agreed to.

Clause 18

REGISTRATION

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: With clause 18, we come to the issue of personal pension schemes. I am acutely aware that I have stumbled into an area in which there are many experts. I do not count myself among them. I gather that we shall hear from the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) about some of the amendments that he has tabled. I simply want to ask the Minister—I thought that this might be an appropriate time to do so—to tell us something about the scheme outlined in this chapter.

As I understand it, the Social Security Act 1986 has given birth to the present provisions. This tax regime follows on from the changes in pensions that were made in the 1986 Act, under which there was the right to opt out of occupational pension schemes and to have a personal pension instead. I need not rehearse the arguments about that or about whether greater mobility would be enjoyed by people being able to opt out and, on the other side, about whether that would mean that the younger people in the pension scheme would end up financing the older ones, and the difficulties that might arise for the pension schemes in such circumstances.

As I understand it, at the present time, the provisions will come into force in January of next year—somebody who is self-employed can buy what are called section 226 policies. The provisions in the Finance Bill substantially re-enact some of those section 226 rules and ensure that the pension schemes for the self-employed and for employees are brought together. I should like the Minister to outline briefly the main changes that would be made by this part of the Bill. As I understand it, these provisions essentially reflect the changes that took place in social security legislation in 1986, together with certain new matters that have been introduced into the Finance Bill, including many that simply translate into law some procedures that are already practised by the Inland Revenue.

The provisions also introduce the lump sum limit of £150,000 and certain restrictions on the amount of lump sum that can be paid on retirement. Obviously, that is extremely important to millions of people. I did not think it right to allow the first clause in this new chapter to go by without at least raising some of the more general matters.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I had intended to raise on clause 19 the points that I think I might equally appropriately raise under this clause, but since I did, in fact, table an amendment to line 29 of clause 18, which did not have the good fortune to be selected by the Chair, I hope that I shall not be speaking out of order if I deal in a general way with the expression "the Board" which appears at the beginning of this section.

The amendment which I tabled—I do not wish to dwell on it in a way that will vex the Chair—which did not make the selection——

The Temporary Chairman (Miss Janet Fookes): Order. The hon. Gentleman must not dwell on it at all. It was not selected.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I anticipated that rebuke, and I intend to comply totally with the Chair's ruling. I had intended to draw attention to the fact that "the Board" here is assumed to be the board of the Inland Revenue. However, there is the Occuptional Pensions Board, which also has status in connection with private personal schemes. I rather wonder whether here, in the Finance Bill, the Treasury is right to arrogate, as it is seeking to do, to the Inland Revenue what appears to be the primary status of controlling authority, when the Occupational Pensions Board exists and also, simultaneously with the consideration of the Finance Bill, the House has been presented with no fewer than 20 statutory instruments emanating from the DHSS, which also seek to regulate the way in which these schemes are run.

I accept that the Revenue must be the authority which grants the tax haven status to personal pension schemes, but I wonder whether all that follows in this long chapter of personal pension schemes is the property of the Inland Revenue to decide. I rather wonder whether it is in the best interests of these schemes that it should be the Inland Revenue that takes the primary status. I believe that it would be highly desirable if the Revenue were to drop the practice of regulating pension schemes minutely and were to leave it either to the Occupational Pensions Board or to the DHSS using the different methods that have grown up under those Departments to regulate these schemes. Therefore, I rather wonder whether one is entirely happy with the entire tenor of clause 18.

We should simplify the rules that operate in connection with personal pension schemes to the absolute bare minimum. That is not the Inland Revenue practice. Under its guidance, the rules affecting pension schemes have proliferated to a terribly burdensome extent over the past 50 years or more. I believe that extreme simplicity of legislation should be accepted by the House as a virtue in its own right of the greatest possible importance, particularly when dealing with small employers and private citizens, as we are when we are discussing personal schemes. It would be a great mistake if we started off by making the whole apparatus of control, which must be considered, so complex that almost everybody is likely to be frightened off unless they can afford professional advice.

On questions of procedure, the appointment and conduct of trustees, for example, and routine management of the trust, it would be far better to leave it to the OPB as it is expert in this area and is bent on the promotion of these schemes, rather than the restriction of opportunities for saving which these schemes are intended to offer. But that is not the Inland Revenue's way.

On the question of the various obligations of the parties —the employer and employee—I would would be happy for the DHSS to operate because it looks at these schemes on the basis of the maximum and minimum contributions which are appropriate. The Inland Revenue's way is to set limits on the benefits which emanate and that really is incompatible with the conception of the money purchase schemes which lies behind the Government's intention.

When one speaks to professionals in this area—I am sorry to say this, but I have to—one finds that they regard the Inland Revenue as a menace to the occupational pensions movement. They regard it as a burden and wish that the dual control system which has grown up could be ended. The Inland Revenue is now more concerned to prevent people from exploiting the advantages of tax haven status than to promote thrift and a habit of saving for retirement.

Where the two thirds limit is concerned, which is what the Inland Revenue seeks to apply to the annuities which emanate from these schemes, why should it be important what the pension is in relation to the final salary of the beneficiary? In the end the taxpayer recovers his share which has grown up in the fund, because the system on which all these schemes operate—the tax haven status which we are giving to these schemes—is the basis of save now, pay tax later. The beneficiary pays tax later on the annuity, so why do we seek to restrict these schemes?

I know that there is a reason, and that is because the lump sum option appears in these new proposals just as it does in the occupational pension schemes, which no doubt we shall deal with in due course when we reach schedule 3. The right way for the Inland Revenue to tackle that problem is to introduce new thinking on the tax-free status of the lump sum. I have tried to make a contribution on this before.

I would like my right hon. Friend the Minister to tell me whether he genuinely insists that it is the Inland Revenue that is the prime authority in view of the shadow that that will cast over the private pensions movement, and if this attitude of the Inland Revenue is not changed.

7.15 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) invited me to outline the proposals on personal pensions in this part of the Bill. I am aware that it is difficult for me to respond to his request without, by implication, going a little beyond clause 18, although it introduces the provisions of Part II. The hon. Gentleman is right about how the new provisions follow the section 226 regime but with improvements in that there are new higher contribution limits for older people and employers' contributions may be made to personal pensions, which was not possible with retirement annuities.

The provisions implement the promises made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget statement—first, that the new personal pensions would have the same tax treatment as is enjoyed by retirement annuities and, secondly, that much greater transferability of pension rights would be possible between different types of pension arrangement. Therefore, the legislation completes the major programme of pensions reform which was announced by the Secretary of State for Social Services.

The provisions were originally included in the Finance Bill introduced earlier this year. Several technical amendments have been made, but it is essentially the same as was proposed in April. The new regime for personal pensions was outlined in a consultative document published by the Inland Revenue last November. I have referred to the changes that have been made, which include a wider range of pension providers, to include building societies, banks, and unit trusts in addition to the present life offices and friendly societies; the ability for individuals to contract out of SERPS through a personal pension scheme; the provision for employers to contribute, if they wish, to their employees' personal pension schemes; and the same basic limit of 17·5 per cent. of income for younger people and a more generous scale of higher limits for those over 50, as now on contributions. I hope that in outlining the bones of this section, clauses 18 to 57, I have responded to the hon. Gentleman's request.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) has leapt straight into an area which is also referred to in a later amendment which he has tabled, so I have no doubt that he will pursue the theme and repeat some of the points that he made. He is concerned about the relationship between the Inland Revenue and the DHSS and the Occupational Pensions Board. We have discussed this on many occasions. He believes that there is a conflict between the objectives of the Revenue and the DHSS. Naturally, many Government Departments sometimes think that they are in conflict with the Inland Revenue or the Treasury and, indeed, sometimes they have different objectives.

The Inland Revenue is responsible under the powers conferred on it by the Finance Act 1970 for administering the tax regime for pensions. As my hon. Friend always acknowleges in his speeches on this subject, these tax reliefs are extremely generous. Indeed, he has suggested that they should be called pension trusts and he frequently uses the phrase "tax haven" when referring to pension funds. For the reasons he gave, the Inland Revenue is concerned about the cost of these generous limits, so the tax rules set levels of maximum benefit.

On the other hand, the DHSS rules are primarily concerned with the level of benefits which an occupational pension scheme must provide if it is to be contracted out of the additional component of the state scheme. That is to say that the Inland Revenue is responsible for the tax approval rules while the DHSS and the OPB have their own requirements for contracting out only which applies to employees in occupational pension schemes.

The DHSS, as I have said, is concerned with the level of benefits that an occupational scheme must provide if it is to be contracted out of the additional components of the state scheme. The requirements of the DHSS concern minimum levels of benefit. Between the minimum benefits required by the DHSS and the maximum benefits imposed by the Inland Revenue, there is considerable scope for occupational schemes to offer whatever level of benefit seems appropriate without Government interference, although there is a danger that Revenue rules would restrict DHSS minimum benefits, for example in relation to preserved benefits to which Revenue rules do not apply.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington would prefer to see a maximum benefit requirement on all final salary pension schemes. However, that takes us way beyond clause 18. I am sure that my hon. Friend will rehearse his arguments and concern about some types of pension being limited by contributions and others limited by benefit, all of which he sees as examples of the lack of integration. He has heard my views on these matters before. I have tried to explain why that has happened and why I believe that to some extent it is still unavoidable. I know that I have not persuaded my hon. Friend about this, but I think that he understands the position and I know that he would like to see the whole area of pensions radically reformed. No doubt my hon. Friend will come to that point later.

I know that I will not deflect my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington, but I am bound to say that, after so many changes in pensions in recent years, there are some who feel that a period of calm and stability is desirable. However, my hon. Friend has been a great campaigner on all those issues for many years. He has a very lucid and coherent view of what the whole pensions regime should look like. Basically, he believes that we should start off on an entirely different basis.

I should not really respond to all the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington. We will have specific debates on the lump sum later and my hon. Friend can develop his philosophy about that and its tax exemption. I have tried to respond to my hon. Friend about the different roles of the Revenue and the DHSS. I do not believe that there is a great conflict which my hon. Friend has described. However, I know that he wants to see the whole system established on an entirely different basis.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I would like to take the opportunity to thank my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury for his remarks. He has penetrated to the core of what I was saying. In this country we have a public sector pension scheme which is extremely handsome. However, the private sector is really paltry by comparison in all too many cases. Therefore, we ought to be accentuating the positive which will be encouraging people to put in better and better schemes rather than to think mainly in terms of ways in which we can restrict the savings habit from becoming too exuberant.

I do not like to be critical of the board of the Inland Revenue, because the way in which it approaches its task is immensely dedicated, as it is a dry and often very detailed business. It takes the Revenue into areas that are sometimes barely comprehensible. There is an important job to be done in avoidance work with regard to fraud and outrageous abuse of well-intentioned concessions.

Moreover, I do not think that the board ought to be eliminated entirely from the scene; it would be an exaggeration if I gave that impression. Indeed, in a later amendment I hope to use the board's discretionary power to promote the idea of transferability at long last at the full value of the beneficiary's asset. I do not want it thought that I do not want the Inland Revenue board to have a place in the regulatory scene.

I took the opportunity to make my point because I feel that we need to put more emphasis on the positive aspects. The positive aspects are emphasised by the DHSS approach of placing minimum levels of contribution rather than maximum levels of benefit. I do not wish to pursue that matter or to stand in the way of the Committee and its further consideration of these clauses.

Clause 20

ESTABLISHMENT OF SCHEMES

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I beg to move amendment

No. 41, in clause 20, page 12, line 5, at end insert 'after consultation with the Occupational Pensions Board'.

Amendment 41 requires the Treasury, before amending section 20, to consult the Occupational Pensions Board. I express reservations about the role of the Inland Revenue in the pensions scene and I have my reservations about the Occupational Pensions Board too. I am afraid that on a number of issues on which I hoped that it would speak out clearly and strongly, it has appeared to be rather pusillanimous and vacillating, possibly because it is not quite sure whether it is expected to respond to guidance from the Inland Revenue or from the DHSS. Nevertheless, that body has been set up and it has a status that is very important for occupational pension schemes and I think that it should be made to rise to its responsibilities and should be encouraged to do so.

Clause 20(4) states:

"The Treasury may by order amend this section as it has effect for the time being."

That places in the hands of the Treasury a very substantial power particularly as clause 20(5) states:

"An order under this section shall be made by statutory instrument, which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Commons."

Unfortunately, hon. Members who study statutory instruments and the way in which the House deals with them know that again and again, once the statutory instrument is in print that is really the end of the matter and although hon. Members may have reservations they cannot voice them, as was the case sadly with the 20 statutory instruments tabled last week by the DHSS, and with all too many statutory instruments laid under provisions of this kind.

I hope that, even if the House of Commons is unlikely to have any say in what the Treasury does in amending the section, proper consultations will take place with the Occupational Pensions Board. I must announce to the Committee that the example before us this week is not very optimistic. I am referring to the report from the Occupational Pensions Board in relation to statutory instrument number 1105 which is now before the House entitled "Occupational Pension Schemes (Disclosure of Information) (Amendment) Regulations 1987".

I do not know how many hon. Members have gone so far as to read the comments in the report. I thought that they might have some relevance to the debate.

Indeed, I discovered that they had relevance when I read what the Occupational Pensions Board had to say on the draft statutory instrument submitted to it for comment. The board's comments are dated 3 June 1987 and are alarmingly trenchant. The report ends as a sad story. I hope that I am not detaining the Committee too much if I read just the comments made by the board with regard to regulations 2(5) and 2(11). The report states:

"Regulation 2(5) requires the information introduced into Schedule 2 of the principle regulations to be furnished on request to any member of a tax-approved scheme. We believe that these requirements for information about additional voluntary contributions are incapable of being met and are likely to prove to be completly unacceptable to the pensions industry and trustees. To determine the maximum amount of AVCs that a member may make the scheme would need to have full details of remuneration (including overtime earnings and benefits in kind) and this information would often not be available to the administrators. It could be misleading to members to quote the maximum tax-deductible AVC if payments of AVCs at this level could result in the Inland Revenue benefit levels being exceeded. There is another potential problem. The Government have announced their intention that scheme members should be free to pay AVCs to schemes other than their own occupational pension scheme. If this proposal is implemented, it would mean that scheme trustees and managers would have no control over the payment of these AVCs or of the benefits that they produce. We therefore believe the practical considerations of actually providing the information required would make this provision unworkable."

7.30 pm

In the same report, we read the reply, dated July 1987, on behalf of the Secretary of State:

"As regards paragraph 7 of the Board's report, regulations prescribing the information to be provided about additional voluntary contributions will not be made until the Board of Inland Revenue have published any requirements that they may have in regard to such contributions."

We read in the revised, summer Finance Bill, that, notwithstanding that type of extremely trenchant comment from the Occupational Pensions Board, which may presumably be regarded as the most expert in the field, the dogs may bark but the caravan moves on. So far as we can read in the Bill, the Inland Revenue has simply repeated the unacceptable recommendations which appeared before the House in the first Finance Bill this year, and which aroused a great deal of adverse comment from the professionals at that time. If, in regard to anything as important as this, the Revenue is simply not prepared to listen to the Occupational Pensions Board, and the DHSS abdicates its role and leaves the Revenue to carry on as it pleases, how much hope have we that, when the Treasury exercises the power that the Committee is about to grant it under the subsection, there will be any closer liaison in the future?

I hope that the Committee will agree that it would be a good idea at this stage to write in the requirement for consultation with the Occupational Pensions Board when the clause is amended by statutory instrument.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) on his assiduity and research in digging out the report of the Occupational Pensions Board. We shall probably discuss the relationship of AVCs to scheme limits on a later amendment. It may be more appropriate then to discuss the practicalities of observing the final salary scheme limits and discussing the extent to which they are endangered by the AVC proposals, or the extent to which the proposals may be criticised on grounds of practicality.

The purpose of the amendment is to require the Treasury to consult the Occupational Pensions Board before making an order to amend clause 20. I think that the amendment is unnecessary. Clause 20 sets out which bodies may establish personal pension schemes. The main purpose of the Treasury order would be to extend the range of personal pension providers, if and when that seems appropriate, without having to introduce primary legislation in a future Finance Bill.

If such an order were being made, we should naturally consult the OPB, and any other interested body, if appropriate. But the OPB would not always be the appropriate body to consult. The board is responsible for certain aspects of occupational pension schemes, in particular contracting-out rules and the preservation of deferred benefits. It is not a general pensions watchdog and it is not necessarily equipped to act as such.

We might, for example, be dealing simply with pensions for the self-employed, in which event it might not necessarily be appropriate for us to consult the board. In many cases, we would consult the board, but I would resist the idea of writing such consultation into the legislation.

The regulations are primarily a DHSS matter, concerning the requirement on scheme administrators to disclose information to members about the scope to pay AVCs. They are not strictly tax matters, although, as my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington spotted immediately, they have some relevance to the relationship between AVCs and benefit limits. We shall discuss that later.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: My right hon. Friend is right in saying that some of my remarks were wide of the immediate context of clause 20. I took the opportunity of pointing to a place where it seemed to me that the relationship between the OPC and the Revenue had already broken down, which could not possibly refer to the particular interests found in clause 20.

I do not wish to press the amendment, because I hope that what I have said may have had a small effect, at all events, in advancing the cause of the OPB as a body that ought to be taken seriously and should play a serious role. This was the first opportunity that presented itself in the Bill for me to make the points that I have sought to make, and if they went somewhat wide of the clause, I apologise.

Having made that point—I see that my right hon. Friend has taken it on board—I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: I should like clarification of one small point. There may be a very straightforward answer. The purpose of clause 20, as the Financial Secretary rightly said, is to give a list of new pension providers. I understand that some of those—for example, the banks—are already engaged indirectly in the provision of pensions. How much real change does the clause make regarding the bodies able to provide pensions? Are many of these institutions, albeit indirectly, already providing pensions, or is the measure of a much wider nature?

Mr. Norman Lamont: It is a considerable change. In future, direct providers will include not just banks—the hon. Gentleman suggested that they were already providing pensions indirectly, and I suppose that that is right—but building societies and authorised unit trusts. The clause also provides for other types of provider to be authorised subsequently by the Treasury. For example, it is possible that investment trusts may provide personal pensions in the future. At present, the business can be carried out only by life assurance companies and certain friendly societies.

This considerable change is very much in keeping with the breaking down of divisions that we are seeing in the City and in financial markets generally. However, I do not think that its significance can be underestimated.

Mr. Blair: I am grateful to the Financial Secretary. I was uncertain about how far some of the institutions were already engaged in providing pensions, but it is clear that there will be considerable changes.

The Financial Secretary spoke about investment trusts. Has the Treasury certain types of institution already in mind which it might allow, using its power under subsection (4), to carry on such business, or is the power to be held in reserve?

Mr. Norman Lamont: The power will be used largely in response to representations. I referred to investment trusts only as an example. We made several changes in the clause in response to representations, and I imagine that any further widening will be based on representations from those in the market place who wish to get into this business. It is not a question of us wishing to impose it; it is more a question of the people who wish to join the pensions industry—one can think of many institutions—coming to us. We have not yet worked out the plans.

Clause 21

SCOPE OF BENEFITS

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I think that I am right in saying, but I ask my right hon. Friend to reassure me, that the provisions of clause 21 cover Government approved personal pension schemes, provided that they comply with the conditions laid down in paragraphs (a) to (e)—that is, the conditions elaborated in clauses 22, 23, 24, 25 and 26. Would I be right in thinking that if they are contracted-out schemes, they are also regulated by the 20 statutory instruments which emanated last week from the DHSS? If I am making an ignorant mistake, I hope that my right hon. Friend will forgive me, but I think I am right in saying that contracted-out schemes would fall under both sets of conditions. If that assumption is correct, may we hear to what extent these provisions have been agreed with the DHSS so as to make certain that there is no risk of incompatibility with the conditions laid out in the 20 statutory instruments?

Mr. Norman Lamont: The answer to my hon. Friend's question is yes. They are controlled in this double way. Clause 21 is just an introductory provision. The answer to my hon. Friend's second question is also yes. These matters have been discussed and agreed with the DHSS.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Can we take it that there is no risk of any of the provisions in the clauses of this Finance Bill producing any friction or incompatibility with what has emanated from the DHSS?

Mr. Norman Lamont: That is what I was seeking to imply to my hon. Friend. That is the objective, and we hope that it has been achieved.

Mr. Blair: As I understand it, the Financial Secretary is saying that there would be no conflict between the statutory instruments and the provisions in the statute. If there was such a conflict, I presume that the provisions of the Finance Bill would prevail.

Subsection (2) states that nothing in subsection (1) will prevent the approval of a scheme

"which makes provision for insurance against a risk related to the non-payment of contributions."

Does that refer to cases where, for example, due to illness someone is unable to contribute for a period? Is that insured against under the terms of the scheme? Does that represent a change from the present law?

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am advised that the answer to the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question is yes. I am afraid that I do not know whether it is a change. Clause 21 relates to benefits from voluntary contributions only. Protected rights from minimum contributions is a separate matter for the DHSS. There is no incompatibility.

Clause 22

ANNUITY TO MEMBER

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

7.45 pm

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I declare an interest as a practising insurance broker. What advice will the Treasury give to life assurance companies with regard to clause 22(2) in respect of existing retirement annuity contracts? If in this legislation we are introducing a new minimum retiring age of 50, which I greatly welcome, what will happen to existing retirement annuity contracts? Some guidance on the question will be necessary either today or in the future.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Subsection (2) stipulates that a member's annuity must normally commence between the ages of 50 and 75. But subsection (3) permits commencement before the age of 50 if a member retires early through ill health or incapacity, or if the board is satisfied that his occupation is one in which people customarily retire early.

Mr. Greenway: Perhaps I have not made the point clear. As my right hon. Friend will know, under the 226 and 227 1970 regulations, the minimum pension age is 60. We are now introducing a new concept. I greatly welcome the fact that we are reducing the age to 50, but it will create a dilemma with regard to practice between now and 4 January next year. Should people be advised to wait until next January to obtain an earlier age, or will the Inland Revenue accept an earlier retirement age applied to existing retirement annuity contracts?

Mr. Lamont: Existing retirement annuities will continue on the same basis, but I am advised that they will be able to convert to personal pension plans. That is all that I can tell my hon. Friend at this stage. But I understand his point about whether the new conditions should apply to those who invest in annuities between now and January next year and what advice they should be given. I shall try to make available more precise information to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Greenway: I am most grateful.

Mr. Blair: The hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) has made an important point. The present age limit is 60, and subsection (2) would change it to 50. Will subsection (3), which allows the annuity to commence even before age 50, translate into legislation what already exists in practice? My understanding is that it does not. As a result of subsection (3), the annuity will commence before age 50 if it is payable on the person becoming incapable through infirmity of body or mind of carrying on his work or if the board is satisfied that the occupation is one in which people customarily retire before that age. I understood that if the board could be persuaded that people normally retired young in an occupation, it would allow the annuity to be paid before age 60.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am sorry that I cannot answer the point put by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). I undertake to make the position clear to him.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Subsection 22(5)(a) refers to the marriage of the annuitant as being one of the reasons why an annuity may terminate after the death of a member. Clauses 24 and, I think, 25 refer to what happens to annuities after the death of a member. I do not want to rule out the possibility of my raising a point concerning clause 24 by failing to put down a marker here. This matter appears to be foreshadowed in clause 22(5)(a)

Clause 23

LUMP SUM TO MEMBER

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I beg to move amendment No. 40, in page 13, line 15, leave out subsection (4).

The Temporary Chairman: With this, I propose to group amendment No. 39, in page 13, line 15, leave out '£150,000', and insert '£156,000'.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I am grateful for the generosity shown by the Chair in allowing me to move so many amendments. I hope that I can deal with amendment No. 40 as quickly as possible and that I shall not weary the Committee too much. This matter concerns lump sums emanating from the new personal pension schemes. A similar matter arises in schedule 3 in respect of existing schemes which may in future give lump sums of more than

I am not happy with this provision. Although there are not many people who are able to reach a salary of £100,000 a year, and therfore qualify for a lump sum of £150,000, I do not like introducing discrimination against any particular group in the way clause 23 undoubtedly does, for no evident moral purpose. I tabled amendment No. 39, which proposes that the sum be £156,000 rather than £150,000. I think that my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary would be hard put to explain why £150,000 is the chosen figure and why £156,000 would not be almost equally good.

I did not pluck the figure of £156,000 out of the air. I suggested it because it corresponds to £2,000 a week, a round figure. The Treasury has to explain why it decided that this is the point after which people become second-rate citizens. Not withstanding the conditions of their scheme, they will not be allowed the benefit of a tax-free lump sum such as that given to someone who has arranged his affairs in such a way that the tax-free sum is £149,000.

I do not like discrimination against the better-off. It is not a particularly Conservative principle. I am horrified to find this arbitrary and sudden recommendation appear in a Conservative Budget. That does not mean to say that I am happy with the tax-free lump sum. I spent a great deal of time in Standing Committee on the previous Finance Bill explaining how I thought it should be phased out. I do not think that a tax-free lump sum should have a place, because it attracts all kinds of consequences. It encourages people to commute their annuity for a lump sum, which they may not spend wisely. If they do spend it, it may simply force up house prices, because people have the benefit of a tax-free bonus which they can use in conjuncion with house purchase finance schemes of various kinds. They may do other things with this enormous tax-free lump sum which are not in the public interest.

The Inland Revenue is approaching this difficult matter in the wrong way in trying to victimise the top echelon of salary earners. I happen to be the Member of Parliament for Kensington and I dare say that there may be people in my constituency who will be affected by this clause. If so, they have not been in touch with me. In my opinion, this recommendation should not have appeared in the Budget. I should be very much happier if it did not appear in the part of the Finance Bill that refers to these new personal pension schemes. It is a pity that it is there. I hope that the Treasury agrees to think in other terms about the tax treatment of lump sums.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): I support my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams), although I do not necessarily congratulate the powers-that-be on selecting his amendments but not mine. I do not understand why amendment No. 3 was not selected because, as far as I know, it was not out of order. As I have some short experience of Finance Bills, I should have thought that that amendment could easily have been taken with my hon. Friend's amendments. I congratulate him on getting so many amendments covered. I must talk to him later to find out how he exercises the influence to effect that.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington that £150,000 is an arbitrary figure. I do not know why the Revenue has thought of £150,000. Why not make it £200,000? Since the average national wage is £10,000 a year, I should have thought that a salary last year of £100,000 was an extremely low amount to be considered in respect of lump sums. I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington about the amount of the pension that should be commuted. Spending the lump sum does not necessarily put up house prices. Normally, when a pension is commuted, the individual's mortage liabilities are immediately paid off and the balance of the money is then put into some sort of annuity or investment, so the commuted sum carries on after the individual dies.

I deplore the idea of reducing the commuted ceiling to £150,000. I accept the question of my hon Friend the Member for Kensington as to why the sum was not £156,000. I should have thought that, if the Government are to be logical — although they have plucked this figure out of the air with no logic—they could adopt the same logic as they do with personal allowances. The Rooker-Wise amendment — or, as I remind the Committee, the Rooker-Wise-Lawson amendment — gave us indexation at the beginning. My amendment, which as you realise, Miss Fookes, was not selected, called for the indexing of the £150,000 lump sum each year so that it does not decrease in value. My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington has suggested that the figure should be £156,000. I appreciate his logic in saying that it corresponds to £2,000 a week. I think that most Committee members would have worked that out. Actually, it is £3,000, not £2,000, a week.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: By my reckoning, £2,000 a week comes to £104,000 a year. As the lump sum is one and a half times the final salary, that brings it to £156,000.

Sir William Clark: That is right. I think that we have unaminity. Taking a basic sum of £2,000 a week, one and a half times that must make £3,000 a week, so the £156,000 lump sum equals £3,000 a week. I do not think that we should become involved in any more arguments about that. I assumed that my hon. Friend intended having some form of indexation in respect of the £150,000.

Why have the Government plucked this £100,000 out of the air, giving the £150,000 commuted amount? Why is the sum not indexed, as per the Rooker-Wise-Lawson amendment? Clause 23 states that the lump sum

"must not exceed £150,000 or such other sum" as the Treasury may prescribe. Will my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary confirm that, if the £150,000 is changed, it will only be changed upwards and not downwards?

8 pm

Mr. John Greenway: I endorse the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark). Will the Minister assure the Committee that the £150,000 will not be reduced by Treasury order? I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) on people taking all their money in tax-free cash. That is not the purpose of the provision. We see a reduction in the amount that can be commuted. Clause 23 (3) states:

"The lump sum must not exceed one quarter of the total value".

That is somewhat less than the present practice under the existing retirement annuity arrangements, and it is to be regretted.

Mr. Blair: I wish only briefly to disturb the argument that is going on between the Government Back Bench and Front Bench and to defend the Chancellor against the accusations of Socialism that have been made against him in introducing the £150,000 limitation. On Second Reading of the Finance Bill, the Financial Secretary described the lump sum as a tax-free perk. That seems to sum up the position. The generosity is in having such a high limit at all. In some ways, it is difficult to see how one justifies it.

Hon. Members are perfectly entitled to press the Minister on how the Treasury intends to use the powers that it will be given. The Treasury is given a completely free hand to decide what it wants to do—it could raise it, reduce it, or do whatever it wants. We should at least have some outline of how it intends to exercise that power.

[Mr. Blair]

I do not promise that the Opposition will support the Treasury if it decides to give that outline, but it is a little unsatisfactory to leave the matter as open and vague as it is at present.

Mr. Norman Lamont: On Second Reading, I described our thinking on the lump sum. No doubt Hansard will clarify whether I described it as a tax-free perk, but I made it clear that the Government and I regard pension funds that qualify for extremely generous tax reliefs as being primarily for the provision of pensions. The lump sum has been debated many times before; it has its critics and supporters, particularly in the industry. I recall that, on one occasion, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor used the phrase

"the much loved lump sum".

My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) thinks that we should tackle the anomaly, problem or tax-free perk — however one wants to describe it—in a different way. His view is that it should be taxed. We have left it alone, and various assurances were given in the past by my right hon. Friend about what would or what would not constitute Green Paper territory.

There is no doubt, as my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington said in Committee during pre-election deliberations on the Finance Bill, that people use the lump sum provision in all sorts of ways, particularly when combined with accelerated accrual provisions. Notwithstanding the changes that we are making, it is still possible to use different accelerated accrual provisions in combination with the lump sum. People are getting tax deductions for contributions to pension funds, and they get a tax-free sum at the end. We certainly felt that it was not wrong that there should be a cap on the lump sum.

My hon. Friends have perfectly fairly asked me why £150,000, why not £150,000·02, or something like that.

Mr. Blair: It is a round number.

Mr. Lamont: It is a round number, says the hon. Member for Sedgefield. By any standard, it is a generous figure. My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) suggested that, perhaps, it should be indexed. Notwithstanding what happens to personal allowances, it is our general stance, in a time of low inflation and at a time when we intend that inflation should remain low, to resist general indexation provisions. It is our intention to keep on top of inflation rather than to build indexation into large parts of fiscal legislation.

In response to the point that is worrying my hon. Friends, I repeat the assurance that I gave before the election. I said that, from time to time, we shall examine the limit and that we did not wish to see the limit eroded. I repeat that statement for the benefit of the Committee, and I hope that it will satisfy my hon. Friends, even if my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington is not entirely at one with me on the approach to the problem.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I am sure that the House is grateful to my right hon. Friend. I intervene in the debate again because he made one remark about my own position which I cannot allow to stand. He said that I am against the tax-free lump sum—just in so many words. I do not believe in retrospective legislation for pension schemes. When someone has already served 20, 30 or more years in a pension scheme in the confident expectation that, on retirement, he or she will be eligible for a commuted annuity to be taken in the form of a tax-free lump sum, we should not intervene. That was suggested by the Treasury some three or four years ago, when it received an extremely negative response from the public.

I do not think that we should say that, notwithstanding the fact that they have worked all those years in that expectation, that expectation should now be taken away. That is why I made the suggestion, which I elaborated at some length in Committee during consideration of the Finance Bill before the election. It is only in so far as entitlement accrues in future years that the ability to apply the tax provisions when a pension is commuted for a lump sum should apply.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will look again at my suggestion that the amendment is the right solution and that clause 23 is the wrong one. We should give everybody equal treatment. We should not discriminate against people on high salaries. That is an absolutely wrong principle. If the Treasury were to adopt my approach, it would be 40 years before we reached the stage at which the lump sum option became totally taxable. In my estimation, that is a long enough period for people who have relied on the tax-free lump sum to make their adjustments. That is why the Treasury is entirely wrong in proceeding in this way. I do not feel able to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 24

ANNUITY AFTER DEATH OF MEMBER

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I beg to move amendment No. 44, in page 13, line 26, at end insert

'or, in the event that the member is not survived by a spouse, to an employee of his.'.

The Temporary Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 42, in page 14, line 3, leave out subsection (6).

No. 43, in page 14, leave out line 25.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I think I am right in supposing that the significance of the surviving spouse is connected with the decision to move towards unisex treatment of pensions, so that a balance is found between the claims of a male employee, or a male member of the scheme, and the claims of a female employee. I certainly welcome that move. I should not want to do anything to upset it. In fact, I am only too anxious to do everything I can to support it.

I am grateful to the Chair for taking, in conjunction with amendment No. 44, my amendments Nos. 42 and 43. They raise a slightly different point, but the amendments are so fully related that the Chair's discretion in grouping them is perfectly right.

My intention in amendment No. 44 is rather narrow, but it arises from the general principle that, as I understand it, when a man reaches the normal age of retirement he will have a certain life expectation, whereas if a woman retires at the same age she is likely to have a much longer life expectation. Therefore, her claim on the fund for an annuity will extend over a longer period and have a greater value than that of a man with an identical career record or other form of entitlement under the scheme. Therefore, women have the advantage over men in so far as they are likely to benefit for longer from the annuity which they are entitled to claim under the scheme.

On the other hand, men have an advantage over women in the actuarial tables in that they are more likely to leave a surviving spouse for the obvious reason that, a man's expectation of life being shorter, it makes it more likely that the woman will survive him. If we are to recognise that the benefit to the survivor is part of the entitlement which has been acquired through the earnings achievement of the member of the scheme, it is not right that the subsequent conduct of the spouse should be relevant in the calculation. Equally, where there is no spouse in the case where a man's wife has died before he does, or where the reverse might be the case, it is not right that the scheme should benefit and the household should suffer.

The amendment seeks to deal with the case of a man whose wife has died who may take a caretaker or some other person to look after him for a salary. That is not uncommon and the rules should not exclude that person being designated by the original member of the fund as the person who is entitled to continue to draw the benefit which we have decided should be allocated to the survivor under the standard rules. That is why I have moved that we should add the words "to an employee" of the member when deciding what to do about the residual annuity after the original member has died.

The other amendments in the group refer to the conduct of the survivor. It is objectionable, if I have interpreted the clause correctly, that the annuity should be shut off if the surviving spouse remarries. The surviving spouse's conduct in deciding to get married again should not determine what the member's asset was worth when he ceased employment and the benefit of the pension scheme was awarded to him.

I have often thought it a most disagreeable condition that where a wife in particular remarries after her husband's death, the scheme shuts off her benefit. It is a vindictive clause and the woman should not be expected to remain single after her husband has died in order to obtain the benefit of his assets.

It may be that there is something else to this which I have not detected, but it appears to suggest that if the surviving annuitant does not go through a marriage ceremony to another party but continues to live in the same house with that person, the scheme has to go on paying. It is only if there is marriage that the scheme is entitled to dry up the annuity.

If I am straying from the correct interpretation of the clause, I can only apologise, but the Bill has not been before us long enough for hon. Members interested in such points to consult experts who can explain such provisions.

If one looks at the comparable statutory instrument No. 1100 emanating from the DHSS called "The contracting out widowers' guaranteed minimum pension regulations" we find something different. The DHSS goes further in considering the conduct of the survivor and deals with the question of where a widower has entered into a new relationship with another woman. Paragraph 33(2)(b) provides:

"There is excluded from the periods prescribed . . . any period during which he is under pensionable age and a woman to whom he is not married are living together as husband and wife"

Paragraph (c) says:

"If after he has attained pensionable age if immediately before he attained that age he and a woman to whom he was not married were living together as husband and wife."

That is more specific than the clause we are discussing and it is an example of where liaison between the DHSS and the Inland Revenue has not been complete.

I am not trying to score points in respect of that, but I want to understand the nature of the provision. I hope that my right hon. Friend will tell me whether I am right in thinking that these provisions have the effect that the subsequent conduct of the surviving spouse can reflect on the value of the asset which has been earned by the member of the scheme during his lifetime.

8.15 pm

Mr. Blair: Unfortunately, I cannot support the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) in his amendment, for two reasons. First, as I understand it, amendment No. 44 would considerably change and, indeed, widen the scope of the annuities that would be permissible under clause 24. The annuity would be payable not only to a surviving spouse of a dependant, but even to an employee of his. The employee may be a person in the category to which the hon. Gentleman referred, but the term "employee" can be much wider. It may well be that if the person was self-employed and employed several people it could extend to them. That is going way beyond the purpose of the original legislation.

Secondly, sub-paragraph (6) does not insist that the annuity cease to be payable on the marriage of the annuitant; it simply allows that the annuity cease to be payable on the marriage of the annuitant. The word is "may" not "shall", and that is probably a critical distinction. Therefore, it is entirely up to those who are phrasing the terms of the annuity to decide whether they want that annuity to cease on the marriage of the annuitant. That is perfectly rational. They may decide that if the person remarries it is not necessary for him to have the benefit of the annuity in the ordinary way.

It may be helpful if I raise at this stage a purely drafting point. It is only if one looks at the annotations at the side of clauses 24 and 25 that one realises that they refer to annuities after the death of members. Otherwise, one has to read clause 24 in conjunction with clause 21. Clause 24 simply follows on the conditions already laid out in clause 21. That is slightly unsatisfactory; perhaps the Minister will have somebody look into that, because there have been difficulties in construing statutes where there are qualifications on the scope of a particular clause which are placed in annotations rather than the body of the clause.

Mr. John Greenway: I cannot support the amendments of my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams). It is important that the House should realise that we are dealing with personal pensions acquired by the individual on a money purchase basis. From an actuarial viewpoint the real issue is the provision of a pension for a member of a scheme—the person who is buying the pension policy. The more people and conditions one puts on the payment of benefit after the member's death, the less pension benefit the individual will obtain in his retirement. The actuaries would have great difficulty in dealing with a position in which one carried on paying an employee an annuity after the death of a member.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I want first to apologise to my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) for misrepresenting his views during discussion of the previous amendment. I know from long experience that my hon. Friend has not only an answer to most problems, but a detailed answer. In fact, I was completely aware of the solution that he had to the problem that we were discussing — the long transitional period. I apologise for describing his views in shorthand, which led him to think that I was not familiar with them.

[Mr. Norman Lamont]

Clause 24 sets out the conditions applicable to annuities payable under a personal pension scheme to a surviving spouse or dependant of the member after his or her death. I should stress that those conditions reflect current law and practice as they relate to retirement annuities. There are no changes; these are the existing practices. Persuasive as I find my hon. Friend on many issues, I do not find him quite so persuasive on this one, for the reasons given by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who rightly emphasised the difficulty for the whole personal pensions and annuity markets if one went on adding conditions.

I shall come to amendments Nos. 42 and 43 in a moment; I had more sympathy with them initially than with amendent No. 44, which would allow an annuity to be paid to an employee of the member—even, as the hon. Member for Sedgefield emphasised, if he was not a dependant and there was no surviving spouse or dependant of the member. As my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington knows, at present, such annuities can be paid only to someone who is a dependant. Revenue practice has been, I think, to accept a reasonably broad definition of "dependant", and I can confirm that that will continue to be the case. My hon. Friend is proposing to widen this scope for annuities to be paid even to people who have only the most tenuous connection with the member.

I return to the point about the generous tax reliefs upon which the whole subject that we are discussing is based. Given that we have such generous tax reliefs, I can see no justification fo enabling someone who was not a dependant to benefit in that way. If the position were as my hon. Friend described it for amendments Nos. 42 and 43, he would have been entirely right and I would have shared his feelings, but, as the hon. Member for Sedgefield grasped—I congratulate him on doing so—the present rules are permissive.

At present, an annuity paid to a surviving spouse or dependant may cease if the person receiving the annuity subsequently marries or remarries; but there is no objection to such an annuity being payable for the whole life of the annuitant in the normal way. The amendment would prevent an annuity payable in these circumstances from ceasing on the subsequent marriage of the recipient. That would remove an element of choice. It is entirely right that we should have a market that allows people to choose annuities or personal pensions providing for either circumstance. I share my hon. Friend's feelings that the provision would be insensitive if it were as inflexible as he thought it was. However, it is not, and we have a market here that can meet many different circumstances.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I fear that my right hon. Friend the Minister has not quite got the point that I wish to make. I am not happy with provisions that appear to drive people into cohabitation rather than formal marriage. It appears to me that that is permissible as one of the options that the clause would make available. My primary concern is to protect the unisex quality of the pension asset so that, at the date of award, whether the person is male or female, his or her expectation of the benefit that he or she would draw from the scheme would be the same. Since, as I pointed out earlier, the man has to rely on the fact that the scheme provides assets in one form or another that continue after his death, in order to have the equivalent value from the scheme that a woman would get in otherwise similar circumstances at the same age—of course, she would expect to live longer—I do not want the man to lose that asset for any reason.

The scheme should not be able to treat the man badly because he has died younger than the woman would have done in the same circumstances, and has therefore got less benefit from an asset for which he has saved. If there is no surviving spouse, I want the asset that we allocate to the survivor to be available to go to someone else, or to some other objective. It might not be a large one, and it would probably taper. If a man lived to be 99, the benefit for the survivor need not be large, but if he died a year after he qualified for his pension, the asset that the pension scheme would hold on his behalf ought to be large and should not be forfeited because he does not have a surviving wife, or because she has chosen to remarry.

It is not right to undermine the attempt to put men and women on the same footing in pension schemes. I hope that my right hon. Friend will give further consideration to that matter. I do not seek to press him on it now, but if he studies what I have said he will realise that we are potentially reintroducing inequality of the sexes, and that does not seem right.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My hon. Friend is making the point that, as a woman has a longer life expectancy, the annuity costs more. He wants the system to be unisex. There is nothing to prevent the annuity lasting for the widow's lifetime, but the system allows it to stop if she marries again, and there is an element of choice for the person who takes out the contract. The Government require contracted-out personal pensions to be unisex. Annuities from voluntary contributions allow a choice to the member. However, I shall look at what my hon. Friend has said to determine whether the position is unsatisfactory.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: In view of my right hon. Friend's helpful assurance, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Clause 26

RETURN OF CONTRIBUTIONS ON DEATH OF MEMBER

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Will my right hon. Friend enlighten me on a point that I raised on a similar clause in the Finance Bill before the election? At that time, unless I am much mistaken, I tabled a probing amendment at the end of subsection (2) to add the words

"whichever provides the greater amount".

the object being to elucidate what appears to be somewhat ambiguous. Subsection (2) says:

"the lump sum must represent no more than the return of contributions, together with reasonable interest on contributions or bonuses out of profits."

I may not have understood that correctly, but it seems to me that an option is available there and I would not want it to be possible for the option to be exercised — if I have read it correctly — in such a way that it is a disadvantage to the beneficiary. Perhaps my right hon. Friend could explain that or, if I have misunderstood the way that the clause ought to be read, perhaps he would say so.

8.30 pm

Mr. Blair: Perhaps I can assist. I do not think that there is a difficulty in clause 26 of the type that the hon. Gentleman suggests. That is partly because it seems that subsection (2) will simply ensure that a lump sum does not represent any more than the return of the contributions together with reasonable interest on the contributions or bonuses out of profits. It is almost a form of anti-avoidance provision to ensure that what is returned is not more than what should have gone into the scheme under the rules. As such, the clause is necessary to ensure that the rules of the scheme are not abused.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) is perfectly correct and he has summed up the position. No surplus will arise in this instance and we are talking about two different forms of contract—one unit linked and the other guaranteeing the annuity.

Clause 27

SCHEME ADMINISTRATOR

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I beg to move, in page 15, line 6, after 'Kingdom', insert

'or in another member state of the EEC.'.

I was rather surprised when I saw this provision because I do not know why it is there. I thought that I would ask my right hon. Friend to expand and give him an opportunity to do so. I have a particular interest here in that when I was a member of the European Parliament in 1981, I had the honour to be made the Rapporteur for the subject of the integration of the European market for capital. In the course of my work as Rapporteur I became totally convinced of the necessity for us to proceed as far as possible to regard Europe as a single capital market.

Of course, a pension scheme is pre-eminently a capital project, and it seems a little jarring and out of tune with the Government's stated policy of supporting the conception of the integration of the European market for capital to say that where personal pension schemes are concerned we will have this "United Kingdom only" label attached to them. There must be more to this clause than meets the eye, because it seems such a petty and unsuitable restriction to insert. I trust that my right hon. Friend will be able to explain just what benefit is likely to accrue if we retain this clause in the Bill.

Sir William Clark: I trust that my right hon. Friend will resist this amendment. We are dealing with annuities, and pensions paid by institutions in this country enjoy certain tax advantages. That is the main thing. How can we say, if a pension scheme is operated in Greece or France or Portugal, that the same fiscal system will be applied to those pension funds? No doubt this amendment is well-meaning, but it is highly impracticable. In any case, we are dealing with our own fiscal system and complete harmonisation with the EC may never come. Until it does, it would be ridiculous to try to transfer some of the operations, and certainly the operation of our pension funds or annuities, to any other member state. I hope that my right hon. Friend will not waste much time on this amendment.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) but in the interests of making progress I am not sure that a summary dismissal of the amendment would be the appropriate thing to do. My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) is always pushing integration with Europe and he brings the same care, drive and point of detail to the pension fund debate. I am afraid that I must agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South——

Sir William Clark: What are you afraid of?

Mr. Lamont: —even though I am afraid of my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington. Given the very generous tax reliefs that seem to dominate debates of this kind, it is essential that we have people within the United Kingdom jurisdiction accountable to the Inland Revenue. I should stress that it has always been a requirement of an occupational pension scheme that it has an administrator resident in the United Kingdom. We are simply proposing for personal pensions the same rules as apply to occupational schemes. They do not discriminate unfairly against the nationals of other EC states. As I say, someone within this jurisdiction must be accountable to the Revenue in order to ensure that the reliefs are not abused. A similar rule is contained in the Department of Health and Social Security regulations. My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington has been following those and will find that the rule is mirrored there.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: My right hon. Friend has explained that, as I understand it, the Inland Revenue would need to have someone living within the United Kingdom in order to proceed against that person if the scheme were to be improperly conducted. Obviously, in the same way that we do not like overseas landlords misconducting themselves behind foreign frontiers, we would not want scandalous abuse of the rules of pension schemes. It would seem to be a pity if there was no opening for competition and if the people providing facilities for personal pension schemes were to be excluded from doing so unless they were substantially British companies or British institutions.

I hope that the meaning of the clause does not preclude other institutions from other financial centres entering into competition, because that would be highly undesirable. On the other hand, if it is necessary for them to establish one of their managers here as a kind of Aunt Sally, the clause seems rather a small-minded provision and I am bound to say that I regret it. However, I do not think that it is of such serious importance that we need to divide on it. Unless my right hon. Friend has further remarks to make, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Clause 28

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I beg to move, in page 15, line 14, at end add—

'(3) Regulations made under this section shall provide that the rules of the scheme shall require the trustees in respect of any member withdrawing from pensionable service before the normal pension age under the rules of the scheme at the withdrawing member's option either—

(a) to pay an approved scheme a transfer payment in respect of the withdrawing members' entitlement of the sum that would be required by the withdrawing members' scheme for the purpose of admitting a new member of the same age, sex and pensionable remuneration as the withdrawing member in order to credit him with the same number of years of pensionable service as the withdrawing member (but subject to modification in accordance with (4) below, or

(b) to award preserved benefits to the withdrawing member of the same actuarial value as that sum.

(4) In a case where an actuary certifies that on the date of the certificate the scheme under this section is not fully funded, (which is to say that the scheme does not have sufficient assets to meet its liabilities in respect of the whole or any specified part of the accrued rights to benefit of its members), the transfer payment, or as the case may be, the part of the transfer payment which corresponds with the specified part of those accrued rights, may be reduced at the discretion of the trustees by the percentage by which the scheme is so shown to be deficient.

(5) It shall be permissible for the pension trustees of an approved pension scheme under this section to amend the rules of the scheme in regard to the calculation of transfer payments and of preserved benefits on behalf of any member ending pensionable service before the normal age of retirement under the scheme in accordance with the provisions of this section.

(6) An approved pension scheme which by 1st January 1988 does not have rules such that the transfer payments and the preserved benefits payable under the scheme are to be calculated on terms at least as favourable to the beneficiaries as those specified in this section shall not qualify as an approved pension scheme in repect of liabilities incurred after that date except by the permission of the Occupational Pensions Board.

(7) The pension trustees of an approved pension scheme may apply to the Occupational Pensions Board for deferment of the latest date for the amendment of the rules of their scheme if necessary to accord with this section and with the approval of the Board the scheme may retain its status as an approved pension scheme in respect of its liabilities incurred after that date to a date not later than 1st January 1989.

(8) The Secretary of State for Health and Social Security shall lay before Parliament regulations under this section subject to affirmative resolution of the House of Commons which shall specify the grounds on which the Occupational Pensions Board may approve applications for deferment under subsection (8), above.'.

Before I embark on this I should like to say that this provision is not a new recommendation of mine but is new in the context of the newly available personal pension schemes. I shall be tabling a new clause to the present Finance Bill which would have the effect of applying a similar method of valuation for transfer values or preserved benefits in schedule 3 or wherever it is appropriate in regard to schemes already in existence. I want to say the minimum at this point in moving this amendment because I do not want to make myself ineligible to move a similar one at a later stage in the proceedings of the Committee.

There is merit in having the same rules across the board where valuation of transferred or preserved assets is concerned. Therefore, I do not think it is wrong that we should seek to apply this particular formula to the new schemes just as much as to the old. I have to move this amendment at this point if I am right in thinking that there is room for it where the private personal schemes are concerned. I realise that, for the most part, in a money purchase scheme, the proposals that I have drafted, which were intended to relate primarily to final salary schemes, would seem to have only rather tangential relevance. However, I think that it might well happen in the competition which is arising already to attract the interest of people who may decide to take out personal pension schemes, that systems will be devised which will allow a measure of latitude in assessing the transfer value, or at any rate the preserved value, of the assets, of one who decides to terminate his connection with the scheme before the normal age of retirement. Therefore, I believe that I may be serving a useful purpose if I present this method of valuation so that the same regime would be applicable right across the occupational pensions and the private pension schemes.

I emphasise that, I refer only to the new schemes set up under this chapter. In order not to say too much on this point and to come to the central feature, what I am suggesting here — I have suggested it on previous occasions in the House — is that the transfer payment should be calculated by a formula which would be precisely the same if the movement of the employee was reversed. If the employee or the person taking out the pension were moving into the scheme and buying himself in, that would be a method of valuation of what I think should be the appropriate transfer or preserved value when the member leaves the scheme.

I have to say that the result of using that formula— which I have set out in the amendment and which I do not need to read out in detail — would be very different indeed from what is often recommended even by highly competent and actuarially trained people and in normal practice now. It is difficult to estimate what people who leave schemes early leave behind and how much they lose by changing their jobs. However, over the whole field of pension provision in approved schemes, it is a very substantial amount and, after all the years for which I have been pressing this on successive Governments, I find it rather disappointing that I still have to make this point. Everyone agrees that the early leaver gets a raw deal, whether he takes a transfer payment or leaves behind a preserved asset; yet the House does not act.

If my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary does not think that the formula that I have adopted here for assessing the early leaver's assets is the best possible and the fairest, I trust that he will come forward with an equally specific and better provision. If he is not able to come forward with anything better, I strongly recommend that he should accept this, because it is not only in the interests of fairness and the good reputation of the private scheme institutions which are springing up that they should be seen to be giving a fair deal to someone who severs his connections before the normal age of retirement; it is also all-important to the Government's policy of encouraging the mobility of labour, particularly among senior executives. It is when a man is a senior executive that his pension asset is likely to be worth most. Therefore the fact that he is very likely to be cheated if he changes his plans and leaves his scheme early under existing normal practice makes the mobility of labour argument so important.

I have said enough on this. The Committee can see precisely what I am aiming at in my amendment. I trust that my right hon. Friend will welcome it and that, by suggesting this again tonight I shall have got a stride nearer to a genuine system of statutory fair treatment for the early leaver. That is why I hope that the Government will accept my proposal.

8.45 pm

Mr. Norman Lamont: Clause 28 sets out certain basic conditions relating to transfer values and personal pension schemes. My hon. Friend said that, in a sense, his amendment anticipates the broader assault that he intends to make on this problem in relation to occupational pension schemes. The amendment appears to relate primarily to transfer values paid by occupational pension schemes. My hon. Friend acknowledged that the benefits under a personal pension scheme will be based on money purchase and will be attributable to the individual. Therefore, I am confident that the problem outlined by my hon. Friend will not arise in the same precise way with transfers from personal pension schemes. I suggest that we might debate this more widely when we come to schedule 3. That would perhaps be more appropriate than discussing it during a debate which is narrowly focused on personal pensions.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: My right hon. Friend rightly pointed to the fact that, in private pension schemes that we envisage at present, my proposals might not be especially relevant. However, I think that we have to work with the ingenuity of the market, and I imagine that schemes which will be eligible for approval—which have not yet been envisaged, at any rate by me—will come into existence. Therefore it would be a good thing from the start to have a simple uniform regime for valuation of the early leaver's asset which would become applicable from the beginning.

We have this catastrophe that in the occupational pension schemes nothing was laid down from the beginning as to the valuation of the early leaver's assets and it has done untold harm in this country that early leavers have been cheated year in year out, since the start of the private occupational pensions movement. It does not apply in the public sector, mercifully, and a very far-seeing civil servant, Mr. Herbecq, whom I had the pleasure of knowing some 15 or 20 years ago, did manful work to ensure that people moving in the public sector within a very wide range of occupations were able to protect their pension rights. But this does not apply in the private sector and there is a real problem.

I do not think that we want to start a whole new type of scheme without provision from the beginning for the early leaver to have a fair deal. Even if my particular recommendations here are not entirely appropriate, I hope that I am asking my right hon. Friend to move in a direction in which he is willing to go and that he will provide some valid protection for the early leavers asset from the very start. In the circumstances, as I accept that, in this case, I am on a rather narrow point, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Clause 29

EXCESS CONTRIBUTIONS

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. John Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend consider how life assurance and pension companies can meet the provisions of clause 29 for self-employed scheme members? I understand that it is intended that, where an employee is setting up a pension scheme, perhaps with the co-operation of an employer, there should be arrangements to ensure that the contributions paid are not excessive in relation to the employee's salary. However, unless I have read this wrongly, it seems to me that we are asking a pension scheme to include in its arrangements the means to ensure that contributions are not excessive. I am at a loss to understand how the Revenue expects the life assurance industry to police the provisions with regard to people who are self-employed. Perhaps this matter needs further thought.

Mr. Blair: On a similar point, I assume that the purpose of the clause is to determine what happens to excess contributions above the permitted maximum. Under the new personal pension schemes, the employer as well as the employee will be able to contribute. A novel situation therefore arises if the aggregate amount contributed by employer and employee exceeds the maximum. As I understand it, the purpose is to repay any excess to the employee up to the extent of his contributions and for the rest to be paid to the employer. I do not see how that affects the situation in relation to the maximum amount allowable, which seems to be governed by clause 32, but I should be grateful for confirmation that clause 29 merely determines what happens to excess contributions.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) is right. Nevertheless, my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) has hit upon a point which requires further investigation. It is the subject of consultation with the pensions industry and I will see whether anything more can be said on Report. The matter is being explored and my hon. Friend is right in saying that it is recognised as an area in which there may be problems.

Clause 30

RESTRICTION OF CONTRIBUTORS

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Unfortunately, it was brought to my notice only this morning that there could be a most unfortunate interpretation of subsection (2)(b), which reads:

"in an office or employment to which section 36 below applies."

This is a technical area and I may be misinformed, but it appears that paragraph (b) adds a restriction in that members of an occupational pension scheme may not arrange for minimum contributions arising under the Social Security Act 1986 to be paid to a personal pension scheme. If that is correct, it will effectively prevent a member of an occupational pension scheme which is not contracted out from using a personal pension scheme to opt out of SERPS.

My right hon. Friend the Minister knows that I am not particularly well disposed towards SERPS and I think that it ought to be wound up, but while it continues every employee should be entitled to opt out of it if he or she so wishes. It seems completely contrary to Government policy to prevent employees from opting out. If my interpretation of paragraph (b) is correct, will my right hon. Friend give an assurance that it will be amended so that it does not have that unfortunate implication?

I recognise that I am trespassing on a very technical area and raising a point which I was not able to cover in an amendment because it was brought to my notice only today. Nevertheless, it is a serious point and I trust that my right hon. Friend will consider it.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am advised that my hon. Friend may have a point. I undertake to look at it and to report back to the House on Report.

LIMIT ON DEDUCTIONS

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Subsection (2) sets out a scale allowing older people to benefit from a higher percentage limit on deductions, but in subsection (3) the figure of 5 per cent. appears not to be graduated according to age. I wonder whether it would be fairer and simpler to say that whatever subsection (2) entitles the individual to receive the provisions of subsection (3) may amount to one quarter of that figure. That would bring into subsection (3) the age scale already present in subsection (2).

Mr. Norman Lamont: My hon. Friend is bowling me out with every ball. I am informed that the 5 per cent. is not graduated but merely follows the existing rules, so there is no change. I note what my hon. Friend says, however, and will certainly look at it to see whether there is purpose behind what he says, as he has clearly raised a serious point.

Clause 35

MEANING OF "RELEVANT EARNINGS"

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: This point might have been raised on a starred amendment but it can probably be raised just as easily in this debate. The importance of clause 35 is in the definition of "relevant earnings" in terms of the amount of contributions that can be made under earlier clauses and thus the amount on which tax relief applies.

Subsection (7) provides:

"For the purposes of this Chapter, a married woman's relevant earnings shall not be treated as her husband's relevant earnings, notwithstanding that her income chargeable to tax is treated as his income."

I wish to probe the Government's thinking on this. If the wife's and husband's earnings were aggregated, the amount of contribution would be much larger, so they must be disaggregated to ensure that the husband can contribute only the relevant percentage of his own earnings and cannot top up his contributions by aggregating his wife's earnings. I assume that that is the only purpose, but I should be grateful for the Minister's confirmation that clause 35 merely translates into legislative effect what is already customary practice.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I should be grateful if my right hon. Friend the Minister would reassure me about the effect of subsection (7), as it appears to reintroduce an element of inequality between the sexes. I should like to feel that we are preserving the unisex character of our legislation across the board, but I cannot see how that will apply if we insist on retaining this provision.

If the subsection was read the other way round, it would read:

"a married man's relevant earnings shall not be treated as his wife's relevant earnings, notwithstanding that his income chargeable to tax is treated as her income."

Is the clause intended to be read as applying equally in both senses? I may be showing my ignorance with this remark, but I believe that the Committee should express some uneasiness about that provision and that we are entitled to ask my right hon. Friend for an explanation.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) is certainly not showing any ignorance of the subject, but rather a remarkable knowledge of it. My hon. Friend's summary was correct, as indeed was what the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) said. The clause follows the existing rules for retirement annuities under which the wife's annuity is treated as earned income. I shall read what my hon. Friend said to consider whether there is anything that I can add to it. If there is, I shall write a note to my hon. Friend.

Clause 38

EMPLOYER'S CONTRIBUTIONS

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: I simply want to make sure that I have understood the effect of the clause that we are about to pass. As I understand it, it is a necessary consequence of the changes that have been made that the employers' contributions to the personal pension schemes should not constitute a taxable benefit. If that is the purpose of clause 38 it is no more than following on the changes to the rules that have been made.

Clause 38 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 39

EXEMPTION FOR SCHEME INVESTMENTS

9 pm

Sir William Clark: I beg to move amendment No. 47 in, page 21, line 27, at end add—

'(5) In respect of income which is exempt from tax under subsection (1) above or section 314 of the Taxes Act 1970, notwithstanding the provisions in section 240(5) of the Taxes Act 1970, the board shall make regulations providing for the repayment of income tax and tax credits to come into effect on or before 4th January 1988.'.

I believe that it is well known that I am a consultant to the Life Insurance Association.

The investment income of pension funds and insurance companies, as far as it refers to pension funds, is tax-exempt. The present rules relating to the repayments of tax deducted at source are anomalous and tend to penalise insured pension business in comparison with the self-administered pension schemes and new pension providers approved under the Bill. My amendment is an endeavour to obviate that difference.

The amendment intends—I trust that the wording is correct and I trust that my right hon. Friend will not resist the amendment because of faulty wording — the repayment of tax on investments and tax credits, deducted at source, to all providers of approved pension schemes in respect of investments that are only attributable to the pension business. If the amendment is effective it will enable competitive distortions, which exist against life insurance companies, to be removed by permitting all providers of pensions to receive prompt tax repayment on an equal basis.

This is a technical amendment and it affects the cash flow position of pension funds. As this anomaly exists, I hope that my right hon. Friend will feel able to accept the amendment or, if not, to give an undertaking that, on Report, he will return to this matter in order to eliminate that anomaly. The wording of the amendment may be slightly faulty, but I hope that my right hon. Friend will accept its spirit.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have considerable sympathy with my hon. Friend. I would not like to accept the amendment at this stage and I am not sure that, on Report, I will be able to return to the matter. However, I am entirely sympathetic to my hon. Friend's case.

The purpose of my hon. Friend's amendment is to provide a mechanism for insured pension funds to secure monthly repayments of income tax and tax credits. That matter is already a matter of discussion between the Revenue and the Association of British Insurers. Some detailed information has still to be made available to us.

We must take account of the cost to the Exchequer, which could be substantial. I understand what my hon. Friend has said. He wishes these pension funds to be on the same basis as self-administered pension schemes and not to be at a competitive disadvantage. I assure my hon. Friend that I entirely understand that and I am sympathetic to that suggestion.

I cannot give an unconditional commitment, but we are certainly well aware of my hon. Friend's argument. Indeed, we are discussing the matter with the industry.

Sir William Clark: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. I do not know whether it was a slip of the tongue, but this change would not cost the Exchequer anything, because tax will be repaid at some time. It is merely a cash flow problem because payments are made monthly rather than quarterly or annually. If we want to extend the number of pension schemes throughout the country—that is the Government's philosophy and I go along with it—all pension funds should be treated on an equal footing. The amendment will ensure that when repayment of tax is due—this will not cost the Revenue a scrap—the pension fund will receive the money sooner than at present. It will be able to reinvest the money and compete effectively with other pension funds.

In the light of what my right hon. Friend the Minister has said, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 39 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 40

UNIT TRUSTS

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: As I understand it, the clause makes a technical adjustment for unit trusts to ensure that there are no untoward tax consequences for them in running personal pension schemes. I understand that the clause is in the Bill because there is anti-avoidance legislation that could lead to injustice unless the clause is enacted.

Mr. Norman Lamont indicated assent.

Mr. Blair: I am grateful for that confirmation.

Clauses 41 to 43 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 44

TAX ON UNAUTHORISED PAYMENTS ETC.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: I wish merely to raise a query that has been put to me. I understand that the purpose of the clause is to ensure that if a pension fund makes a payment that it should not make and the payment is therefore unathorised, there will be a tax on the payment. In other words, tax relief will be lost. It would seem that this is a method of ensuring that there is compliance with the rules that involves placing a penalty on pension funds that pay out when they should not do so. I am sure that this is a negligible or rare practice, but I shall be grateful for the Minister's confirmation.

Mr. Norman Lamont: That is correct.

Clauses 45 to 51 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 52

REMUNERATION OF MINISTERS AND OTHER OFFICERS

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Virtually all the provisions in the clause are new. They did not appear at all, or did not appear in this form, in the Bill that we considered in March. As the clause reflects on the remuneration of Ministers and other officers, perhaps it would be appropriate for the Committee to ask my right hon. Friend the Minister to give us a brief explanation of what it portends. These provisions are rather complex but presumably they have a meaning, and I think that the Committee should know what it is.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) has said, this clause has been amended because of the provisions in the Parliamentary and Other Pensions Act which was enacted just before the general election. I do not believe that there are consderable changes of substance. Members of Parliament who are holders of qualifying offices may elect not to participate in the parliamentary pension scheme in relation to their salary from that office. In such cases, the clause enables the salary from the qualifying office to be treated as relevant earnings for personal pension purposes.

Clause 54

RETIREMENT ANNUITIES

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Since my right hon. Friend is being so obliging in Committee and is helping us all so much, I hope that he will not object if I ask him to explain the import of clause 54 which, as I understand it, is new in the Bill and did not appear in the previous one. I imagine that my right hon. Friend will be able to enlighten the Committee with a brief explanation of what the clause means. This, too, is a very technical clause and an explanation of it would be helpful to the occupational pensions movement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: When personal pensions are introduced in January next year, retirement annuities will cease to be available—this was the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) touched on earlier—although existing arrangements will be able to continue under the present tax rules. The purpose of the clause is to make two changes in the retirement annuity regime for the period between the Budget of last March and next January.

The first of those changes is to introduce the same higher contribution limits as will apply after next January for personal pensions, and, secondly, to impose the same cap of £150,000 on lump sums, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) took exception earlier, with effect from 17 March of this year for new occupational pension schemes and new members of existing schemes.

The provisions concerning the lump sum limit in subsections (3) to (7) of the clause are new, but the rest of it is not. It was not possible to include them in the pre-election Bill, but I can assure my hon. Friend that it was our intention to introduce them in Committee.

Clause 57

MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: I simply want to check that schedule 2 follows the pattern of our earlier discussions and that its only consequences are to make either minor changes or those that are already consequential to the provisions that we have passed earlier.

Schedule 2 refers to personal pension schemes. Since we have considered a large number of clauses on personal pension schemes in a fairly short time, I simply wanted to make sure that what happens in schedule 2 is nothing more than was stated as giving effect to minor and consequential amendments, and that there was nothing of substance or moment that would mean any change was occurring. I thought it right to raise this point, otherwise we would have passed the schedule without comment.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am happy to give the Committee the assurance that that is so.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: It would not be right for the Committee to pass from this important chapter without my taking the opportunity of saying that this embodies some of the most far-reaching new provisions on pensions that we have had for many years. My right hon. Friends are doing an inspired and imaginative thing in introducing these proposals. Although I may have appeared to be critical tonight, it is only in respect of certain details, which I am sure can be improved. I think that the Committee should give the warmest possible welcome to this chapter of the Bill.

Clause 58

OCCUPATIONAL PENSION SCHEMES

9.15 pm

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 29, line 9, at end add—

'(2) Any benefit received under any scheme approved under Chapter II of Part II of the Finance Act 1970 shall be exempt from income tax on the first £5 per week, when the recipient is aged 65 or more.'.

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. Donald Coleman): With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 5, in page 29, line 9, at end add—

'(2A) Any benefit received under any scheme approved under Chapter II of Part II of the Finance Act 1970 shall be exempt from income tax on the first £10 per week, when the recipient is aged 65 or more.'.

No. 6, in page 29, line 9, at end add—

'(2B) Any benefit received under any scheme approved under Chapter II of Part II of the Finance Act 1970 shall be exempt from income tax on the first £20 per week, when the recipient is aged 65 or more.'.

Mr. Marlow: General elections are useful. They give the public the opportunity to say yet again, time after time, that they prefer our lot to that lot on the other side of the Committee. But it is also three weeks of high profile politics when the electorate as a whole can give prospective Members of Parliament a right royal ear-bashing about the issues which they think are most important.

Apart from the fact that I was often told, "If the other lot get in, then, your Honour, we'll have to emigrate," and, "For goodness sake, do something quickly about the rates and introduce the community charge," the issue that was brought to my attention more than any other was the position of some old-age pensioners.

As you know, Mr. Coleman, many of those who have recently retired have supplementary pensions, earnings-related supplements and savings. People in that position are much better off as a result of eight years of Conservative Government than they were when the Labour Government were in power. Those on the basic state pension are also often entitled to supplementary benefit in many of its forms, including the various forms of housing benefit. They, too, are better off than they were in 1979 when the Government took office.

But somewhere in the middle there is a slice of people with limited personal savings and a limited occupational pension of perhaps £5, £10 or £15 a week. They are God's Conservatives—Thatcherites. When they were younger, in employment and creating wealth, they put a bit by for their old age so that they could be better off and enjoy some privileges and advantages in their old age. They have found that they are scarcely better off than their neighbours down the road who did not save and who do not have an occupational pension, but who receive supplementary benefit. This matter was brought to my attention on copious occasions during the election campaign and more than virtually anything else. I know from having spoken to many colleagues that it was also brought to their attention and I know that Ministers are worried about these people.

We as a nation are much better off than we were in 1979. We have a great deal to be thankful for and there is a great deal that we have worked for together that we have achieved. But this particular section of our community who no longer have the opportunity to generate more wealth for themselves—they have had their working life and put their savings on one side—are not benefiting. If the rates increase and they do not get a rate rebate, some find that they must cash their savings, which they hoped would stretch until they were in their 80s or 90s, to pay the rates. These people feel, not only that they are not better off, but that they are worse off than when they first retired and worse off than they deserve.

I know that the Government have done a great deal for pensions and pensioners as a whole, but this particular group has slipped through the net. The amendment seeks to allow that group of people with small savings and small supplementary pensions to have tax-free a slice of their pension which they have saved for during their working life. Amendment No. 4 seeks to allow £5 a week to be tax-free, amendment No. 5 £10 a week and amendment No. 6 £20 a week. I do not know how generous my right hon. Friend is inclined to be today. I should like my right hon. Friend to go the whole hog. I know that he is sensitive to the issue, and I am sure that the Committee will be very interested to hear what he has to say.

Mr. Blair: I want to respond briefly to the amendments. The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is to be congratulated on drawing our attention to the plight of pensioners in the United Kingdom. The Labour party drew attention to that plight regularly during the election campaign, during which, I understand, people such as the hon. Member for Northampton, North described how well the pensioners were doing. However, he is right to raise the plight of pensioners and the difficulties that they face. I am not at all sure that it is appropriate to deal with the matter in the way that the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Why not?

Mr. Blair: If the hon. Lady wants to force a Division on the issue, that would be delightful and interesting.

I used to think that the hon. Member for Northampton, North was one of those hon. Members who thought that everything that came before us should be adequately costed and put together in financial terms. However, he has not given us any information about the costings of his proposals.

Mr. Marlow: It is late at night and I know that the Committee has a lot of business that it wants to attend to. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. To go as far as the first amendment would cost the taxpayer £150 million a year. The second amendment would cost £290 million and the third amendment would cost £510 million. Those figures were kindly provided for me by my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. If we consider the first figure and compare it with taking 1p off income tax, it represents about 15 per cent. or 20 per cent. of the reduction. As we know, the Government are contemplating reducing income tax and that might be one way forward.

Mr. Blair: I am grateful for the figures. If the amendments do not find favour with the Government tonight, at the very least perhaps the hon. Member for Northampton, North can join us in voting for a larger increase in the pension later. I do not think that this is the time to introduce what would be a fairly novel tax regime, although we have deep sympathy with the plight faced by pensioners.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The amendments would provide for part of the occupational pension paid to a pensioner over 65 years of age, varying from £5 to £20 in the different amendments, to be exempted from tax. In other respects, the amendments are identical.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) is correct to identify a particular slice of the pensioner population who often have difficulty in making ends meet, as they have put money by for their retirement, but none the less find that the small occupational pension is even smaller than they had expected. My experience mirrors that of my hon. Friend and I have come across many people who feel that they face difficult circumstances notwithstanding the fact that they have contributed to an occupational pension scheme for some years.

Unfortunately, there are a number of objections to the amendments, which would represent a significant departure from the general principle that all income, whatever its source, should be subject to income tax. An exemption of this kind would create unfairness between occupational pensioners and pensioners with different kinds of income. There is no obvious reason why a pensioner receiving a pension under an occupational pension should receive such generous treatment while someone not fortunate enough to receive an occupational pension, but who has had to rely either on the national insurance retirement pension or has simply saved and has an investment income does not receive similar treatment. He may be in that category described by my hon. Friend, but instead of contributing to an occupational pension, he may have put money into a savings account or a few stocks and shares. That pensioner may find himself in the position described by my hon. Friend.

We must recognise the circumstances of all elderly taxpayers. That, of course, is why we have provided for the age allowance, subject to an income limit giving them a higher level of personal allowance.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North knows the cost of the amendment already, as he said, because I gave it in a written answer. I think that he would agree that I cannot easily just concede such sums in a debate late at night, persuasive though my hon. Friend is. For the reasons that I have given, much as I sympathise with my hon. Friend, I think that help ought to be targeted more broadly. I entirely agree about the category of people whom my hon. Friend is trying to help, but they are not only people in occupational schemes. They may also be people with a savings income, not from a pension scheme as such. The best way to help those people is to try, by means of the age allowance, to increase the proportion of their incomes that is exempt from tax.

Mr. Marlow: I am grateful for the sympathetic hearing that my right hon. Friend has given the amendment, and the understanding way in which he has approached it. I appreciate that such an amendment raises all sorts of issues of great complexity, and that to do anything about that would require a more sophisticated measure than can be put forward by a modest Back-Bencher late at night. I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's acceptance, in large measure, of a problem that many hon. Members on both sides of the Committee came across during the election campaign, and I hope that before long a more generous measure than we have experienced so far, along the lines suggested by my right hon. Friend, can be introduced.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

To report Progress and ask leave to sit again.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Committee report Progress; to sit again tomorrow.

Licensing (Northern Ireland)

9.27 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Richard Needham): I beg to move,

That the draft licensing (Northern Ireland) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 2nd July, be approved.

Let me begin by welcoming the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) to the Front Bench, and say how much we appreciate and understand the deep and abiding interest that he shows in Northern Ireland affairs. Conservative Members will be extremely interested in everything that he has to say. We know how much concern and care he feels for all the people of Northern Ireland. There are those who say that to receive a post on either Front Bench is a poisoned chalice, but I have never found that. I have always found it an honour — and, of course, a challenge. We all know the dedication and concern that the hon. Gentleman brings to his post, and we look forward to his contributions.

Both this order, which amends the liquor licensing legislation contained in the Licensing Act (Northern Ireland) 1971, and the one that follows it owe much of their parentage to the Blackburn report. Mr. Blackburn was an extremely distinguished Clerk to the Stormont Parliament and later in the Assembly, and I know that he was highly respected by hon. Members in this House. The two orders owe much to him and his committee, and should be seen as a package of measures designed to bring greater control over the regulation of clubs and to make the licensing law fairer and more easily enforceable.

That is about as far as agreement on this order is likely to go. Now I wish to discuss whether public houses in Northern Ireland should be allowed to open on Sundays, as they do in the rest of the United Kingdom. I have read with the greatest care the views put forward from all sides for many years, and I have especially taken into account the views expressed in the Assembly and by hon. Members of this House. If there has been a delay in introducing these orders during the past 18 months, I am the culprit, as I wished to consider for myself all the options and the proposals that I had inherited from my predecessor. I have considered the case for banning all drink in Northern Ireland on Sunday; a Provincewide referendum on Sunday opening; districtwide referendums on Sunday opening; bringing the law into line with that in England and Wales, which those who back integration would support; bringing the law into line with that of Scotland, which those who support devolution would support; keeping the law as it is in Northern Ireland; and doing as we propose in the order.

I share hon. Members' anxiety about the way in which primary legislation for Northern Ireland is made. All that I can say is that no one can accuse me of not having considered every permutation and laboured over every variant of this order.

My starting point for what needs to be done is the same as that of the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor). I am sorry that he is not here tonight because he is a considerable expert in these matters. He was the architect of the 1971 legislation. On 24 May 1983, in the Assembly, he said:

"Since our consolidating legislation in 1971 the situation in the licensing trade in Northern Ireland has got out of control . . . This is yet another argument in favour of devolved Government for Northern Ireland."

Having wrestled with the problem for the best part of two years, I heartily agree with the right hon. Gentleman on both counts.

A review of the history of licensing in Northern Ireland must start with the major cut in 1923, which was followed by a series of amending measures in 1927, 1959, 1971 and 1978. The right hon. Member for Strangford said:

"In the early 1920s there were very stringent controls introduced in Northern Ireland, but since 1923 we have seen a gradual relaxation of these controls which were introduced to combat the excesses experienced at the turn of the century."

The questions before the House tonight are as follows. Do we continue the relaxation? Do we stay where we are? Do we return to the draconian rules of the 1920s? Some would wish all liquor sales banned in any outlet in Northern Ireland on Sundays. Of course, I respect the depth of their feelings, but I think that they are wrong. Circumstances are changing in Northern Ireland, and it is impossible to ignore the changes in social behaviour that are now taking place. Many people choose not to worship on Sundays, and no amount of persuasion would make them do so. They do not deny the right of people to observe the Sabbath strictly, but they ask why they should be denied their right to enjoy themselves as they want because of other people's moral principles.

I hope that the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. I. Paisley) will not mind me praying him in aid in my view of the matter. During the Assembly debate in 1985, the hon. Gentleman said:

"Everybody knows where I stand on this particular issue. I do not run away"— no one would ever accuse him of that; he might be accused of running into things, but not of running away—

"some people say I would like to—but I meet it head on and say that if I had it my way, I would want this Province to be obedient to God's law, but I do not have it my way. I can only speak to people and try to morally persuade them . . . I am not saying to the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Glendinning) that he must not drink on Sunday. I am telling him that he has to make a choice. I have made my choice."

In the 1983 debate on the same subject, the hon. Member for Antrim, North accepted that Northern Ireland is a pluralistic society and must be treated as such. I agree with him. We have a pluralistic society in Northern Ireland and we need to reflect the differing aspirations of the different strains in our society. This was well put in the Blackburn report. Paragraph 12 states:

"If on the one hand the law is more restrictive than a significant proportion of the people wish it to be, then it is likely to be widely disregarded. If on the other hand the law is more permissive than the prevailing climate of opinion wants, then the public is needlessly offended and society incurs unnecessary cost."

"We do not think, therefore, that the operation of the law can be confined to limiting or influencing the individual's use of alcohol. We think that to be successful it must also to some extent reflect the demand for alcohol within the community."

Our present problem, as the right hon. Member for Strangford said, is that the licensing law is out of control. Can we therefore do something more to enforce the existing law? The answer given by the police is no. I have some sympathy with them, because the present law is extremely difficult to interpret.

I shall give the House an example. The hon. Member for Antrim, North said during the same debate during 1983 that he was not against the provision of drink on Sunday provided it was taken with a proper meal. But what is a proper meal? I know what a proper meal means to the hon. Gentleman. It means the same as it does to me—quantity and quality, perhaps in my case accompanied by a pint of Guinness. But that is not everyone's view. There are those who believe that a lettuce leaf resting lightly on some small unbuttered square of brown bread is a proper meal. Those who would consume such a meal would no doubt feel entitled to a glass of chilled white wine with such a feast. Are they to be denied?

Is each constable in the RUC to be left to determine the definition of a proper meal upon his own preference or palate, or will the matter be left to the whim of the magistrate and the preferences of their clerks? Is police and court time to be spent fruitlessly deciding how much fruit constitutes a meal or on interrogating a customer as to what he is about to eat or what he has just eaten? It would certainly make no sense to try to bring greater equity to this by bringing clubs and pubs into line with hotels on the provision of food. Why should the middle class who can afford to buy meals on Sunday have a drink while the ordinary working man in his club or pub would be denied?

I do not believe either that we should succeed if we decided on outright prohibition. The precedents of prohibition are hardly encouraging. There is enough gangster activity in Northern Ireland without encouraging any more. Shebeens would no doubt sprout like shamrock. How would we check that each tonic, each tomato juice, each orange cordial served in each hotel and each golf club on a Sunday was free of anything more exciting than lemon peel and ice? The present rules are ridiculous, but it is exactly because we have stumbled down this alley that we now have the law as an ass, unenforced and unenforceable.

The question is, if we accept that there is nothing in principle against a person purchasing liquor on a Sunday, or visiting a leisure centre or an ice rink, when and where should he or she be allowed to buy drink? What will be the effect on society? Will it, for example, increase the consumption of alcohol? Will it lead to greater alcoholism, or to increased public nuisance? As to increased consumption, of course I have carefully considered this aspect, but under the reforms in this order and the Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Order, which go together, I do not believe that that will happen. Under this order, not all pubs will open on a Sunday—the publican will have the choice. Under the registration of clubs order, clubs will lose four hours a week. Under this order, bring-a-bottle clubs, where drinking goes on at 3 o'clock in the morning, every morning, will be banned. I am confident that the effect of the Sunday opening of pubs on the overall availability and consumption of alcohol is likely to be small.

I have also been influenced by the finding of the surveys carried out in Scotland on the changes in the licensing laws since 1976, which included the Sunday opening of pubs. The overall conclusions were that the changes had not directly led to an increase in drinking, any adverse health effects, more alcohol-related crime, or more drunken driving.

That is not to deny the danger that alcohol abuse poses to health or, of course, the need to control and to treat it, but I do not believe that keeping pubs in Northern Ireland shut on a Sunday will make any impact on the health problems that are brought about by excessive drinking. We are legislating in support of a social custom that is enjoyed by the majority of the population in Northern Ireland—about 80 per cent. of men and 60 per cent. of women—very few of whom commit offences as a result of their drinking habits and very few of whom have related health problems.

As to nuisance, I am not convinced that the alterations will make life for the ordinary citizen any different. I spend many Sundays in Northern Ireland, where pubs are closed, and many Sundays in England, where pubs are open. I have noticed no great difference between the Province and the rest of the United Kingdom except the greater churchgoing of the Ulster people. I certainly do not take the view—to me it is insulting—that was taken by the former Assemblyman, Jim Wells, who said to my predecessor that most people go into pubs in Northern Ireland to get drunk. I just do not believe that. There are those who have said that Northern Ireland pubs are not like those in England and Wales. That statement conjures up the image of the "spit and sawdust" pub as being the norm in Northern Ireland, and there is the implication that people are satisfied with that. I reject that also.

Obviously those who say that have not been in many Northern Ireland pubs recently, or observed the large number of pubs that have been extensively refurbished. I hope that the changes that are being brought about by the order will lead to a better quality of pubs and perhaps, as has been experienced in Scotland, encourage a move from clubs to pubs.

There is also the matter of consultation. Why did we not decide to test opinion either through a Provincewide referendum or through district council referendums? I considered the matter carefully. First, I am not convinced that, even if a majority were opposed to Sunday opening of pubs, we should necessarily not allow the minority their wishes. As the hon. Member for Antrim, North said, this is a moral issue to be decided in a puralistic society. Secondly, it would be impossible to frame a question that would cover all the issues relating to the availability of drink on a Sunday. It would require the ingenuity of the general council of the TUC to wrap all the possible variations into a single composite question. The same difficulty would apply to local referendums, with the additional problems that we all know about with cost and wet and dry areas.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): Does the hon. Gentleman realise that another way of testing opinion through the elected representatives in Northern Ireland is by introducing a Bill in the House? All the serious matters that he is treating so flippantly could be explored with the depth and seriousness that they deserve rather than be treated with the hon. Gentleman's flippancy.

Mr. Needham: I assure the hon. Gentleman that I do not take the matter flippantly. I take it with the greatest possible seriousness. He is well aware that I wrote to him in October, putting forward the proposals that the Government intended to introduce. Until his intervention, I had not heard a single bleat or murmur from him. In fact, if it is his view that the matter should be considered in greater depth, there are ways, even now, to do so. For example, the hon. Gentleman could have utilised the Northern Ireland Committee if he had so wished. He did not undertake to do that. I am delighted to hear his intervention. I look forward to his continued interventions. The House takes the matter seriously, and so do I as the responsible Minister.

I now refer to the order. I apologise for the difficulty in following the amending legislation. The order, while substantially altering the 1971 legislation, leaves a large part of it unaffected, and its provisions have to be read in the context of the principal 1971 Act. In due course the licensing laws will be consolidated in a single piece of legislation. I hope that we shall be able to do that over the course of the next year.

I shall deal quickly with the main provisions of the order. The effect of article 3 is to ban bring-a-bottle clubs.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I appreciate and understand the anomalies and defects in the present law in Northern Ireland, but it would be helpful for the House to know whether there has been any pressure from a majority or a minority of the people of the Province to change that particular law which may or may not suit them.

Mr. Needham: The fact that the law in Northern Ireland on Sunday opening is widely abused and is unenforceable, and, as I said, I think before my hon. Friend took his place, has made the law appear a complete ass is one of the reasons why we feel that we should take this action. We cannot, as I said earlier, return to the draconian rules of the 1920s. We have spent most of the past 60 years making sensible amendments to them. It is because of the nonsense of the present laws, which many in Northern Ireland do not accept, that we are considering doing what we are tonight to bring the law into an enforceable and acceptable state for the majority of those who want to drink on Sunday.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): Has the Minister been aware of a substantial active lobby over the years against the 1971 legislation as it applies to the licensing of clubs? That is a crucial question.

Mr. Needham: As is usually the case in Northern Ireland, as the hon. Gentleman knows only too well, there are lobbies on everything and he is right to say that there have been fierce lobbies for and against what we intend doing in this order and what we are proposing to do in the next order on clubs. This order, as the hon. Gentleman is aware, deals with licensing provisions and the next order deals with clubs and their registration.

Mr. Mallon: I probably have not made myself clear and the Minister has misunderstood me. I have lived in the north of Ireland all my life and I have never been aware of a substantial lobby against the licensing laws as they apply to clubs. What is the difference between the licensing laws as they apply to clubs and as they apply to pubs? It was the answer to that question that I was trying to elicit from the Minister.

Mr. Needham: I apologise for not understanding the hon. Gentleman's point and I accept what he says.

Let me continue with the effect of article 3 which is to ban bring-a-bottle clubs. These clubs run until 3 am or 4 am and are largely supported by young people. Because they do not sell drink or supply it, they are completely outside the terms of either the licensing or clubs law. They cause law and order problems and are open to profiteering by criminal and paramilitary bodies. I am satisfied that the only answer is to ban them.

Article 4 will allow pubs to provide overnight accommodation, provided that they meet certain requirements. I am sure that that will be welcomed as another aid to tourism in the Province.

Article 5 makes changes in the application procedure for licences. The most important of these is to allow the individual publican to decide whether he wishes to open on a Sunday.

Article 6 allows a court to grant up to 13 occasional licenses on one application. At present, a separate application is needed for each. The new provision is designed to help bodies such as the Royal Ulster Agricultural Society which run a large number of exhibitions. This should reduce the work of the courts and save both the licensee's and the court's time.

Article 7 refers to extension licences which allow a licensee to sell drink at certain functions after normal hours. As under the existing law, there will be no restriction on the number of these which can be granted for any licensed premises in any one year. However, the extension licences will now stop at 1 am instead of of 1.30 am as at present and will be granted only for premises that a court regards as suitable for functions.

Article 8 provides the rules covering Sunday opening. The permitted hours will be from 12.30 pm to 2.30 pm and from 7 pm to 10 pm. On that day no off-sales will be allowed for pubs, hotels or off-licenses. Neither hotels nor pubs will be required to serve a meal as a condition of serving a drink. However, the meal and other conditions will apply to licensed restaurants.

Article 9, paragraph 1, amends the provisions of the 1971 Act relating to alternative hours for off-sales. The Government are worried about the growing problem of late night drinking in public, especially by young people. They have received many complaints on that subject and there is no doubt that some of the problem is due to the fact that young people can get their drinks from off-licences as late as 11 pm. The amendment means that off-sales shops will now be able to open only from 9.30 am to 9 pm, except in the case of off-sales that are attached to pubs.

Article 10 bans young people under the age of 18 from off-licence premises, except when they are with their parents. That, I am sure, will be welcomed by everyone. Apart from drink, off-licences in Northern Ireland can sell only cigarettes, tobacco, matches and fizzy drinks. Article 4, at their request, adds corkscrews. Generously, we have also added items such as crisps, pork scratchings and lighters, and that will also apply to public houses.

Article 9, paragraph 2, amends section 45 of the 1971 Act. The new provisions of the amendment will put pubs on a par with hotels and restaurants when applying for additional hours orders. However, pubs will still have to satisfy the conditions that apply to hotels and restaurants, and will also have a certificate from the tourist board stating that the premises are well equipped, run by competent staff and provide a high standard of catering. Here again, we are trying to improve the quality of public houses.

Article 11 substitutes a new section 67 for sections 67 and 68 of the 1971 Act and provides for new rights of entry and inspection by the police. Articles 12 and 13 contain miscellaneous amendments to the 1971 Act, and article 13, paragraph 6, brings ballrooms and horse and dog racing tracks within the range of facilities that can now apply for licences.

Article 14 substantially increses the maximum penalties for a number of offences. For example, the fine for permitting minors to be on licensed premises will go up from £400 to £1,000. The penalty for selling drink to a minor on licensed premises or purchasing it for his consumption on those premises goes up from £400 to £2,000 or imprisonment for six months, or both.

That concludes my detailed description of the provisions of the order. I thank hon. Members for their attention and patience. As I have explained, the order is the first part of the package of reform which we are here to discuss; we shall debate the second part later tonight.

Public debate in Northern Ireland on this order has focused almost exclusively on the issue of Sunday opening of public houses. The key question on that issue is whether to take the route advocated by some and abandon Sunday opening altogether, or move closer to the pattern of the rest of the United Kingdom. In an increasingly pluralistic society, we could not agree to closing everything, nor could we, for the overwhelming practical reasons I have given, either stay where we are, or impose further piecemeal restrictions. I believe that what we are suggesting this evening creates a more sensible balance and introduces a law which at last is enforceable and will be enforced.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) rose——

Mr. Needham: I commend the order to the House.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I thank the Minister for giving way. He referred to the increased fines or penalties for selling drinks to teenagers. Can he say how many people have hitherto been brought before the courts for such offences? What difference will increasing the penalties make if the law, as it stands, has not been in operation?

Mr. Needham: The whole point of what we are trying to do this evening is to ensure that the law that we introduce is more capable of enforcement than that of the past.

As I was just about to sit down, I shall cover the hon. Gentleman's point when I reply. For the second time, I commend the order to the House.

9.53 pm

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): First, I thank the Minister for the kind words that he addressed to me at the beginning of his speech. I appreciate them greatly and I look forward to my work shadowing him and his right hon. and hon. Friends. The Minister used the phrase, "the poisoned chalice of Northern Ireland". I do not regard it as such, but I wondered what sort of vessel I was being given when I went to the Library this evening having suddenly been given this work to do in the space of two hours, and was presented with all these documents. I was left with the feeling that perhaps the best thing to do would be to sit out most of this order and listen to what was said by the rival parties.

The Minister covered the whole of the ground set out in the arguments by both sides and examined very fairly the cases for and against the alterations. Within half an hour of being appointed I was lobbied by the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) on this matter. I toyed with the idea of the local option and thought, "Why not?" Then my mind went back to the time when I lived in Liverpool and looked at what was happening in Wales about local options. They just did not work there and that was for the reason that the Minister has given.

If a person belonged to a golf club or to a branch of the Royal British Legion or some other institution, he could get a drink on Sunday anywhere in Wales. That did not drive to drink people who did not want to have a drink. It did not stop people going to chapel or church if they wished to do so and it does not stop people in any locality who do not wish to have a drink on Sunday from attending any of the places that sell drink on that day. If such places are not allowed to sell drink on Sundays, they will not open on Sundays.

I am concerned about minors being prohibited from certain premises and about preventing under-18-year-olds buying drink from off-licences. This may be an important reform being introduced in Northern Ireland and it will be watched carefully by people on the mainland to see the effect that it has on under-age drinking and on some of the unfortunate things that many of us see in our constituencies. We see young people, some under-age and some over-age, going into off-licences, purchasing drinks and then going away and getting drunk and disturbing innocent residents and passers-by.

One of the problems associated with this matter is the responsibility of the person controlling the premises. When the Under-Secretary of State replies to the debate, perhaps he will tell us whether the defence will be that of unknowingly selling to people under the age of 18, or will it be a question of absolute prohibition? Will the defence of not knowing be applicable in this case? I am conscious of the fact that I have not carried out as much reading as I should have liked of the Assembly report, although I did manage the Blackburn report. On balance, we think that this measure ought to be supported because it can do away with some of the problems. It can help the police in Northern Ireland and make the law more enforceable and may introduce important reforms on sales to minors. We support the measure.

9.58 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): I regret that I was not present at the beginning of the debate. I am sorry that I did not hear what the Minister said about remarks that I made. However, I think that I received a true and accurate report from my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson). Before I come to that matter, I should say that we in Northern Ireland must enter the strongest possible protest about the way in which this matter has been dealt with in the House. Scotland had a similar problem. Liverpool has been mentioned and so has Wales.

When the matter came before the House every consideration was given to there being a drastic change in the opening hours of public houses on the Christian Sabbath. Hon. Members from those parts of the United Kingdom had every opportunity to put before the House amendments giving the reasons why certain matters should be taken into account. We should keep in mind the effects of our legislation on majority and minority interests.

If I had been in this House when it debated the legislation for the rest of the United Kingdom I could have moved amendments and had them voted on. Northern Ireland hon. Members now find themselves considering a matter that runs into the very heart and gut of the Northern Ireland community, yet we are not to have the opportunity of a democratic debate. We cannot move any amendments and we shall not be given the opportunity to vote on any amendments. An unamendable Order in Council will be put through this House with the overwhelming support of a majority of hon. Members who will probably never be in Northern Ireland on a Sunday. They will probably never enter a public house in Northern Ireland on a Sunday or partake of alcohol in Northern Ireland on a Sunday.

That is what we protest against tonight because it goes against the very principle of democracy. That is what the people of Northern Ireland find obnoxious. I do not think that I need to reiterate that point, because others in this House are beginning to realise at long last that the long series of protests made by hon. Members from Northern Ireland has a great deal of credibility; our protests have their own authority.

As the House votes on these orders it should remember how it dealt with the legislation affecting other parts of the United Kingdom. It is wrong to suggest that every part of this kingdom is the same and therefore that all the laws should be the same. England has different laws from Scotland and, in some cases, Wales has different laws from England and Scotland. Whatever their attitude on this matter, the people in Northern Ireland have the right to insist that their elected representatives should enjoy the same rights as the elected representatives of other parts of the United Kingdom—to state and argue their case, to move amendments, to vote and to seek the satisfaction of their wishes in a democratic way in this democratic House.

Let me come to the point which has to do with legislating for morality. Everybody agrees that the House cannot legislate for morality. Of course we cannot make people do things that they do not want to do. But in its legislation this House puts up certain markers to morality. Take the matter of prostitution, for instance. Certain laws in this country provide markers on that and possibly deterrents to it. It is no use the Minister instantly dismissing this point and saying, "Well, as I cannot legislate for morality, I am on firm ground in introducing this order." If we said that we could not legislate on any matter that would intrude into the morality or choice of individuals, no Government would have a case for making any laws at all. But we legislate on such matters all the time.

Something else needs to be said to the Minister. I do not understand his view that in these circumstances we cannot have a choice in law to say that certain places should be closed on Sundays. That is not what successive Governments have done on this issue. The people of Northern Ireland are perfectly entitled, through their representatives, to say what they think should be done and what should not be done. The Government have already made decisions in various matters of this kind.

Some people have the strange philosophy that this is a purely Protestant issue, that those who do not want the public houses opened are all Protestants and that the Roman Catholic community is unanimous in wanting the pubs of Northern Ireland to be open on Sundays. Ulster Marketing Surveys Limited carried out some research into this matter. It showed that 39 per cent. of the total population strongly opposed Sunday opening, 19 per cent. were strongly in favour, 24 per cent. were slightly in favour, 13 per cent. were slightly opposed and 6 per cent.

did not know. The breakdown of those strongly opposed showed that 45 per cent. were Protestant and 30 per cent. were Roman Catholic. It is therefore quite wrong to suggest, as I have heard from Members whom I have lobbied on the subject, that this is merely a Protestant interest and that the Protestants do not want the Roman Catholics to be allowed to drink on Sundays.

The Secretary of State smiles, but I must tell the House that anyone who wants a drink on Sunday in Northern Ireland can get one. I challenge anyone to claim that some poor thirsty souls cannot get a drink anywhere in Northern Ireland on a Sunday. The Minister and I do not often agree, but he will agree with me that those with that particular type of thirst can always find a drink on Sunday in Northern Ireland. I am sorry that their thirst is not for that water of which a man drinks and will never thirst again, but that is their misfortune. I hope that no one will be so foolish as to say that a person who wants to drink on Sunday in Northern Ireland cannot do so because that is totally untrue.

I cannot understand why Northern Ireland cannot be treated in the same way as other parts of the United Kingdom were treated when this was an issue there. It was an issue in Scotland and, indeed, in Wales.

I welcome the new Opposition spokesman on Northern Ireland — the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara)—to his post. He will probably have a rough ride from Ulster Unionists, but he has been used to that through the years and it will not make any difference to him. The hon. Gentleman mentioned Liverpool.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest) I do not quite follow the argument of the hon. Gentleman. I feel that he has begun to destroy his argument. The hon. Gentleman says that someone can get a drink on a Sunday in Northern Ireland. Why is it all right to get a drink in an hotel, restaurant or even a club but wrong to get it in a pub?

Rev. Ian Paisley: That is not what I am saying. I am sorry that the hon. Member does not know a little bit more about Northern Ireland and about drinking in Northern Ireland. All those in Northern Ireland who have studied alcohol abuse, no matter what their religion—no matter if they have no religion — say that there are far too many outlets for alcohol in Northern Ireland.

If we pass this order, there will be 10,000 additional hours for alcohol consumption. I do not know of a stronger argument that could be put against this order.

It is a pity that the Government did not take the bull by the horns and dealt with drinking clubs in the way that they should have been dealt with. That is the trouble.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: They have dealt with those clubs.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The drinking clubs have got away with a coach-and-four with regard to the sale of alcohol. I can understand the views of publicans—I have been lobbied by them. They must have a certain standard of premises, their trade must be carried on to a certain standard and the public house is open to inspection by the police at all times during opening hours. However, the drinking clubs do not have those restrictions and publicans cannot understand that. I can understand the concern of publicans.

The Government have not moved to shut the other outlets for alcohol and they will continue to exist. However, as a result of this order, the Government will allow an additional 10,000 hours for alcohol consumption.

The hon. Member for Epping Forest, who said that I was destroying my argument, should come with me to parts of Northern Ireland where both sides of the community do not want the public house to be opened on a Sunday. They want the peace and quiet that is hard to get and they want that peace and quiet to continue.

I have also been lobbied by people who work in public houses who say that they deserve a day of rest—I am talking about people in the trade union movement. They say that it is all right for the publican, but they want a day of rest.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): I am a little confused by the hon. Gentleman's argument. A moment ago he suggested that the Government had done nothing about illegal drinking clubs. I believe that the essence of this order is that it would ban, as much as any legislation can, the bring-a-bottle clubs and place restrictions upon them. They will give the police rights of entry and the right to search those establishments. In all honesty, I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would welcome this legislation.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman must have been sleeping. I never mentioned illegal clubs. I am talking about legal clubs that should have been dealt with long ago.

I am talking not about the shebeens, but about the legal clubs that are supposed to be recreational clubs. However those clubs spend £14 million a year on liquor. Why were the drinking hours on Sundays not restricted? Why say to the publican that he can open for a few hours but say to the licensed club owner that he may open for as many hours as he likes, well into the early hours of Monday? I am not talking about illegal clubs that should have been closed a long time ago. I am talking about legal clubs, but at long last a deterrent has been introduced to restrict the number of illegal clubs. It is necessary now to produce audited accounts.

I invite the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) to visit Northern Ireland. I shall arrange for a Roman Catholic to meet him and take him to the Roman Catholic district to hear the views of Roman Catholics. I shall arrange for a Protestant to take him to a Protestant area. Arrangements can then be made for a Jew to take him to a Jewish area. If it is possible to find an agnostic area, arrangements will be made to take him there. After that, he will have a proper knowledge of feelings in Northern Ireland. Anyone who intervenes in these debates should try to ascertain exactly what is happening in Northern Ireland. In these days of alcohol abuse, and when the police in Northern Ireland are strained to the utmost in dealing with terrorism, does anyone say that it is sensible to add 10,000 hours to the opening times that outlets for alcohol already have? Hon. Members should search their consciences. The issue before the House should be considered seriously.

Why were restrictions introduced in other parts of the United Kingdom? Why are the restrictions that operate in Northern Ireland all to be swept away in an hour and a half's debate? We are debating an issue that affects the young people of Northern Ireland and the future of society generally in the Province. It affects the well-being of families in Northern Ireland.

I believe that the Lord's day should be a special day. I believe that the human body was so created by God that it requires a day of rest. A Sunday that is kept in the proper manner will bring a week of contentment afterwards. Apart from that, there are arguments that can be advanced showing why we should not proceed in this manner.

There are hon. Members who do not understand the way in which opening hours are arrived at for pubs in Northern Ireland. One hon. Member was amazed when he was told that our system is entirely different from that which applies elsewhere in the United Kingdom. He thought that after the passage of this measure the licensing magistrates would have a say about every public house that is to be opened on Sundays. Hon. Members should not believe that. After this measure passes through the House all public houses that currently have a licence to open during weekdays will be able to open on Sundays.

First, we must ascertain what we are arguing about, and then we can come to our own conclusions. Every reputable authority says that longer opening hours and greater consumption will bring additional problems. I do not think that the House wants to add more problems to a system that is already teeming with problems.

The House should not pass this measure. We should have a further opportunity to consider the safeguards that were given to other parts of the United Kingdom. Why have these safeguards not been given to Northern Ireland? Why cannot people have a say about what is happening in their area in respect of public houses? Why should we be faced with this blanket measure that will lead to Sunday opening?

A publican said to me, "If the public house down the street opens, I must open if I am to keep my business." That position is not helpful in Northern Ireland. We should proceed this evening in dealing with Northern Ireland as we proceeded when dealing with other parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): The way in which this debate is taking place puts its context into perspective. I do not have to reiterate that in the North of Ireland more than 2,500 people have died and a large number of our young people are in gaol. We have social deprivation, an economic situation and unemployment that is unequalled anywhere else in this country. Yet one of the biggest issues that is facing us is whether I shall be able to have a pint before my lunch on Sunday.

Does not that put the nature of this entire debate into context? I believe that it sharpens totally the context in which the debate is taking place and highlights the fact that with this legislation the Government are trying to do something which, quite frankly, should have been done years ago. Perhaps that view is too cynical. I hope that it is not, because I know that there are many genuine and sincere people who hold the opposing points of view on this to me, and who wish to retain Sunday closing. I accept the sincerity of their position and of their point of view.

However, this issue goes beyond the issue of the opening or closing of pubs. It even goes beyond the question of the licensing of clubs of any type. It raises two questions. It asks questions about the nature of people in Northern Ireland and about the type of people that they want to be. It also asks about the type of society that we want to create in the North of Ireland and about the type of society that we might be able to create. This debate probably tells, and will tell, more about our attitudes, in the broader sense, than many of the debates in which we shall take part. What do we want in the north of Ireland where, on an ongoing basis, we have nothing but closures? The swings on which children could play on a Sunday are closed. The swimming pools in which people could enjoy themselves are closed and the pubs in which people could relax are also closed. Is it a coincidence that those closures are accompanied by probably the greatest conglomeration of closed minds of any country in western Europe? I believe that there is a connection and that we must consider the nature of society in Northern Ireland, and its politics and structures when we engage in this debate.

We have been told, and we will be told, that it is a question of morality. We will be told, in no uncertain terms, that it is a question of one person's belief taking precedence over that of another person. I do not believe that God gives anyone the right or the duty to legislate for my conscience or for the conscience of anybody else in the north of Ireland on such a matter. One could not do so successfully in any case because the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) has confirmed something that most people in the north of Ireland know, which is that, once there is this type of legislation in a modern society, one creates the opposite effect to that intended.

I ask, because this question should be asked, whether as a result of the licensing law changes in Scotland, any village or town there has gone to the dogs? Perhaps we should take Bickley, that haven of depravity, as an example of the results of the licensing laws that pertain in England. It is an insult to the people of Northern Ireland to suggest that because they have the right and the ability to go for a drink before their lunch on a Sunday, all of a sudden the North of Ireland will become a terrible place, that it will be worse than it is now and that people will indulge in depravity. The people of Northern Ireland are not like that. In my view, they will respond to this type of legislation positively and responsibly. They will be no more depraved than the people in Kirkcaldy, Bickley or any other part of western Europe.

This also poses the question: what type of ethic do we want to live by in the north of Ireland? Is it a completely authoritarian ethic where we are told we may or may not do something depending on the moral attitudes of the majority of people there or is it an ethic based on freedom of choice? Do we have the strength to accept and live respectfully with the differences, political, cultural and moral, that exists in the north of Ireland? Or are we simply so weak that we demand one set of rules and the denial of choice because at the end of the day in such matters if we have the choice to be right, we also have the right to be wrong, if that is our choice? That must be the essential view regarding morality.

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): Is not the basis of the hon. Gentleman's argument rather false and hypocritical, particularly when one considers that he wants the Unionists to join a united Ireland which legislates on divorce, abortion, the sale of contraceptives and other such matters?

Mr. Mallon: The profundity of that question eludes me —[Interruption.]—and, judging from the reactions of most other hon. Members present, it has also eluded them.

Rev. William McCrea: Is it not true that the Government of the south of Ireland do not allow people the right to divorce, if they want it, or the liberty to choose to have contraceptives? Is that the sort of society which he speaks of as a liberal society and which we should all wish to live in?

Mr. Mallon: That is not the type of society that I want in a united Ireland. It is very much the type of society that I do not want. I want people to be able to live by their own consciences, not by any piece of legislation, whether in the Republic of Ireland, the north of Ireland or here. I ask the hon. Gentleman to make a serious attempt to help to create on the island of Ireland a proper legislative basis which allows that freedom of choice.

What type of people do we want to be? What type of society do we wish to have? In the north of Ireland I often hear people saying that they admire "the British way of life". I do not hear that among those I represent because we are not enamoured of the British connection. We wish to live in the type of united Ireland that I am trying to describe to the hon. Member for mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea). What about this "British way of life", so admired by the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues? It would be much more beneficial if they were to adopt it, to live it and to introduce it into their legislation. That is the acid test of that phrase.

Mr. Porter: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the British way of life accepts diversity? Does he further accept that the Scots and Welsh in their own time determine whether public houses should be open on Sundays for their own reasons, whether for tourism or economics? It appears that there is no evidence yet that the Northern Irish people want their somewhat archaic laws changed.

Mr. Mallon: The fact that there has never been a substantial lobby against the licensing laws available to clubs shows that the majority of people in the north of Ireland do not hold this moralistic view about licensing laws. They are worried about the legalities and the potential for abuse. That is why I would dispute whether a majority of people oppose this legislation.

What type of society do we want? Do we want to be totally isolationist? Do we want to be introverted, or out of step with the rest of Ireland, Britain and Europe? Are we to be the oddities of the western world where we say no to everything, and where everything is closed including our minds? Is that the type of Northern Ireland that we want? Do we want to be out of step with our Johnnies over there? Do we want to be the oddities of the western world without allowing ourselves the ability to relax and enjoy that little bit of relaxation? A little bit of human frailty might get us away from many of the problems that we face and many of the terribly absolute positions that we adopt.

I praise the Minister for bringing the legislation forward. It is a recognition of the terrible injustices that publicans have suffered in the north of Ireland down through the years. They had to compete with clubs and hotels because the publicans were being under-cut in the prices that they were charging. So many of the clubs were de-rated while the publican was, and still is, paying very heavy rates. The publican was unable to deal with his overheads in the same way as the clubs and hotels. The competition was unfair and unjust and I am glad that it has been put right.

There was also social discrimination to which the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) referred. If people can afford it, they can go to a hotel and have a meal. If they can afford it, they can become members of a club. People can have drinks at both. If people cannot do either of those things, if they live in a village in any part of the north of Ireland or in the towns, they cannot do that. That cannot be right in any man's language. The people who are suffering and being deprived are those who simply cannot afford to have a meal in a hotel or join a club.

The legislation governing clubs and hotels is one of the factors that has forced people to drink and drive. Invariably in the north of Ireland people get in their cars and drive to hotels and clubs. Would it not be much better for the whole of society, if a person feels that he wants a drink, for him to be able to walk down the street, drop into his pub and have his pint or two—and perhaps even three—and then walk home again? That factor is worth considering.

I welcome the legislation. I hope that I may indulge in a little whimsy at the end of my speech. For many of us, the legislation marks the end of an era. It is well known that forbidden fruit always tastes sweeter. There will be many in the north of Ireland who will remember with nostalgia the knock at the back door, the dim lights, walking in and then that feeling of excitement because one was going to enjoy oneself so much more because one was not allowed to do something.

10.32 pm

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): I congratulate the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) on extending this debate to more of the social issues of the day in Northern Ireland, because a pub is a very social place. It is a meeting place where people discuss the issues of the day and where opinions are formed. It is a sensible meeting place. Even my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (S. B. Braine)—who I know has very important views on the licensed trade generally and on drink—would concede that the British pub is unique. Any legislation that will enhance its standing and improve facilities in the pub, even to the detriment of other outlets for alcohol, is to be commended. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Newry and Armagh that this legislation should have been brought forward many years ago.

Nevertheless, my hon. Friend the Minister is to be congratulated because the Blackburn report was produced in 1978 and it has only taken the Northern Ireland Office nine years to get around to amending the law in Northern Ireland. It is now 15 years since the Erroll report was published on reforming the licensing laws in England and Wales and we are still waiting for action. I am glad to say that, following the manifesto commitment to that end, we are likely to see a change in the law for England and Wales quite soon.

I wholeheartedly welcome the measure, because it appears to bring more into line the licensing laws relating to pubs and clubs, which over the years have manifestly become more out of line. It provides for all hotels, restaurants, clubs and pubs to share the same opening hours seven days a week. Extension hours will also be the same for all. There will be no overall increase in the number of opening hours, as there will be a reduction of 13 minutes in the normal daily opening hours for clubs. All public house extensions will be reduced by 30 minutes, and club extensions by two hours. I do not know where the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. I. Paisley) finds the extra 10,000 drinking hours which he says will be available.

There are more flexible features in the licensing orders for pubs to allow for greater development of tourist and food business, and that is to be commended. The two principal points are the provision for accommodation in pubs, which will allow a new style of outlet to develop, and the provision to allow a pub the same extended hours as a hotel or restaurant if it has a full restaurant facility.

The proposals do not force Sunday opening on those who do not wish to avail themselves of it. At licensing renewal, the option of a six or seven-day licence is at the publican's discretion. Even with a seven-day licence, opening on a Sunday may not be economically viable because of location, and the publican need not open.

I should like to ask my hon. Friend a question about the permitted-hours clause in the lease that most licensees sign with their brewers. That clause, if ultimately enforced, means that the publican must open for all the hours permitted by the local licensing courts. In some parts of the United Kingdom, the permitted-hours clause is not onerously enforced, but in other parts the brewers can be pretty heavy-handed. They say to the publican, "You will open for every hour that you are permitted by law to do so. If you do not, we shall evict you and tear up your lease."

Should there be any provision in the law to protect publicans if the law is relaxed so that permitted hours cannot onerously be enforced on publicans? The question is particularly relevant to Sunday opening. If the law says, "You may open on Sunday," and the licensing courts say the same, and if the publican chooses not to do so—after all, freedom of choice is an important principle in our party—can the brewer force him to?

The most controversial issue relates to the Sunday opening of pubs. The present laws, in my view, are a bit of a nonsense, and have fallen into disrepute. They seem to work unfairly against pubs as compared with clubs, hotels and restaurants, and many pubs have closed, with loss of employment and amenity. I am told that directives have been sent out by one bank to its branches saying that publicans are a poor credit risk. Perhaps changing the law will make them a better risk and enable them to obtain the credit that they require to improve their facilities, which will assist tourism and the economy of Northern Ireland generally.

The present laws on Sunday opening are almost unenforceable, save at disproportionate cost. The principle of Sunday drinking has long been established in clubs, hotels and restaurants, and anyone in Northern Ireland who wants to get a drink on Sunday can do so. As a pub is probably the most sensible place in which to drink, why can he not get that drink in a pub? Under this legislation, Northern Ireland will come more into line with the rest of the United Kingdom. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Antrim, North that we do not want to be exactly the same, but this is a united kingdom, and the more our laws are in line, the better. He also referred to public opinion and produced some interesting statistics, but I believe that opinion is pretty evenly divided on this issue, as shown by the attitude surveys and the response to the Government's proposal.

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is not aware that the licensing laws in Wales are different from those in other parts of the United Kingdom. The people of Northern Ireland should have the right to decide for themselves; it should not be done through an order tabled in the House. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is unaware that, for the past 30 years in Wales, we have had the right to vote every seven years to say whether we are in favour of Sunday opening. I am the only Member in the House who represents a dry district council area. Whether that is a good thing or not, the people of Northern Ireland, like the people of Wales, should determine whether they want pubs to open on Sunday.

Mr. Colvin: That was an interesting intervention. In a sense, it was a speech, so the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) can now go and have a drink and leave the answer to that question to my hon. Friend the Minister. A strong measure of local control over licensing hours is wise. That is why the Government are trying to lay down the broad parameters for licensing hours but will not force anyone to open. Even in Northern Ireland, there will be some control by the licensing courts. I agree that the law is different in Wales, but the hon. Gentleman will agree that the Welsh are very different from the rest of us.

Public opinion on this matter is pretty evenly divided. In response to the published proposals, 16,500 letters were in favour and 10,500 were opposed, and a couple of church petitions also opposed it.

There has been much discussion of the health aspects of the proposals, because some have said that they will undoubtedly lead to more drinking hours. My hon. Friend the Member for Antrim, North mentioned the example of Scotland. I shall quote some of the figures from the experience in Scotland. There is no reason why a similar experience should not pertain in Northern Ireland.

The law was changed in Scotland in 1976. Between 1979 and 1982, convictions for drunkenness in Scotland fell by 28 per cent., whereas in England and Wales they fell by only 9 per cent. The figures for under-21s were even better. Although consumption of drink has increased in Scotland, the extra drinking is done in pubs rather than elsewhere. Not so many people are buying drink at off-licences and taking it home, which is a bad place to drink. The pub is a sensible place in which to drink. That is what has happened in Scotland. The health aspects have been totally beneficial in Scotland——

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): My hon. Friend has just said that everything in the garden is rosy as regards health. Since he has the figures there, can he tell us the statistics in respect of cirrhosis of the liver? Is he aware that those people who were drinking hard before the reforms are now drinking harder? What has been the effect upon women in Scotland? Let us have the whole story.

Mr. Colvin: The debate is about Northern Ireland. I am drawing a comparison with Scotland because I think that it is relevant. My right hon. Friend has asked particularly about liver cirrhosis. Liver cirrhosis mortality trends have not changed because of the altered licensing laws in Scotland, nor has there been an increase in alcohol-related mortality. There has been a downward trend in admissions to psychiatric hospitals for alcoholism and alcohol dependence. Relative risks from drunk driving have declined in Scotland compared with England and Wales. Overall, the trends in Scotland compared with England and Wales have proved to be favourable. In 1979, there were 13,628 charges in Scotland for drunkenness. Following the experience of the change in the law, there were only 6,618 in 1984. The experience has been beneficial, and I hope that the same will happen in Northern Ireland.

We are trying to equalise the law as between the pub and the club. The Brewing Review published in 1986 shows that in 1976, the year in which the law was changed, 23 per cent. of drinking occurred in public houses and 23 per cent. in licensed clubs. By 1984, consumption in public houses had increased to 28 per cent. and consumption in licensed clubs had decreased to 18 per cent. Experience will show that, if we equalise the law as between pubs and clubs and make the market more equal, the trend will be in the right direction.

Although I have not drunk much in pubs in Northern Ireland, I have a son who served in the same regiment in which I served and who has just returned from Northern Ireland. He said that the experience of drinking in pubs there was to be commended. He found outside one pub a ditty which I have stuck up outside my pub, which reads:

"Who comes here?
A grenadier.
What do you want?
A pot of beer.
Where's yer money?
I forgot!
Get you home you drunken sot."

In other words, tick, or credit, in Northern Ireland is no easier than in this country here. I am sure that that notice outside my pub will encourage my hon. Friends who go there for a drink to ensure that they take enough money with them and not expect credit at The Cricketers Arms in Tangley.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on bringing forward this measure. I wholeheartedly commend it to the House and I hope that it will be passed.

10.47 pm

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): The slip of the tongue at the end of the speech of the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) was revealing when he talked about the difference between Northern Ireland and "this country here". Northern Ireland is part of this country here. It is worth reminding the House that two separate issues are before us. One is whether pubs should be open on a Sunday and the other concerns the way in which we go about making decisions for the different parts of the United Kingdom.

On the first issue, I freely admit that, like probably many hon. Members, I enjoy a drink, not least after church on a Sunday evening. If I were voting for provisions in my region, I would be one of those who argued, like the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) did, for the opening of public houses each day. It is a matter of choice. It is a matter of moderation. I accept that the overuse of alcohol undoubtedly leads to not only physical but emotional problems. Much violence and brutality can be associated with it. The overuse of alcohol in cities such as mine, Liverpool, can have dire consequences.

The second issue is about the differences of opinion in different parts of the United Kingdom. Clearly, there are differences of opinion in Northern Ireland. The Lord's Day Observance Society, the Presbyterian Church of Northern Ireland, people from all parts of the religious equation and the trade unions have given their opinions, suggesting that public houses should not be able to open on a Sunday.

I find it ironic that Northern Ireland hon. Members should be able to amend proposals for drinking laws in Scotland, England and in Wales, but, when we consider such matters, Northern Ireland Members cannot move amendments because of the ways in which we consider such proceedings. That is why I signal a warning to the Government that, unless we do something about the overuse of Orders in Council and the constant resort to one-and-a-half hour debates to ram through Government proposals, we shall have no choice but to—[AN HON. MEMBER: "You?"]—Yes, we and other hon. Members from other political parties. We shall have no choice but to vote against the Government when they bring forward proposals that are clearly unacceptable to many people in Northern Ireland.

Such matters would be far better considered by a Northern Ireland committee, which could be established under Standing Order No. 99. They would be far better considered by Northern Ireland hon. Members. It would be far better if we could consider Bills in the normal way, with their being open to amendment. It is for the second of those reasons—it has nothing to do with the drinking laws in Northern Ireland—that my right hon. and hon. Friends and I shall call a vote. We may find ourselves in the Division Lobby with some hon. Members from Northern Ireland. It is time that such issues were considered in the Chamber, on their merits, open to amendment and not simply put to the House for black and white yes-no decisions which force polarisation. It is quite obvious that people are constantly forced to take decisions on issues and are not given a chance to vote for the shades of grey that often exist or to vote for amendments.

For those reasons—not the ones that were advanced earlier about Sunday opening—of diversity and choice, and bearing in mind the differences of opinion that exist in many parts of our islands and people's rights to decide for themselves in the places where they live, that we shall be with those who choose to divide the House tonight.

10.51 pm

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): I wish to approach the matter from a somewhat different angle and perhaps to sound a somewhat different warning. From what we have heard, it is quite clear that the licensing law in Northern Ireland is in disarray. One can understand the Government wishing to put it into better order, although it is exceedingly doubtful whether making it possible to drink more rather than less will improve matters. The licensing law is broken daily in this country. There has been a failure to deal with the rising tide of under-age drinking that is taking place all over the kingdom, the full facts of which were revealed to the Government by their Office of Population Censuses and Surveys about three years ago. Its report was withheld from publication for at least a year.

[Sir Bernard Braine]

The facts exist, and they demonstrate not only that there is a serious rising tide of under-age drinking in our public houses but that an overwhelming proportion of boys from the age of 13 upward had their first drinks not at home, not as a result of buying liquor from supermarkets, but in public houses. The law here is not being properly enforced. In short, that is why we should be concerned not merely with legal consequences but with the social and health consequences of any change in the licensing law of any part of the United Kingdom. I fervently believe that, as long as the majority of its people wish it to remain part of the United Kingdom, that should be the case. Northern Ireland should not be treated in a different way. We are all concerned about the matter. We cannot sweep aside the strong objections that are coming from the Province.

There is another good reason why we should not sweep those objections aside. There is no justification for tampering with the licensing laws anywhere in the United Kingdom before the full implications of the rising levels of consumption are understood. In addition to under-age drinking, we have the carnage on the roads and a clear link between alcohol abuse and marital break-up, non-acccidental injury to children and crime of every kind. Before any increase in drinking hours, in pubs or in clubs, is allowed, the full social and health implications should be properly understood.

The order comes to us hot-foot on the announcement in the Queen's Speech that licensing hours in England and Wales are to be extended. All this flies in the face of expert opinion. I am speaking not of the drink and tourist trades but about the views that have been expressed by doctors and magistrates.

I received a letter from Dr. Havard, secretary of the British Medical Association, when we were discussing the Bill affecting England and Wales. He wanted me to make it clear to the House that his association was opposed to any tampering with the licensing laws until the health implications were grasped. He wrote:

"There is no conclusive evidence that a change in licensing hours would decrease the health and social costs of alcohol abuse and every reason to fear that it would exacerbate an already deteriorating situation."

The Government must take note of the request by the World Health Organisation that by the 1990s all member states should reduce the level of alcohol consumption by at least 25 per cent., so great is the cost on a global scale. What has been the British Government's response? It has been to increase licensing hours, to do nothing about the proliferation of outlets, to make no moves to deal with under-age drinking in public houses and to do nothing about the link between alcohol drunk to excess and crime.

No wonder Dr. Havard wrote in his letter to me:

"Why, when other countries are desperately tightening up on the availability of alcohol, are we taking up parliamentary time relaxing things?"

Mr. Gorbachev has had the honesty to deal publicly with this problem in the Soviet Union. He has done it in a way one would never have thought possible in that country. All civilised countries are concerned about the problem, yet here we are tampering with the licensing laws before any of the other issues to which I have referred have been considered.

On 1 July The Times published a letter from Dr. Douglas Acres, a constituent of mine who is the chairman of the council of the Magistrates' Association, in which he made it clear that any tampering with the licensing laws was a mistake. Not only are all the caring agencies opposed to any extension, but I am astonished to note that the only published statement by any British Government since the 1930s on the subject of alcohol abuse was that produced by the Department of Health and Social Security entitled "Drinking Sensibly." What does that tell us? It tells us repeatedly that, if anything, there is a case for increasing the restrictions, not lessening them. Why is the Department of Health so silent on this matter? We have had evidence from that Department—the only evidence that we have ever had from it—that grave health harm is being caused and that there are risks in tampering with the licensing laws. The Minister responsible for roads and traffic has courageously drawn attention to the carnage on the roads. So why is there no co-ordination on these matters? Why did the Government see the light in the area of drug abuse? They appointed an interdepartmental co-ordinating committee under the then Minister of State that has worked well. It has brought together all the facets of prevention, treatment and so on. However, they have not done that on the issue of alcohol. Why? The House will find its own answer. Just as the proposed Licensing (Amendment) Bill is a mistake, the order is a mistake until such time as the Government demonstrate that they understand the totality of the problem. They must act soon, because the harm is mounting all the time.

11.2 pm

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I welcome the opportunity to follow the right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), who stressed the health factors that are involved. Traditionally in Northern Ireland, licensing laws have been dealt with by the Department of Health and Social Services. Unlike England, where we deal with the problem largely through the Home Office, in Northern Ireland alcohol is reckoned to have a direct impact on the health of the community.

The health factors are important. I was fascinated by the concluding comment of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon), who spoke of the days when the "knock knock" would be over. I put it to him, and the House, that even with these laws, the "knock knock" and after-hours drinking will continue. I am worried that the Minister has put forward nothing to show us how the law as amended will be implemented any better than previous legislation.

When facts and figures are adduced to show that, since the change of licensing laws in Scotland, there has been a decrease in convictions for crime and traffic accidents as a result of drinking offences I wonder whether any examination has been conducted into whether constables have merely said, on many occasions, "Get a grip on yourself; away home and don't let that happen again." How many cases have not been pursued because of a tendency to have a little compassion on a person who is under the influence, if not downright inebriated?

When the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh talked of the more relaxed opportunities that now exist for walking down to the village pub, did he, or any hon. Member, really believe that people in Northern Ireland will not still drink and drive, with the consequent calamity of road accidents? If so, I refer them to yesterday evening's Belfast Telegraph, in which there is an article entitled "Government slammed over summer drink-drive move".

Perhaps it is an act of midsummer madness to introduce extended licensing hours tonight, when, yesterday evening, two groups that are particularly concerned with fighting alcohol abuse criticised the Government for introducing a summer drink-driving campaign while passing laws to make Sunday drinking easier. That can be added to the point made by the right hon. Member for Castle Point. As we have been reminded in the debate, it is a tragedy that the House can only reject or accept the order. The Government have brought this forward and I imagine that the Whips will be in position and that there will be enough payroll votes to get the measure through. That is not a proper example of democracy in action.

Mr. Will Glendinning of the Alliance party in Northern Ireland was quoted last night as saying that it has been recognised that increased availability can lead to increased consumption and increased harm. The Government act quite rightly against drinking and driving, but perhaps they should realise that there are things other than an advertising campaign and the breathalysing of people. One of those things is the use of the law as a marker to discourage certain practices.

It is possible to quote from various statistics, but if one examines the statistics presented by the Central Policy Study Group and by others, one will discover that not only is there a difference in the rate of alcoholism between the citizens of England and Wales and those of Scotland, but that there is an increased level of alcoholism in Northern Ireland. When one examines the statistics even more carefully in terms of the health problem, one sees that an increasing number of people in Scotland suffered from cirrhosis of the liver between 1950 and 1985.

I realise that we are required to finish the debate shortly and for that reason I find it difficult to deal with all the points that have been raised in the debate. We welcome to the post of shadow Secretary of State for Northern Ireland the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara). He may discover that he will have to play many tunes over the years. He mentioned the Assembly report. In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) the Minister was rather testy and told my hon. Friend that my hon. Friend had not spoken to him or been in touch with him. It is a little like a dialogue with the deaf where one has to watch the other's lips.

The representatives of Northern Ireland were lobbied and then met in the Assembly to draw up a report. It is rather interesting to note that if the Assembly suggested something that was in keeping with the plans of the Government, they accepted it and said, "Well done." If a suggestion did not fit in with their plans they ignored it.

The report by the Assembly was an in-depth one and was produced on 6 March 1985. It recommended that current Sunday opening laws should be retained and rejected the suggestion that Sunday opening should be allowed during the same hours as in England, which was what the Government wanted.

Provision was to be made for objections along the Scottish lines and for objection on the grounds of public nuisance. That was rejected. It is nice for all of us to have certain facilities in society—as long as they are not too near where we live. We are not unduly worried about a nuisance that affects other people—as long as we have a reasonably relaxed and calm time. That was one of the reasons why objection on the grounds of public nuisance was suggested, but it was rejected by the Government. The Assembly Committee recommended the provision of a country-wide referendum or deed poll such as used to happen in Scotland. That, too, was rejected. It recommended that registered clubs should be brought into line with the provisions for Sunday drinking in hotels and restaurants. That was rejected and tinkering with the powers of the police and the registration of clubs was offered instead.

It will be interesting to see how the laws are implemented. I specifically asked about under-age drinking, and I have a specific recommendation to make. We shall never deal with the problem of under-age drinking until we adopt the practice of our American cousins and ask for identification. It is utterly impossible to be clear about under-age drinking unless some means of identification is provided. The offence relates not simply to the sale but to the serving of alcohol, and it is extremely difficult to prove. Furthermore, often it is not simply a question of under-age people going in to wine houses and purchasing alcohol; others purchase it and bring it out to them. Time after time, we have had experience of local police overlooking such offences. I suspect that that happens in the rest of the kingdom, too—partly because of the pressures on the police, who claim that they must devote their attention to much more serious crime. I doubt whether the modernisation of the laws will have any great effect. The Committee also recommended the tightening up of legislation relating to clubs to reduce the inequities between clubs and pubs, and the Government seem to have been rather half-hearted about that.

The hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) said that he had been lobbied by publicans; I suspect that all of us have. All that I can say is that every South Belfast publican who spoke to me said, "We are not asking that our pubs should be open. We are asking that the clubs should be restricted." I find no clear evidence in the new legislation to suggest that that will happen.

I suspect that this order is a foretaste of Home Office thinking, which favours an open season for everybody and no real restrictions. The arguments advanced tonight could equably be advanced for having no licensing laws at all. Therefore, I ask the House to think seriously about joining those of us who will be voting in the Lobby against the order. The order will affect employment, too. It will provide more casual employment but fewer full-time working opportunities and will divide more families on yet another day of the week, which is contrary to the best interests of our nation.

11.8 pm

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): I know that there is very little time left for this debate, and I deeply appreciate the fact that you, Madam Deputy Speaker, should have called me. I intend to restrict my remarks, although I am sorry that I have to do so because very important issues have been raised.

I wish to put it on record that I deeply resent the fact that the Government have introduced this draft order to enable public houses to open on a Sunday. Why has the order been introduced? It does not have the support of the majority of the people in Northern Ireland, and that includes Roman Catholics as well as Protestants, despite what the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) said. Some people have said that the reason for the order is to bring the law into line with that pertaining to the rest of the United Kingdom. It has been said, too, that it is being introduced in the interest of liberty. If we had liberty, the public houses would never close. Is that what hon. Members advocate?

The hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin), said that his son, who serves in the Army in Northern Ireland, is glad that he will be able to go to public houses on a Sunday. Having spoken to the police, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that they have endless trouble when young soldiers from the barracks in my constituency get drunk and engage in assaults, causing tremendous bother for police and local residents. I wish to put that on record in view of what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): That is disgraceful.

Mr. Kilfedder: Yes, it is a disgrace that people in my constituency have to put up with conduct of that kind. The Government should have heeded the decision of the Assembly with regard to the extension of pub hours.

Mr. MacKay: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kilfedder: No, I will not give way.

Despite what the Minister said in introducing the order, it will cause extra trouble for the police, who are already hard pressed. They have difficulties enough, but the order will increase their difficulties. It is not just the difficulties of dealing with intoxicated people. When the public houses disgorge their parties at closing time there is a considerable amount of unruly behaviour which in some cases unfortunately ends in criminal behaviour. Damage is caused to property, the peace of the area is disturbed by drunks, innocent bystanders are insulted with obscenities and so forth, and from time to time there are muggings as well.

My constituents and I have a problem, especially with young people drinking to excess in Bangor and in Holywood. On behalf of those who are already incensed at the behaviour which takes place, I say that there should be no extension of drinking hours on Sundays.

Mr. MacKay rose——

Mr. Kilfedder: I regard the introduction of the order as dictatorial because we are being treated differently from the rest of the United Kingdom. I shall not rehearse what has already been said, but I support the views of the Father of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), and of the two Liberal Members who spoke. The way in which the order has been introduced constitutes discrimination against the people of Northern Ireland. Late as it is, I urge the Government to let the people of Northern Ireland decide. Let them have a referendum. Or are the Government afraid that their proposals will be rejected?

This measure will increase the problems in Northern Ireland. People there resent the fact that the order cannot be amended. We can only vote for or against it, and I certainly intend to vote against it. Debate is limited to one and a half hours. That is no way to treat people in a democracy. I have heard talk about British standards, but that is nothing like the British standards to which I have been accustomed.

Mr. Needham: With the leave of the House, I shall try to deal with all the points raised as quickly as I can in the 12 minutes before the debate closes.

I was distressed to hear some of the comments made by the hon. Member for North Down (Mr. Kilfedder). He called the police in aid of his cause, but I must tell him that we discussed everything in the order very carefully and closely with the police. It was clear that the existing law was neither enforced nor enforceable, so we clearly wished to ascertain the views of the police on the matter. They did not tell us that they had to deal with drunken young soldiers in the hon. Gentleman's constituency as a result of existing licensing laws in Northern Ireland. The hon. Member for North Down should be more careful in his words when he talks about young soldiers who go to Northern Ireland to risk their lives in the defeat of terrorism.

Mr. William Ross: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Needham: No I am afraid that I do not have the time.

The hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) was the first of many hon. Members who questioned the way that this order has come before the House. I appreciate that the hon. Member for Antrim, North was unable to be present at the start of the debate. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), was also absent but I tried to cover that matter then.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said that the Government are prepared to consider changes to legislative procedures and are anxious to consider them in the context of the wider arrangements for the government of Northern Ireland. My right hon. Friend has also said that we are willing to consider changes in arrangements to determine whether it is possible to agree ways to improve the difficulties that we perceive.

When I opened the debate I quoted the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor), who said that if anything showed the case for a devolved Administration in Northern Ireland it was orders as complicated and as difficult as these. I heartily agree with that. I only wish that the hon. Friends of the right hon. Member for Strangford were as clear in their views.

In the Assembly debate in 1985 the hon. Member for Antrim, North said that licensing must be looked at in the context of a pluralistic society. It is a moral issue. The Government and myself do not believe that an issue of this nature is best legislated for by controlling the large number of people who wish to be able to pursue on a Sunday what they consider to be their perfectly reasonable and harmless habit of the six other days. They cannot understand why they should not be allowed to pursue that habit on Sunday. The hon. Member for Antrim, North rightly said that people are able to get a drink in Northern Ireland on a Sunday. The problem is that those people obtain that drink outside the law. The exisiting law is not enforceable.

Too many people obtain drinks in clubs over which we would like to see much tighter control. The order that follows this order goes into great detail about such clubs. I am sure that the hon. Member for Antrim, North will welcome the next order and will recognise that it will go a long way to deal with the problems of the clubs.

Many hon. Members, including the hon. Members for Antrim, North and for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) mentioned the number of outlets for drink. I am sure that hon. Members are aware that when it comes to applying for a new licence for a public house in Northern Ireland an old licence must be delivered. In 1985 the number of public houses in Northern Ireland stood at 1,832 and that is 39 less than the number of public houses in 1978. The number of off-licences has increased from 200 to 250; the number of hotels has gone down from 177 to 165. I hope that the House will be pleased to learn that the number of restaurants has risen by 82 to 208. Registered clubs, with which we are concerned, have risen from 483 to 625.

The views of the people of Northern Ireland have changed since the Blackburn report of 1978. The opinion of the people of Northern Ireland is much more evenly divided, even though there is still a small majority for closing public houses on Sundays. As I said at the outset, I do not believe that, given the present circumstances, the Government can legislate on Sunday opening when any law that they try to introduce is unenforceable. The law has been unforceable because of the problem of the availability of meals.

Mr. Alton: In the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) and elsewhere in the United Kingdom it is possible to exercise a local opt-out. Why cannot that option be made available in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Needham: The hon. Gentleman was not in his place when I dealt at considerable length in my opening remarks with local referendums. We would not be dealing with a simple "Can you?" or "Can't you?". We must deal with existing law, which allows drinking in clubs and in hotels with the availability of a meal. We would be faced with having to use the genius of the entire general council of the TUC to find a question that we could put to the people of Northern Ireland. It is not a simple issue.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) proudly represented to us that he is in a dry area. What happens to all those people in a dry area who wish to have a drink on Sunday? As the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) said, they drive to a wet area and return in the condition to which the hon. Member for Belfast, South referred. The hon. Member for Belfast, South did not deal especially well with the argument of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh that people should be able to walk to their local instead of having to drive elsewhere, which raises the very issue that my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) brought to our attention about drunk driving.

Rev. Martin Smyth: The Minister has said that my argument was not valid. People will continue to travel to the seaside, whether it be Newcastle, Warrenpoint or Portrush. They will travel on a Sunday and return with drink.

Mr. Needham: We are talking about what the majority do on a Sunday when they are deprived of the opportunity of walking to their local. We are not discussing whether they will go to the seaside.

I turn to the deeply held views and the powerful arguments that were expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine). As the Minister with responsibilities for health in Northern Ireland, I am concerned about the health of people in the Province and with ensuring that the proposals in this measure will not make the position worse. My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) produced accurate figures about the Scottish experience, and in Northern Ireland, as in Scotland, there are fewer people drinking than hitherto, and those who drink are drinking less. The problem is that those who are at the margin and are extreme drinkers drink more, and there is a greater incidence of alcohol abuse. It is a problem that lies at the margin, and the incidence of cirrhosis of the liver in Northern Ireland is much lower than in Scotland, and lower than it is in England and Wales. We want to know why that is so.

In Northern Ireland and Scotland, alcohol consumption is concentrated in fewer days. It appears that a greater proportion of Scottish men and Ulster men than men elsewhere in the United Kingdom have at least one heavy drinking day a week, which makes the alcohol abuse problem worse. I acknowledge that there is a problem of alcohol abuse, but I do not see that opening the pubs on Sunday—other experience shows that it will not lead to increased consumption—when taken alongside what we are doing in reducing the hours during which clubs can open and reducing the time that hotels can remain open, will exacerbate the problem. There will not be a nil increase in the number of opening hours, but the increase will be half that suggested by the hon. Member for Antrim, North. I do not believe that that will lead to an increase in consumption and, therefore, an increase in alcohol abuse. We have had no representations from any doctors about this.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Will the Minister give way?

Sir Bernard Braine: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Needham: I give way to my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point.

Sir Bernard Braine: I mentioned earlier a letter that appeared in The Times on 1 July from the chairman of the Magistrates' Association, which read:

"All the evidence in this country and overseas indicates that the degree of harm resulting from inappropriate drinking is directly proportional to the total consumption in terms of absolute alcohol."

If there is an increase in opening hours either in Northern Ireland or England, overheads will increase. As a consequence, sales of alcohol will increase. All the evidence supports my view and not the suppositions that the Minister is making.

Mr. Needham: I understand what my right hon. Friend has said, but none of his points have been made to me by those who are concerned with health in Northern Ireland.

I realise that this matter is of great significance and importance to the people of Northern Ireland, and I realise how strong feelings in the House are, but the Government take the view——

It being half-past Eleven o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted Business).

Resolved,

That the draft Licensing (Northern Ireland) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 2nd July, be approved.

Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland)

11.41 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Richard Needham): I beg to move,

That the draft Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 2nd July, be approved.

This is the second and, I hope, less controversial part of the package of reforms. However, it is equally important and I am glad that this measure had the support of the Assembly when it was debated there.

The order repeals the existing Northern Ireland law contained in the Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Act 1967. It deals with the registration of clubs to permit them to supply alcohol to members. It contains many new provisions to consolidate some of the existing law. Like the previous licensing order, this order has its roots in the recommendations of the Blackburn report for improving the law. The Government have accepted most of those recommendations in this order.

Blackburn identified a phenomenal growth in registered clubs compared with licensed premises in the Province. That growth has continued in recent years, as has the amount of drinking that takes place in clubs. I would like to give some figures. In 1975, there were 370 registered clubs. There are now more than 600. In 1975, they spent over £9 million on purchasing drinks for their members; in 1985, that figure had risen to £34 million.

I can be more specific. I know of one club whose members on the face of things spend about £40 each a week on drinks. That is about five bottles of scotch or 45 pints of Guinness each. Strangely — or perhaps not so strangely — its membership is now down to 66. If someone happens to be the member of a certain old age pensioners social club, his limit is a mere two bottles of scotch or 17 pints of Guinness a week.

However, the more worrying still is the scope for profiteering in some clubs by criminal and paramilitary elements. In some cases this has already happened. We must have adequate measures to combat this grave situation.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The Minister has said that the people were drinking scotch all the time. Why was it not Blackbush?

Mr. Needham: Madam Deputy Speaker, I did not wish to insult the name of Blackbush in the kind of clubs to which I was referring.

There are two main prongs to the Government's strategy for dealing with these problems. The first is to make it harder for clubs to become registered and to keep their registration. There are stricter criteria on which courts can determine whether or not clubs applying for registration are bona fide. District councils will now have a say in registration procedures. In addition, the advantages that registered clubs have over pubs are largely removed by bringing such things as their drinking hours, and the law on the presence of minors and on drunkenness generally, into line with requirements for pubs. Penalties for offences are also greatly increased. The second is to make the affairs of clubs more open to detailed examination, and to limit the uses to which they apply their money. To assist in that, police powers are strengthened, particularly regarding examination of clubs' accounts and records.

Those, in broad terms, are the reasons for the order. Most clubs in Northern Ireland are respectable, well-run organisations. They have nothing to fear, and will, I hope accept the additional controls brought in by the order as necessary for the protection of the community.

Let me now quickly deal with what the order does, concentrating on the main provisions, especially those that are new or depart in some way from the 1967 Act. Part I is introductory; part II deals with the registration of clubs. Article 4 describes the general requirements for registration, and brings in schedule 1, which sets out the provisions which must be included in club rules.

Paragraph (4) provides that the court must take account of any arrangement that restricts the club's freedom to purchase alcohol. It must also have regard to any provision in the club's rules or other arrangement under which it can spend money except for its own benefit or for charitable purposes. Through that provision, and the increased police powers of investigation, the Government aim to prevent any clubs from giving financial support to paramilitaries out of club profits.

Article 6, with schedule 2, deals with the grant of registration of new clubs and the issue of a certificate of registration. Under the 1967 Act, all registration business is administered by magistrates courts. The order introduces a two-tier registration system comparable with the licensing system. The county court will now deal with the initial grant of an application for registration, and the magistrates courts will continue to deal with renewal applications. In future, a club intending to apply for a new registration must give the court notice two years in advance, and must copy the notice to the police and the appropriate district council. That provision should allow the courts to be satisfied whether such clubs can exist without having to rely on income from the supply of drink. Applicants will be required to give more information than at present.

The court will now have no discretion to accept late applications. It must also be satisfied that planning permission to use the premises as a club is in force, and that the club has been conducted in good faith as a club for two years, and not for one year as at present.

A court will be able to turn down an application if the club is used for an unlawful purpose or by persons of bad character, or is conducted so as to cause disturbance, or if any club official is not a fit person to hold office or the club has been convicted of an offence. All these provisions are aimed at stopping the undesirable clubs from being registered.

Article 8 deals with the renewal of registrations, and the renewal procedure is set out in schedule 3. The existing clubs will have to meet just as stringent requirements to have their registration renewed. Again, considerably more information will be required. Article 8 paragraphs (5) and (6) list the various grounds on which the court must or may refuse an application. There is no provision for late renewal. The court must also satisfy itself that the club is conducted in good faith as a club and not mainly for the supply of drink, and the additional information to which I have referred should be strong evidence of whether a club comes into that category.

There are several new grounds on which renewal can be refused. They relate to the conduct of the club, the nature of its clientele, the fitness of a person to hold office in it and whether it has been convicted of an offence under the order.

Part III of the order provides for the hours during which clubs may supply drink. The flexibility given under the 1967 Act goes, and is replaced by the same fixed hours as for other licensed premises. The effect is that all clubs will lose four hours each week in their total permitted hours — half an hour each weekday and an hour on Sunday. Article 25 largely reflects existing law relating to police authorisations extending club hours on special occasions. The limit on 12 on the number of these allowable in a year is increased to 20, but the hours are reduced so that drink cannot be supplied after 1 am, compared with 3 am at present.

Part IV relates to the conduct of registered clubs. Article 28 provides that intoxicating liquor can only be supplied to or obtained or consumed by a member or his guest or an employee of the club. Article 30 is especially important. Some clubs are engaging in what are almost commercial enterprises, such as dinners, dances and discos or other entertainment which members of the public attend. I will not embarrass the clubs by reading out some of the advertisements which they have been putting in the papers. They go far beyond the spirit of the clubs law, and those abuses must be stopped.

Therefore, article 30 prohibits, with certain exceptions, the holding of functions in club premises which are not for the benefit of the club as a whole or controlled or run by it. Functions must relate clearly to the objects of the club and be run exclusively for members and their guests. However, charity functions or private functions for the benefit of members will be permitted. Further, under article 39, it will be an offence to advertise in the media any function to be held on a club's premises.

Articles 32 and 33 contain provisions with respect to young people. At present, no one under 18 can be employed in a club or be admitted to club membership, except in the case of a sporting club. Club rules must also contain a provision that drink must not be supplied to anyone under 18. The original intention was to mirror licensing law by excluding minors from bar areas of clubs, as the Blackburn committee recommended. Sporting clubs and the Sports Council for Northern Ireland told me that this ban would seriously harm the activities of sporting clubs and the involvement of youngsters in sport. The Government have recognised the difficulties which many sporting clubs would face, not least of which would be the major structural alterations needed to many of the premises, were the ban to go ahead. They have decided that young people will be allowed until 7 pm in the drinking area of a sporting club. It does not mean that they can be supplied with drink. Any registered club which supplies drink to someone under 18 or allows him to drink on its premises will be liable to a fine not exceeding £2,000, or to imprisonment. Also, club premises could be disqualified from being used by any registered club for up to five years.

Enforcement of the new law is all-important, and the police must have adequate powers. Therefore, article 37 contains significant changes to police rights of inspection and entry into registered clubs. These provisions demonstrate the Government's determination to strengthen the hand of the police in investigating club accounts. They have been designed in consultation with the police and should help them to investigate a club's affairs and, in particular, to establish where the money goes and whether it is putting it to proper use.

Article 38 strengthens the powers of the court to disqualify club premises when a club has been convicted of an offence under the order. Part V contains miscellaneous provisions. Article 41 deals with the accounts of registered clubs. Clubs will have to keep proper books of accounts and maintain a satisfactory system of control of accounts, cash holdings and receipts and remittances.

The remaining provisions deal with items such as proceedings against clubs, proof of consumption of liquor, appeals, amendments, transitional and savings provisions and repeals.

That concludes my outline of the main provisions of the order. As hon. Members will recognise, this is a substantial tightening of the law, but given the background which I have explained I hope that they will accept that it is a much-needed reform.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): I warmly welcome the provisions of the order, which are long overdue, and I commend my hon. Friend for bringing them forward. But the period of two years before a new club can register seems to be rather restrictive and could jeopardise the club getting off the ground. Will he justify the period of two years?

Mr. Needham: The reason for the two-year period is that the Government wish to ensure that a club which sets up in Northern Ireland does not do so for the main purpose of supplying alcohol, and that the club can exist and thrive without the supply of drink. The Government's opinion is that, if a club can set itself up with a sufficiently large membership and exist for two years without drink, drink will not be the main reason for the club's existence.

As I said earlier, we deal with particular difficulties in the enforcement of club registration law in Northern Ireland and we are determined to crack down and to eliminate the disreputable club. I am reassured by the fact that almost all the letters which we have received from the public at the consultation stage have strongly supported the Government's proposals. I know that some clubs are concerned that the new controls will work unfairly against them, but I am sure that hon. Members will recognise that it is just not possible to have one law for the good and another for the bad. I believe that the new laws are vital and that they will go a long way toward the two main objectives of curbing the growth of drinking clubs and cutting off an important source of paramilitary funds from a minority of clubs.

I remind hon. Members that this order is the other half of our overall package of reform. I hope that the House will accept that, together with the licensing order, it represents a sensible codification of the law which provides a new and improved structure covering both licensing hours and the relationship between licensed clubs and licensed premises. I commend the order to the House.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): On behalf of the Opposition, I welcome the spirit of the order's contents. It is perhaps not as controversial as the licensing order, but in many ways it is much more important. It does much to deal with one of the major scourges of Northern Ireland — the financing of paramilitaries on both sides by illicit drinking, often of stolen liquor. It enables the police to control that drinking and those activities and to prevent those funds from getting into the hands of paramilitaries. Therefore, it is of the utmost importance.

However, some problems arising from the measure must be carefully considered. Many social and sporting clubs depend on profits from the sale of liquor to maintain some of their services to their members. From the way in which the order was presented to the House—perhaps this was done unwittingly by the Under-Secretary of State —one could gain the impression that what in many clubs in the United Kingdom would be regarded as legitimate sources of revenue to facilitate the purposes of, for example, a sporting club might be lost while a club awaited registration.

The powers given to the police in article 37 are very wide, both with and without warrant. Those powers, if used in an oppressive or harassing manner, could be seen to be resting unfairly on particular bodies in the community. Therefore, those powers must be applied with sensitivity and finesse, so that this order is not seen as providing an increased police power to harass people otherwise going about their lawful business. Legitimate and respectable clubs might suddenly become flashpoints if a heavyhanded policeman went in there. Neither the Secretary of State, the Government nor the Opposition would like that to happen. We want the police to have these powers, but we want them to be used sensibly and with great sensitivity.

Equally, that applies to the power which is given to local authority, which is one of the groups to which an application must be made. A local authority may object to the creation of a particular club. One club may be denied permission because there is within the locality another club which belongs to another tradition and group of people. It would be wrong if the location of one club were used to prevent the creation of a second one dealing with other people and traditions. They are some of the problems.

The other problem that worries me arises from the nature of many clubs — the legitimate ones and the respectable ones. They are run by eminently respectable and law-abiding people, but some of the provisions in the order, for proper reason, demand greater knowledge, accountability and observance of the law by ordinary citizens. In some ways, that could weigh heavily upon respectable people who conduct voluntary organisations. The Government could be seen to be over-bureaucratic in the way in which they deal with them.

Again, I trust that, in the operation of the rules, the police will look on such matters with flexibility. We are not seeking to catch the person who perhaps makes an error, does not get his papers in on time or does not always produce his account directly on the dot. The main purpose behind the proposals that we welcome is to catch the evildoer, get rid of the shebeens in east Belfast and in west Belfast, and get rid of the people who supply funds for paramilitaries. That is the main purpose of the order. If we can achieve that and, at the same time, enable ordinary people in Northern Ireland to carry out their business and social activities without fearing the contents of the order, we welcome it.

12 midnight

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): I am sorry that I did not catch the Chair's eye during the previous debate. As the Minister said, many matters in this debate relate to the previouss debate. There is one reason why my colleagues and I must divide the House. Although we accept some of the recommendations, the House must appreciate that we are witnessing a sham. We had a one and a half hour debate, but not one word against the legislation mattered one iota. The Order in Council and the manner in which debates are carried on and legislation is passed will ensure that any hon. Member who opposes Government legislation for Northern Ireland may present a rational argument that the Government may accept as rational. Yet not one comma in the legislation will be changed. It will be passed. The Government will make sure that there are enough hon. Members to pass through the Division Lobby to vote for it. What we witnessed during the previous debate proves that the House does not care what the people of Northern Ireland want or what they have to say.

It is interesting that, in this debate, the Government are quick to quote statistics and tell us about the letters that they have received supporting their attitudes. But they dismiss letters concerning Sunday opening. They are irrelevant — they do not matter — because they are against the Government and their way of thinking in regard to this legislation.

No one can say that drink-related problems in Northern Ireland are a joke. Drunkenness in any part of the kingdom cannot be treated as a joke. Under-age drinking and alcohol-related illnesses cannot be treated as a joke. There are social problems. Many parts of Northern Ireland suffer from poverty. One must accept that the cause of much poverty can be traced to alcohol. Family funds are spent on the consumption of alcohol, and children are left to go without. Such matters should not be treated in a light-hearted manner.

The voting power of the Government is being used in such a way that, whether or not the people of Northern Ireland want this change, it will be made. That is no way, in a democracy, to treat the people of the Province. They are not children. They have minds of their own; and if they want to be different from the rest of the nation in matters such as these, why not permit them that difference?

I shall not detain the House for long, because nothing I say—any more than what my hon. Friends said in the previous debate—will have any effect when we vote on this issue soon, and the Minister, like most hon. Members in the House tonight, hopes that it will take only a few minutes to get yet another piece of legislation concerning Northern Ireland out of the way.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): But the problems will not be out of the way.

Rev. William McCrea: My hon. Friend is right. The problems related to this legislation will not be dismissed as easily as the legislation is being passed. I warn the House that the way in which the people of Northern Ireland are being treated proves that, no matter what an Ulsterman wants, an Englishman thinks he knows better.

The Government seem to have got themselves on the hobby-horse of sabbath-bashing. Having dealt with the Sunday opening of shops, we now have Sunday drinking. Such legislation will not bring prosperity to Northern

[Rev. William McCrea]

Ireland. Peace, reconciliation and stability are, we are told, the Government's aim. What they are doing tonight will help none of those objectives, and let it not be forgotten that many Opposition Members are supporting the Government tonight.

In opposing this order, my hon. Friends and I are registering our abhorrence of the way in which the Government are legislating for the Province. God speed the day when Ulstermen and Ulsterwomen can once again legislate for Northern Ireland and right the great wrong that is being done tonight.

12.9 am

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): By an accident of the business of the House, the previous order took not an hour and a half but two hours and three minutes. But as has happened in the past, all the words that were spoken did not make one jot of difference to the outcome of the vote. I have no doubt that the outcome of the debate on the order that is now before us will be the same.

It was interesting that in the last debate—on the first half of the legislation before the House — something happened that has happened time and time again over the years. The Minister said, in reply to points that were put to him by hon. Members, that he did not have the answers then, but that he would reply when he came to wind up. However, if my memory serves me correctly, he did not answer those points. No doubt he will write in the fulness of time to the hon. Gentlemen in question—in two or three months—giving them the answers to the queries that they made publicly in the House. When the hon. Gentlemen receive their answers, no doubt they will be delighted to receive them. The point that troubles me, as it should trouble all hon. Members, is that that information, which should be available to all hon. Members and the public, will be available only to the hon. Members concerned. It will be entirely up to them whether to publish; whereas all hon. Members who took part in the debate would be interested to hear the Minister's reply. That is a little thing that highlights the shortcomings in the procedure that we are following this evening, and which we have followed now for 15 years too long.

This evening I have listened to the Minister and other hon. Members quoting from the work of the late Northern Ireland Assembly. That Assembly was able to debate these issues, but as it lacked the ability to put its own views on Northern Ireland legislation into action, it was left in a position in which the Government, under the procedures that are being followed this evening, could accept or reject anything that it desired.

The only way in which to overcome the difficulties that I have touched on so briefly this evening is to bring in Bills, to pass them through the House in the proper manner so as to hear what the various factions in the House have to say about them, to put down amendments for all to see and to discuss them, either in Committee of the whole House and or in Standing Committee. In that way, those who sometimes treat what hon. Members from Northern Ireland have to say about the society in which they live —and the legislation that affects it—rather lightly would have a clearer and deeper understanding of the ills that we are trying to cure, the fears that we have, and the cures that we would propose, which I believe would be far wiser than many of those that are so cheerfully passed through the House by hon. Members who are not even here for the debate.

I also noticed that the Minister took umbrage, when winding up the last debate, at what the hon. Member for North Down (Mr. Kilfedder) said about young soldiers. The Minister will know, of course, that North Down is a seaside resort that attracts large numbers of young people, who occasionally become unruly in pubs, or when coming out of them. That would apply whether they were in uniform or out of it, whether they were soldiers or members of other security forces, or whether they were just young fellows out for an evening. However, the Minister did not say who had rendered the legislation that we have just replaced unworkable. Who rendered it unworkable? Who is responsible for the build-up in the drinking clubs of Northern Ireland, to the extent that they have competed on such unfair terms with the traditional pub owners there? Why were we not given the answer to that question? It was because the Government do not want hon. Members to hear the truth, which is that it was the activities of the paramilitaries and the drinking shebeens that are run principally in Belfast and, at various times, throughout other parts of Northern Ireland, which led to the enormous increase in the consumption of alcohol right across the Province and, inevitably, to these changes in the law. If hon. Members on the Minister's own side of the House had had that put clearly before them, as they should have had, they might not have been willing to support him so blithely.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) talked about knocking on the pub door. I live close to a village but I do not go to pubs. However, that is a personal preference. I remember being told when I tasted whiskey for the first time that I would get to like it. I figured that if it was that hard to get to like I would not bother with it, and I am glad that I did not. The hon. Gentleman talked about knocking on the pub door and about the thrill that one got when one was in getting a drink. He said that stolen fruit was sweet.

When Mr. Speaker was being elected for this Parliament the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) drew attention to the danger of making partial biblical quotations. I think that the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh was referring to a section from Proverbs. Perhaps he should look at the end of the passage about forbidden fruit. If he does that, perhaps he will not be so happy with the quotation that he gave. It is a passage that I recall very clearly because I read it many years ago.

I do not have the same objection to the content of this order as I had to the content of the last one. My objection is to the principle of legislating for Northern Ireland in such a way that we cannot have the in-depth, detailed examination that is needed to enable us to give an explanation to other hon. Members about the attitude that we adopt to these matters. If these things were presented as Bills, the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh and I might find a common meeting place occasionally. We might not have found that in the first order but we might have found it in this one.

Rev. William McCrea: Earlier in the debate the Minister said that the previous legislation could not be easily policed. Perhaps the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) would like to hear the Minister tell us how this legislation will be policed. It is also complex legislation.

Mr. Ross: This debate may not run the full one and a half hours and the Minister may have more than the 12 minutes that were allotted to him because of speakers over-running during the debate on the last order. No doubt if he has an hour or so he will be able to give us a detailed explanation about how the legislation will work in practice. Perhaps he will also give way when he makes one of his frequent mistakes. If that happens those few hon. Members who are here will have a clearer understanding of the complexities of the legislation that is before us.

I was speaking about my objection in principle to the whole procedure that is followed in Northern Ireland legislation. The evident annoyance of many hon. Members who support the Government, never mind the hon. Members who support the Opposition, is clear to all who take part in these debates and to those who stand at the Doors of the Lobbies. I hope that as the months and years of this Parliament roll away and as we have several of these orders being debated for an hour and a half at a time, that annoyance will increase until, to adapt another biblical quotation, even the unjust judge will bow to the reasonable request by Northern Ireland Members to produce legislation by Bill so that we can have the detailed scrutiny that all legislation passing through the House deserves.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): When I spoke earlier I was remiss in not extending a welcome to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) in his new post. We look forward to working with him and to his success.

In general, I welcome this legislation, and for one reason in addition to the reasons that I gave before. It ends the unfair competition between clubs and public houses and in addition it allows people to get to grips with the situation in which paramilitary groups are running clubs in the North of Ireland in order to further their own causes. I woonder how many young men — whether nationalist or unionist — would not be in prison, or, indeed, dead, had these places not existed. For that reason alone, this must be a good piece of legislation and in general terms, I support it. I support the provision concerning the bring-a-bottle clubs, which seem to be unique to the North of Ireland; I have never heard of them anywhere else. Those clubs were a nonsense, and I am delighted that the legislation will deal with them. Those who operate such clubs do not have staff to pay and they have no overheads or responsibilities. The arrangements made no sense from any point of view.

There are dangers inherent in the order. Like the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North, I have reservations about the sweeping powers that it gives a constable. Under the order, a constable of 18 years of age can, on his own initiative, demand to see not only the structural plans of a club but its membership list and its books. There is something wrong there. That decision should be made at a more senior level—for example, by a superintendent. It is a serious decision which could have great ramifications in terms of the law and would put a tremendous onus on the club. If that decision has to be taken, it should be taken by a senior police officer so that it has the full weight of his seniority behind it. Then it could not be misinterpreted, as might be the case were the decision made by a young police constable.

I also have reservations about the role of district councils in relation to applications and the registering of clubs. We need some clarification on that. What are the checks and balances? Knowing the prejudices that exist in the North of Ireland, can the House imagine the kind of attitudes that might be displayed by, for example, Craigavon council, which has already cost its ratepayers £500,000 by refusing to act fairly towards St. Peter's club in Lurgan? Twice in the courts the council has been found guilty of that; it is a matter of court record. What checks and balances will protect clubs or personal licensees applying for a licence under the order from being subjected to such prejudice? That requires some explanation, because it is potentially a dangerous state of affairs.

I have reservations about the two-year rule as well. In some circumstances it might well prevent a bona fide club from developing its facilities properly. I am thinking especially of golf clubs and sporting clubs whose overheads on equipment are very high. The two-year rule could create problems for them.

I am puzzled, too, by the distinction between a sporting club and a social club. I simply cannot get to grips with it. Paragraph 22(c) does not make the distinction and the legislation becomes even more ambiguous when it goes on to define the position of young people. The Minister has clarified it to some extent by saying that young people under the age of 18 could be in the drinking section of the club until 8 o'clock. However, if that young person happens to be playing at Muirfield—and many of those playing at Muirfield this week are under the age of 18—does that mean that he cannot go on to the premises to eat once he has finished his round?

That is the kind of situation that could arise. Football matches in summer may not end until 10 pm. Will some members of the team be able to go into the club for a meal afterwards while others may not? As the Minister knows, golf competitions often do not end until 9 pm or 10 pm. Is it suggested that people under the age of 18 should not take part or that if one of them wins a major trophy he cannot go into the club to receive it? That kind of ambiguity requires clarification.

I repeat that I support the order on the grounds that it sets out to create equality between the public house and the club and it gives the Government power to deal with illegal drinking clubs supporting paramilitary groupings, but I have reservations about the way in which it will be operated. Some Members from the North of Ireland may be surprised to know that I agree with them that there should be a system allowing far more scrutiny and a proposal for change. I suggest that one way for them to achieve that would be to involve themselves in the search for legislative devolution—then we could blame nobody here.

12.26 am

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): I should welcome the statement of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) if he would join other Members of the House in wanting legislation to be dealt with in this House in the proper manner, but I have heard no protest whatever from him about it. He raises a whole series of matters that he does not like but then says that he intends to vote for the order. The hon. Gentleman's speech conclusively proves what unionists have been saying for years. To hear the Liberals, who are no longer present, one would think that they first carried the banner to have legislation for Northern Ireland done in a proper way, but how many times have unionist Members stood up and insisted that Northern Ireland should be treated like any other part of the United Kingdom?

As the unionist spokesman, I welcomed the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) to the Opposition Front Bench today. I had to get in before the SDLP, but I am glad that the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh came under conviction outside and returned to apologise. I am glad that we showed him the way, but he well knows——

Mr. Mallon: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Rev. Ian Paisley: There is plenty of time. There will be time in this debate for a great reply from the Minister. He will have time to answer the whole debate without having to do any writing. I shall not talk for too long as I want to give him plenty of time.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh knows that unionists have stood up not only in this Parliament, but in the last Parliament and in those which preceded it, and argued that this is no way to do legislation. The hon. Gentleman has made our case today in saying that the Minister should clarify so many points. But what use are the Minister's clarifications? They do not alter anything.

Mr. Mallon rose——

Rev. Ian Paisley: The hon. Gentleman should possess his soul with patience. He may not know the end of the matter. When he gets his nightcap in a certain place he should go to the Book of Proverbs and begin with chapter 1. He will come to the part about how the stolen fruits are sweet and he will learn about the matter that was in the fertile mind of the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross). I am sure that that will provide the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh with a most edifying thought on which to sleep and I am sure that he will not have nightmares.

Mr. Mallon: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Rev. Ian Paisley: I will give way in a minute or two.

If there was a devolved Government in Northern Ireland and if the majority in that Assembly voted for legislation that the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh did not like he would boycott the Assembly. He would knock at the door of the Government and say, "Please let me in." The hon. Gentleman has advocated the joy of law breaking.

I do not understand how the Minister will police this legislation. He knows perfectly well that he cannot do so. To take the example given by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh, a boy of 18 may win a trophy, but he will not be allowed inside the door of a club for the presentation. Who will police this legislation? It will not be policed. Everybody knows that this legislation is meaningless in its practicable application.

Mr. Mallon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way at last. I took the opportunity — a fairly unique one — of taking part in the deliberations of a Standing Committee that dealt with a Northern Ireland Bill. It was a valuable experience because it gave an insight into the thinking of people within this House.

I believe that there is something hypocritical about people adopting a quasi-integrationist position and demanding such legislative approach while, at the same time, portraying themselves as devolutionists. They cannot have it both ways. In effect, they are putting a foot in both camps. If they made up their minds about whether they were integrationists or devolutionists, this House might more easily come to a decision about how to deal with legislation for Northern Ireland.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The hon. Gentleman——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I would like to hear a little more about the registration of clubs.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The club that the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh would wish to register with is the united Ireland integration club. He does not want the people of the United Kingdom to legislate properly for the whole of the United Kingdom.

At present, there is no devolved government in Northern Ireland. We have the farce of the Intergovernmental Conference, supported by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh. He makes his representations to Dublin Ministers and Dublin Ministers make representations of his views to the Ministers on the Front Bench. That illustrates what the hon. Gentleman thinks about devolution.

We are totally opposed to any form of devolution that is not based on proper, democratic British principles. The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh was elected to the Assembly in Northern Ireland and then took the deliberate step of becoming a senator in the Irish Republic to get himself out of that Assembly. That is what he thought about legislation for Northern Ireland.

I do not wish to run foul of you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I know that you want me to speak to this order. The Minister got away with saying that this order is the second half of the first order and that both halves go together. However, one point has been missed by the House. If we had been given proper legislation, it would have been impossible for the Minister to get this order before the House. With the general election, all that went before it would have fallen and we would be starting again. Ministers love Orders in Council because they can be introduced regardless of general elections. I searched the Order Paper to discover what orders were coming before us, and suddenly the orders that we have discussed this evening seemed to jump from nowhere. It was only a few hours before business questions last Thursday that we were told by the Government Whips, "Perhaps they will be brought before the House next week. That is just a word in your ear."

Perhaps there are good reasons for some "generosity" to be extended to Northern Ireland Members. Perhaps it was generous to alert us in the way that I have described. If that is the Government Whips' generosity, I do not know what their charity would be.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): That is how they treat Conservative Back Benchers.

Rev. Ian Paisley: If that is the way that the hon. Gentleman allows himself to be treated, I am prepared to enter into an intergrationist compact with him to fight such treatment to show that Ulster people will help the English in their battle against the Patronage Secretary, but I do not want to fall out with the right hon. Gentleman.

Many provisions in the measure that is before us are good and I am not condemning it out of hand, but it cannot be policed. I shall be interested to know how the Minister intends to police it and how the police have told him that they can police it. A serious measure is before the House and if it could be implemented it would be helpful, but I do not believe that that is possible. The Minister has told us that he could not provide the necessary policing to keep the pubs closed on Sundays, and it would be far easier to keep the pubs closed than to implement the intricate legislation that is now before us. The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh knows that, and some of his colleagues know it even more that he does.

Many of us are aware of the problems that come from drinking and the Minister must answer our questions fully and take up the issues raised by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh. The Minister congratulated the hon. Gentleman on his previous speech, so let him provide all the clarification that the hon. Gentleman sought. I shall listen with great interest to what the Minister says.

The Minister knows that he cannot do more than provide the dots and the commas. Even if he makes statements tonight, they will be worthless in a court of law, and the Minister knows it. He is smiling because he has all the winners in his hand. He can laugh at us while the order is accepted by the House.

This legislation will not sleep away the problems. It is extremely difficult for the best ordered drinking club or bar to keep persons under 18 years of age outside the doors. Is the management to ask for birth certificates? How is it to be done? The answer is that it is almost an impossibility to keep young persons under 18 from these premises. We in Northern Ireland will reap what the House decides to do during what could be two one-and-a-half-hour debates. We shall reap the broken homes, the broken hearts, the broken families and the broken lives. The problems are already with us, but they will increase as a result of the decisions of the House.

Mr. Needham: As the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) moved down the Bench towards me I wondered, before he resumed his place, how close to me he would finally arrive. I congratulate the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) on some of his remarks this evening and so I congratulate the hon. Member for Antrim, North on some of his. I agreed with some of the things that the hon. Member for Antrim, North said about the previous measure.

The hon. Members for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) and for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) spoke about the two-year difficulty. I have considered the matter long and hard. It will be more difficult for clubs to show that they can survive for two years without the benefits of the profits from drink, but the basis of the legislation is the need to show that a club can exist in good faith for purposes other than the supply of liquor.

It is therefore absolutely right that there should be a gestation period in which clubs can thrive without relying on profits from selling drink to achieve reasonable membership. We make no apology for that. We have taken this course of action because we have problems with clubs and their objectives in Northern Ireland.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh asked about the difference between a social and a sporting club and said that he did not see the distinction laid out clearly in the order. He did not see the distinction laid out because it is not there. A club has to show that it exists in good faith for social, sporting or purposes other than for purely the supply of intoxicating liquor. Social intercourse is such a reason.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North asked about the breadth of police powers and mentioned his concern about the possibility of a heavy-handed constable. I accept the necessity of the police administering the order properly and sensibly. In England and Wales, rights of entry without a warrant to inspect a club which has applied for registration are similar to those in Northern Ireland. The circumstances in which a constable can enter under the powers of a search warrant are also similar except that, in England and Wales, a constable needs a search warrant to obtain evidence that grounds exist for cancellation of a club's registration. In Northern Ireland, a constable would be able to enter club premises without a warrant in those circumstances. In Scotland, I understand that there is no statutory right given to the police to enter and inspect the premises of a club which is applying for registration, although that can happen in practice.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh spoke of the possible age of a constable and his experience. The phrase "a contable" is defined in the Interpretation Act (Northern Ireland) 1954 and means any member of the Royal Ulster Constabulary or reserve constable. A young constable at present has powers to arrest people for far more serious crimes than are likely to arise out of his seeing whether a club is operating illegally. I agree that the order will have to be policed sensibly, and I am sure that the police are aware of that.

The hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea) spoke of the sham way in which the order is proceding through the House. I have already stated the Government's position on that matter. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I take no great pleasure in having to bring forward Orders in Council as a result of the direct rule legislation, which does not allow for proper and full debate of these issues. I would welcome an opportunity to see the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster about that. Since last October, I have asked him to discuss this matter but, for reasons which I fully understand, he has declined my seductive invitation, which does not make amending legislation any easier. The Northern Ireland committee could be set up to discuss these matters, but it has not been operating. All I can say this evening is that I hope that we shall all find the discussions that may be about to take place will prove to be a more satisfactory way of conducting our affairs.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Surely the Minister must admit that it is for this House and the usual channels to take up these points about how we should work for Northern Ireland with the various parties. The Government should be prepared to meet us. We have heard representations from the Liberal party and from the various unionists in this House. Other hon. Members sitting behind the Minister have expressed the same view. Surely the Minister should be interested, not in talks with him, but in talks with the usual channels to find out whether the House wants to proceed in this way.

Mr. Needham: It may well be a matter for the House, and the usual channels will no doubt be fully involved. They always are in such matters. I have replied to several debates on such measures and I concede that there could be better ways to proceed, one of which might be through a devolved Administration in Northern Ireland to tackle these issues, as we said in our manifesto.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) pointed out that in the 12 minutes available to me in the preceding debate I was unable to answer all the points raised and that no doubt in many months time some joyful letters would arrive in the post which would not be publicised throughout the Province. That is not unique to debates of this sort. He will know as well as I do that in many debates reply speeches must be curtailed for one reason or another and that when it is impossible for Ministers to answer all the points involved, letters are sent. This Order in Council is no different in that respect.

The hon. Gentleman asked who made the legislation unworkable. It became unworkable because the Licensing Act (Northern Ireland) 1971 and the previous order were flawed as public opinion altered and the legislation was not in tune with what the public was prepared to accept. The Registration of Clubs Act (Northern Ireland) 1967 did not have the teeth to control the clubs which is why we have this order.

The hon. Members for Antrim, North and for Newry and Armagh asked about the policing of the order. Once again, in the preparation of the order we asked the police for their advice on what they felt they could enforce. We have stiffened the penalties considerably, so that if clubs do not take account of the rules in the order, they will face stiff penalties. To return to the point of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh, if a young man wins a prize after 7 pm and goes into a club, providing he goes into a part of the club which does not have a bar he can be presented with the prize. If he goes into a part which has a bar and is presented with the prize, the club is in breach of the criminal law. I do not share the hon. Gentlemans' view that in those circumstances the police will refuse to act. It is a clear breach of the criminal law and police would have to act. We have no evidence to believe that that would not be the case.

Mr. Mallon: The Minister has quite a number of points to deal with. I am sure that he would not want to overlook the point that I raised in relation to the checks and balances concerning the role of district councils. I would not like to think that he would overlook that.

Mr. Needham: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman. The point about district councils is that they have right to object to the registration of a club as laid down in the order. However, the objection must be placed before the court. It is for the court—and in the initial stage of the registration, for the county court—to decide whether the objections have validity on the grounds laid down in the order. I suggest that it is perfectly fair and right to ask district councils their opinion of what is happening in their localities.

Of course the court will determine and it will clearly have the evidence of the club if the club claims that it is being penalised or objected to by a district council purely on the grounds that it comes from the other tradition. In those circumstances, the court will make the determination and the district council has no power other than to put before the court any objection laid down in the order. However, the court must decide. Indeed, one of the reasons for the introduction of the order is to ensure that the county court will make the initial determination.

I hope that I have been able to allay hon. Members' fears. The district council will rightly be involved. Beyond that, it will be for the court to determine.

Mr. Mallon: Surely one of the specified points is that the district council will have a role to play in deciding whether the person who submits the application is a fit person to hold a licence. It is difficult to see how such an objective decision could be made in a district council where there are so many varied interests and attitudes.

Mr. Needham: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. One of the grounds on which a court can determine not to register or renew a club's registration is that it is being run by unfit people. If a district council or a member of the public—and it was argued in the Blackburn report that members of the public did not simply roll off the street to make such objections—put forward a view that someone was unfit to run a club for some reason, or if that objection was made by a member of the police, it is up to the court to determine the matter. The determination will be made by the court, not by the district council.

I hope at this early hour of the morning that I have answered as many questions as possible without needing to have recourse to letter writing. I want to conclude by stating that I believe that the order—and I was glad that the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster at least appeared to agree with the contents of the order—is sensible. It will deal strongly with the small number of disreputable clubs which must be dealt with. The order this evening signals a very bad day for those clubs. I am sure that the people of Ulster have suffered enough from the paramilitaries of one sort or another and the whole House should welcome and support the order.

Resolved,

That the draft Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 2nd July, be approved.

HOUSE OF COMMONS MEMBERS' FUND

Ordered,

That Sir Geoffrey Finsberg, Sir Peter Hordern, Mr. Geraint Howells, Mr. Alfred Morris, Mr. Gordon Oakes and Sir Gerard Vaughan be appointed Managing Trustees of the House of Commons Members' Fund in pursuance of section 2 of the House of Commons Members' Fund Act 1939.—[Mr. David Hunt.]

PARLIAMENTARY CONTRIBUTORY PENSION FUND

Ordered,

That Sir Geoffrey Finsberg, Mr. Ted Garrett, Sir Peter Hordern, Mr. Geraint Howells, Mr. Alfred Morris, Mr. Gordon Oakes, Sir John Stradling Thomas and Sir Gerard Vaughan be appointed Managing Trustees of the Parliamentary Contributory Pension Fund in pursuance of section 1 of the Parliamentary and Other Pensions Act 1987. —[Mr. David Hunt.]

Urban Renewal (Birmingham)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Durant.]

1.4 am

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): This Adjournment debate is about the lack of urban renewal in three small parts of the Handsworth ward in my constituency. I congratulate the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) on her appointment as Minister. I think that this is her third Adjournment debate in a few short days.

I shall deal first with the easy point—the London housing action area based on part of Aston lane. The area consists of 246 dwellings for which a scheme of enveloping is proposed in respect of only 163 dwellings. The tenure mix, about which the Minister will be interested; is owner-occupation, 52 per cent.; private landlords, 21 per cent.; local authority, 19·4 per cent.; and the housing association, 6·6 per cent.

The London housing action area is one of seven schemes currently submitted by Birmingham city council to the regional office of the Department of the Environment. The Minister will know by now, I think—if she does not, she will soon—that, under the terms of enveloping circular 26/84, the Department of the Environment is given 30 working days to approve such schemes. In reality, only schemes that will be approved are submitted. By yesterday, a decision on the London housing action area was outstanding by 77 working days, having been submitted as far back as 16 March. It was planned that work on that small area would go out to tender on 1 July. I understand that it has now been put off until about October. Notwithstanding the great concern caused to my constituents living in the area, such a delay means that contracts cannot start on time, forcing Birmingham city council to underspend on its housing investment programme, thus creating further cash flow problems. Of course, at the end of the year, the council gets the blame for the delay and the underspend. That is grossly unfair.

As the scheme is an agreed scheme—if it is not, I hope that the Minister says so—my constituents in Aston lane and Railway, London and North roads want to know why there has been a delay in the regional office of the Department of the Environment in deciding whether the enveloping scheme should go ahead. They want to know what is holding up the London housing action area work. So far as they know, there is no technical problem. They are unhappy, annoyed and unsure because of the rumours that are associated with a delay of this kind.

That is the easy point. Unlike the London housing action area, Charles and Turville—both named, as they normally are, after a local road—are proposed housing action areas. They are larger than the London one, the Charles area consisting of 447 dwellings and the Turville area of about 250. They happen to adjoin and together there are about 700 dwellings.

At present, those proposed housing action areas are an island of unhappiness for my constituents in respect of their housing. It is an island of unhappiness in the Handsworth ward in Birmingham. My constituents feel left behind, as they see the effects of all the urban renewal in nearby roads. I shall name just two. People see work done on the other side of Putney road and on the other end of Westminster road. But, by and large, their homes are falling apart. They point out at public meetings that most people who are well housed tend to complain about the renewal parts of their area, such as about getting the grass verges cut, the trees planted and the dog mess cleaned up, but the people of Charles and Turville are mainly concerned about the roofs on their homes. They are concerned about the struggle for the work that is needed to keep the very fabric of their homes in good order—enveloping. At recent meetings, I promised them that, if I was successful in the ballot, I would raise the matter in the House of Commons.

The two housing action areas, as I hope the Minister has discovered, are special cases. I do not say that they are ordinary areas like London. Indeed, they have been treated as special cases by Birmingham city council's urban renewal team—a team of first-rate people that has led the way in urban renewal in this country. Many cities in this country have followed the experiments that have begun in Birmingham. The two areas are special cases basically because of the variation in dwelling size and the special mix of tenures. Indeed, those two reasons have caused 700 dwellings to be left behind for so long in the urban renewal programme. If it were easy to deal with long rows of terraced houses, virtually all the same size, they would have been done a long time ago, as indeed nearby roads have been done. Because of the tenure mix and the size of the dwellings, they have been left and chopped off the end of the programme year after year.

A detailed survey is required before an enveloping scheme can take place. One has been completed for Charles but not for Turville. The Charles area survey was completed in July 1986. The problem relates partly to the tenure mix. In Charles, the tenure mix is: owner-occupation 57 per cent.; private landlords 9·6 per cent.; local authority 4·3 per cent.; and housing associations 38·9 per cent. We are talking about 447 dwellings. Only 27 per cent. are classed as satisfactory. It will not be easy to conduct an enveloping scheme because of the size of the dwellings and their tenure. However, it is the considered professional judgment of the Birmingham housing urban renewal team, which invented enveloping, that enveloping provides the best option. The problem is that the Minister does not like the plan and the reginal office will not approve it. Like all good things that were invented in Birmingham, enveloping has been ruined by Whitehall. It could not resist writing a circular about enveloping. The minute the circular was written, the concept of enveloping was killed stone dead. The same thing happened with half-and-half shared housing ownership.

In the heads of households count in the Charles area, 45 per cent. are unemployed, and 45 per cent. are on supplementary benefit. The majority—68 per cent.—are euphemistically classed as ethnic minorities. Old-age pensioners comprise 18 per cent. of the count.

The neglect that has been caused in the small area of Handsworth by delaying the decision—which amounts to a flat refusal by the Minister—is causing the area to deteriorate fast. The city council housing department cannot now let its own dwellings in the area without great difficulty. Basically, only homeless families will accept dwellings in the area. For one of the major housing associations in the area, the average tenancy turnover is three months. Many large houses in the area are being converted into flats by housing associations. That got so bad that the city council has put a block on that type of policy. There is now some reconversion to family housing.

There are advantages and disadvantages in such a policy. On the one hand, the housing association brings about renewal and more homes are created — housing associations get the same subsidy for a flat as they do for a house. On the other hand, flats definitely mean a more transient population and can dislodge community spirit. That is not a criticism of housing associations. Indeed, the financial structure is such that that is bound to happen in an area in which there are many large houses and where there is a shortage of local authority capital funds. Because local authorities lack funds, the housing associations move in at their request, and larger houses are ripe for such development. The tragic result is that public investment by housing associations in their refurbishment programmes is wasted if other properties in an area — mainly the owner-occupied sector—are not to be dealt with.

I invite the Minister during the summer recess to visit St. Peter's road, Rodhut road, Crompton road and Churchill road, where she will see almost derelict homes alongside homes that have been refurbished following flat conversion programmes. She will see pepper-potting at its worst. It is crazy and it does not make any economic sense.

For some reason, the regional office of the Department of the Environment disagrees that enveloping is the required option for the area. On the evidence of my experience in the city of Birmingham, I back the view of the professional Birmingham urban renewal staff against the regional office, which seems to be running rather a vendetta against the city of Birmingham.

I corresponded briefly on this issue just prior to the election with the former Minister for Housing. The new Minister will have seen his letter to me of 14 May in which he pointed to the difficulty of too many housing association dwellings. He also said, unfairly in my view, that the blame lay partly with Birmingham city council because it had not sent any housing action area declaration documents to the Department. Of course it had not. As I said about the London situation, the only documents and applications sent in were those for which approval had been organised in negotiations with city council officials and regional civil servants. The system will not work in any other way.

If a housing action area made a submission and it was rejected, it would require to be redefined geographically, and that would put the programme back at least a couple of years. How could a little pocket of 700 dwellings — two housing action areas, an island, as it were, in the middle of Handsworth — be redefined geographically when all the areas around it had been dealt with by way of enveloping schemes? There would be no practical way of redefining it, so that is not an option for the regional office or the city council.

The detailed study of Charles was completed a year ago. My constituents in the Charles and Turville proposed housing action areas have suffered considerably because the area of Handsworth in which they live — the vast majority of them live there from choice; they like living in the inner city, where there is a vibrancy of life that is missing from the outer suburbs — is mixed by size of dwellings and ownership. It is the very tenure mix that Ministers, and I as Labour party spokesman on this subject for some years, have sought to promote. Yet that mix is being held against the sort of enveloping scheme that has been proposed.

Ministers, not Birmingham, wrote the enveloping circular. Department of the Environment officials do not make themselves available at public meetings, both before and after proposals are submitted for urban renewal. That sort of consultation is left to the city council's urban renewal teams. Those teams also take the blame, and in this situation it is unfair that they should bear that blame. That is why I decided to raise this matter on the Adjournment. I want to stop the buck-passing.

I appreciate that a difficulty exists and I do not deny that there is a special case. Certainly we do not want to create another special case, since there is only this island of two small proposed action areas in this part of Handsworth, although others may exist in other parts of Birmingham. I am speaking tonight only for my constituents. Others can speak for the rest of the city, though I appreciate that the Minister must take a more strategic view of the position.

My constituents have every right to feel frustrated, annoyed and angry. They are not receiving full information about who is making the decisions and the basis on which those decisions are made. One of those decisions represents the rejection of the proposed action areas, with Birmingham not yet having been able to submit the relevant documents. If they were submitted, it is known that they would be rejected. For that reason I hope the Minister will answer the questions I have asked tonight.

1.20 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Marion Roe): I thank the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) for his kind remarks on my appointment. I am grateful to him for this early opportunity to speak on a subject that I know is dear to his heart and one that is right at the top of the Government's agenda—housing in the inner cities.

The hon. Gentleman has rightly drawn the attention of the House to the housing conditions in the Charles, Turville and London areas in the north of Birmingham, and to the strong wishes of the residents in those areas that those conditions should be improved. I shall deal later with these specific areas and explain how improvements to the housing stock may be achieved. I think, however, that that needs to be viewed in the context of the many housing and inner-area initiatives which have been instigated or supported by this Government since 1979. Many of them have benefited inner-city authorities, and Birmingham is no exception.

The hon. Member has, for example, mentioned enveloping and has rightly pointed out the many benefits of that technique. For those hon. Members who may not be completely familiar with the term, enveloping is a technique pioneered in Birmingham that secures the wholesale improvement of the external fabric and frontages of private housing that is old and has fallen into disrepair. Work is carried out by the council, with the consent of the owners and at no cost to them. It involves the replacement or repair or roofs, chinmeys, guttering, windows and doors; and work to external walls and curtilages. Whole terraces or blocks of houses are dealt with at a time. Indeed, during the course of the work, the whole street takes on a quite extraordinary appearance —the houses are shrouded in scaffolding, to emerge a few weeks later in something like pristine condition.

The point that I would make about enveloping is that, whilst Birmingham undoubtedly pioneered the technique, the Government have consistently provided the council with backing and financial resources. In the early days when enveloping was in the experimental stage, Government funding was provided under the urban programme through the Birmingham inner-city partnership. In 1982, when the scheme had been evaluated and had been found to have proved itself, we acted to incorporate enveloping as an important component of mainstream policy for the improvement of private sector housing. As a result, housing authorities throughout the country that wish to adopt enveloping as a means of securing the improvement of private sector stock in housing action areas may do so, and may apply to the Department for Exchequer subsidy to cover 75 per cent. of eligible costs. One hundred and thirteen such schemes have now been approved, 38 of them in Birmingham.

More substantial in cash terms has been the urban programme itself. Birmingham has benefited to the tune of approximately £160 million under the programme since 1979. Handsworth has been a priority from the start and has received urban programme funding in the order of nearly £30 million. Apart from enveloping, Birmingham urban programme has supported many innovative and exciting housing projects and many of these have been directed towards privately owned housing in the inner areas. Recently, for example, the Department has approved a pilot project of security works to houses in the Westminster road area, some of which are in the proposed Turville housing action area; and the Broughton road local labour project in Handsworth has involved the collaboration of Government Departments with the city council and Tarmac in an extraordinary housing improvement scheme designed to provide training and employment, and housing for inner-city residents. The scheme, which involves enveloping and other internal and external improvements, will provide about 100 units of accommodation, and will create 40 local jobs and 24 additional places for local trainees. The overall cost of the scheme is approximately £1·6 million, of which the DOE will fund about £1 million covering house refurbishment costs.

Mr. Rooker: I should make it absolutely clear that Broughton road is not in Handsworth ward and is not in the Perry Barr constituency. It would be quite irrelevant for me to go back to people in Charles and Turville and tell them to look at what is happening in Broughton road in the Ladywood constituency.

Mrs. Roe: I shall come to the points raised by the hon. Gentleman. I said that I would come to them, but it is fair to put into context the Birmingham scene as a whole.

However, there is more to helping inner-city residents with repair and improvement than total resources allocated to housing. In November the Government announced that they would meet half the costs of a new £6 million scheme to help poorer home owners identify and secure repairs and improvements. Fifty new agency service schemes are to be established in partnership with Neighbourhood Revitalisation Services and Care and Repair Ltd. I expect a number of these to be in the inner cities, but this is not an initiative exclusive to them. They will provide a total service, if one is needed, including advice on what work needs to be done, what builder to use, how to finance the work and how to ensure that it is done properly. We believe that this important initiative will not only help to target better the standard local authority grants towards those who need them most, but will also succeed in attracting other sources of finance. We shall be monitoring the initiative closely to assess its success in meeting these objectives.

I shall now return to the particular points raised by the hon. Gentleman in relation to the proposed Charles and Turville housing action areas and the London housing action area in north Birmingham. I will deal with London first. Birmingham declared this a housing action area on 17 November with a view to improving the area through a variety of means in a concerted plan of action over five years. This would include enveloping, internal and environmental improvements, traffic management and clearance of substantial numbers of unfit houses. Although the area contains a high proportion of local authority and housing association dwellings—about 26 per cent. — we decided in the circumstances that the housing action area should be allowed to stand. Birmingham was notified of this and, on 16 March, the council submitted an enveloping scheme for 120 dwellings at a total cost of £906,780, or £7,557 per dwelling. We had been awaiting from Birmingham clarification of the cost of works to the curtilages to some of the houses. That information has just been received, and we shall so be in a position to issue a decision very soon.

Enveloping schemes are only considered within the 30 working days set down in the enveloping circular and when they meet all the criteria. The majority of Birmingham's proposals and the schemes currently with the Department are outside the criteria on a number of counts, and it is considered that in its enveloping applications Birmingham has not fully justified these schemes being approved at the level of subsidy applied for.

The position with Charles and Turville is slightly different in the sense that the city council has not yet declared the areas as housing action areas. Last year Birmingham informally approached the Department with a view to declaring both areas housing action areas in order to carry out enveloping. It was felt that this approach was not really appropriate and that Birmingham should consider an alternative strategy to secure the improvement of these areas. Housing action areas are intended to deal with the improvement of private sector housing and both Charles and Turville contain a high proportion of local authority and housing association property for which there are other more appropriate sources of funding such as, for example, housing association grants. In addition, the dispersed nature of the private sector properties would probably have led to ineffective enveloping proposals. Accordingly, the Department wrote to the city council suggesting that it should rethink its strategy for these areas. We have seen no further proposals from Birmingham to date, but the Department is willing to discuss a range of options with the city council if it so wishes. They might include, for example, the declaration of smaller areas as housing action areas or general improvement areas, individual improvement grants, limited block repair schemes, and the selective employment of agency services to encourage effective take-up of grant or loan facilities. I must emphasise, however, that the decision whether or not to declare a housing action area, and over what area, is for the city council to take. The Secretary of State does, of course, have the last word on declarations, even if he chooses to exercise his right to intervene very occasionally.

Mr. Rooker rose——

Mrs. Roe: I shall be happy to follow up further points in a letter, but I want to conclude my remarks and answer the questions that the hon. Gentleman has asked.

I do not underestimate the difficulties that the council faces or the size of the problems to be tackled. It is worth remembering, however, that enveloping represents a substantial public investment in private housing. Birmingham's schemes approved so far have cost over £50 million at an average cost per dwelling of over £8,000. By any acount that is a substantial commitment of public subsidy to the individual owners. That is why each scheme needs careful scrutiny. The House would not wish it to be otherwise. Schemes must be cost effective and represent good value for money. I make no apology, therefore, for this level of scrutiny, or the care with which we examine the council's future proposals. Although the residents of Charles, Turville and London have made plain their desire to have their houses and areas improved — and I understand and respect those wishes—as taxpayers, like all of us, they would I am sure be equally concerned that the Government should spend public money wisely and carefully.

Earlier, I mentioned some examples of the work that is being undertaken by the Government to improve housing in the inner areas of Birmingham and elsewhere. As to the future, we intend to strengthen local authorities' ability to direct resources at the areas of worst housing need. The Government's Green Paper on home improvement, published in May 1985, proposed that a single form of statutory designated area should replace the present housing action areas and general improvement areas. We intend to legislate, as part of the general reform of the improvement grant system, to give more freedom to local authorities to designate renewal areas. Both renovation and redevelopment will feature, depending upon a full appraisal of the different options available.

We also intend to tackle some of the shortcomings of enveloping. At present, this is carried out in housing action areas only under environmental works powers. We shall build upon the lessons learnt over the past years in using these powers, and introduce new powers of group repair which will enable local authorities everywhere to carry out the renovation of blocks of poor quality housing. Provided that schemes meet certain basic criteria as to stock condition and tenure, authorities will be free to exercise such powers without requiring the specific approval of the Secretary of State. This will greatly strengthen Birmingham's and other local authorities' ability to tackle serious disrepair in the private sector in co-operation with owners, occupiers and financial institutions.

In order to make progress, I suggest that the hon. Gentleman should encourage Birmingham city council to submit to the Department of the Environment regional office fresh proposals on the Charles and Turville areas as soon as possible so that they can be scrutinised without delay.

Mr. Rooker: Is there a minimum size of housing action area? I have seen a housing action area in the north which consisted of only about 15 houses in a terrace. Would that kind of thing be acceptable?

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Water Authorities (Privatisation)

1. Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the European Commission in respect of privatisation of the English and Welsh water authorities.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Colin Moynihan): My Department has had discussions and has corresponded with the Commission at different times about water privatisation.

Mr. Caborn: I thank the Minister for that non-reply. Will the Department take notice of counsel's opinion sought by the Commission at the back end of last year on the last privatisation proposal, when great concern was shown about the competent authority that was to be in control? From that, it was clearly shown that the privatisation proposals could well put at risk people in the United Kingdom. It would be very ironic if we were brought before the European Court of Justice — as possibly we might — on this question as well as about our beaches and polluted rivers.

Mr. Moynihan: The new proposals for the National Rivers Authority mean that the NRA will be the competent authority for various EEC directives. That means that the new body will remain a public body. I hope that there will be no further problems such as those experienced last year.

Mr. Key: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his appearance at the Dispatch Box. I remind him that in March 1986 the Department produced a paper on water and sewerage law. Do the Government intend to introduce water abstraction licensing before, during or after privatisation? I should be most grateful if my hon. Friend will let the House know the answer to that at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Moynihan: I think that I shall be able to help my hon. Friend tomorrow. I regret that I am unable to pre-empt the publication of the document, which we hope will be tomorrow. That point will be fully assessed in that document. There will then be time during the summer for full representations to be made and for consultations to take place.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Has the Minister investigated the possibility of legal proceedings being instituted against the privatised water authorities if they fail to comply with EEC directive 76/160 on those beaches which have been designated as such? Is it true that water authorities are already being taken to the European Court of Justice for failing to comply with that directive?

Mr. Moynihan: Discussions sponsored by the Commission produced recommendations for improvements in bathing waters. We have responded to that bathing water directive, and currently some £70 million is being spent each year by the water authorities on improvement programmes.

Mr. Boyes: Does the Minister recall that I wrote on 22 December last year to the then Minister, the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten), about a difference of opinion between Commissioner Stanley Clinton Davis and the Minister about competent authorities? Why have I not had a reply to that letter despite six months of repeated requests and written questions, especially when the Government have spent more than £1·5 million on advisers about water privatisation? Taking that waste of public money into consideration, is it not an outrage that the Minister cannot write a letter back to me?

Mr. Moynihan: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Government were unable to reply to his letter while they were considering their position. Now that we have the NRA as the competent authority, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that he will be receiving a reply first thing tomorrow morning.

Rating Reform

2. Mr. Doran asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the details of the implementation of the proposed community charge in England and Wales.

5. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the details of the proposed community charge.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): Considerable thought has been given to the operation and implementation of the community charge. Following the consultative paper, detailed proposals were placed in the Library on 15 December 1986.

Mr. Doran: The Government recognised during the passage of the Abolition of Domestic Rates etc. (Scotland) Bill that the phasing in of the charge would lead to considerably increased costs. Now that the Minister has announced that he intends to phase in the charge in England, will he advise us what extra assistance he proposes to give to the English and Welsh local authorities?

Mr. Ridley: No decision has been taken on transitional arrangements in England. The position is as stated in the Green Paper. When the Government have come to a conclusion about the details of the transitional arrangements, a statement will be made.

Mr. Latham: As there is no easy or universally popular way of raising billions of pounds for local services, does my right hon. Friend accept that we must at last implement our election promise, grasp the nettle of rates reform and get on with it straight away?

Mr. Ridley: Yes, Sir. I can assure my hon. Friend that a Bill will be brought before the House. If the House would like to sit through August and September, we could probably deal with it then. It might be kinder to bring the Bill back before the House when it returns after the summer recess.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Did not the Cabinet Committee, under the Prime Minister, decide yesterday to change the Government's policy and to phase in the implementation of the poll tax? Is that not a change to the original idea as it was to apply in Scotland, England and Wales? Does it not show that the Government themselves are as divided as their Back Benchers and that it would be better to make a U-turn now and give up the idea of a poll tax?

Mr. Ridley: I admit that I have an advantage over the hon. Gentleman, in that I was at yesterday's meeting and he was not. His problem is not to be solved by reading press reports of the meeting. I advise the hon. Gentleman to read the reports in The Times and The Daily Telegraph, which he will find are mutually contradictory. Perhaps the best approach is to wait until the Government make an announcement. I repeat that the Government's proposals for England and Wales were set out in the Green Paper that was published about 18 months ago. When the Government have completed their consideration of the detail of the transitional arrangements on the basis of the Green Paper, we shall tell the world.

Mr. Charles Morrison: Now that my right hon. Friend and the Government appear to have decided that the impact of the poll tax will be so serious that its introduction has to be phased, will he give further consideration to the possibility of including within his proposals that account be taken of the ability to pay?

Mr. Ridley: I beg my hon. Friend to await details. The details for Scotland, where there will be a safety net, are well known. We have not yet come to a final decision on the arrangements for England and Wales. They might be different, because arrangements and problems in the three countries are different. I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that we will take account of ability to pay by the system of rebates and the uprating of benefits, with a taper, between 100 and 20 per cent. for those who will be required to pay who are on low incomes.

Mr. Blunkett: Will the Secretary of State say which of the two press reports to which he has referred is correct? Did either of them take into account Cabinet discussion on the amount of money that will have to be found to administer the rating system and the poll tax at the same time, and whether local government will be remunerated in a way that will take account of the chaos that will ensue, especially in the implementation and administration of housing benefits?

Mr. Ridley: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman can hold me responsible for confirming or denying reports in newspapers. I merely point to the contradictory nature of various reports that I saw. I repeat to him that when the Government have come to a conclusion about the transitional arrangements they will make clear what those arrangements are. The point that the hon. Gentleman raised about the cost of administration will arise at that time, not now.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: When my right hon. Friend considers the details of his proposals, will he also consider the effects on home owners of paying rates based on the capital value of their homes, as proposed by Labour Members during the general election, and how much more that proposal, if implemented, would cost people?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. A movement to capital values would be extremely damaging for those who are now paying far more than their fair share of the bills for local government. However, he was slightly wrong in one respect. The Labour party fought the district elections on 7 May on a movement to capital values and briefed its candidates that that was party policy, but when we came to the general election, Labour Members changed their minds. The Leader of the Opposition changed the plans on about Wobbly Thursday, when he was obviously the one who was wobbling most.

Dr. Cunningham: Does the right hon. Gentleman recall saying that he wanted to introduce the poll tax in one go? Are not the implications of phasing that, for several years, poll tax and rates will be levied on every household simultaneously, and that each household will thus receive several bills each year? Is it not also the case that the right hon. Gentleman is now proposing a different system for Scotland from that proposed for England and Wales? How can he shrug off the impact of all this bureaucracy on the 7·1 million families receiving housing benefit, and the millions of others receiving other benefits related to housing costs? Finally, how can the Government describe their proposals as simpler, more efficient, fairer and easier to understand than the rates? Is not what the right hon. Gentleman is proposing an absolute bureacratic nightmare?

Mr. Ridley: It is my pleasant duty to congratulate the hon. Gentleman on retaining his seat on the Front Bench, and on dealing with his subject. My team on the Government Front Bench are more than usually delighted that we have him there, because he always asks too many questions, and they are usually pretty silly ones—as on this occasion.

I have never, to my knowledge, said that the community charge will be introduced in one go. Arrangements for local authority financial support in Scotland, Wales and England are very different. I understand that the percentage paid from the Exchequer in England is 46·4, in Scotland 55·5——

Mr. Dewar: It is 56·1 per cent.

Mr. Ridley: I take the hon. Gentleman's correction. It has gone up. It is going up all the time.

In Wales, the figure is over 60 per cent. That shows how different the arrangements are. There is nothing wrong with that. My hon. Friends can demonstrate the way in which their constituents have accepted and understood the community charge by the votes that they received at the last election. Those people are very much more able to understand it than is the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), which is why we again welcome him back to his position.

Development Corporations

3. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the proportion of the employees of contractors working for each of the London Docklands and Merseyside Development Corporations that live (a) in the development corporation area, (b) in one of the boroughs that partly fall within the development corporation area and (c) in the local travel-to-work area.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. David Trippier): The information is not held in the form requested. However 85 per cent. of the Merseyside Development Corporation's contracts were let to local firms in 1986-87. I think it reasonable to assume that these local firms employ mainly local people.

Mr. Alton: Notwithstanding the unsatisfactory nature of that reply, does the Minister accept that the positive proposals that have been made by his right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster should not have been thwarted by his Department, that guidelines should be developed to ensure that local labour is used for inner-city regeneration plans, otherwise not only will local democracy be bypassed but local needs and the local communities will be bypassed? Just as the initiatives of his right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) failed after the riots in 1982, does the Minister not accept that his proposals may seem largely irrelevant and will end up as window dressing?

Mr. Trippier: It is not a question of my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster being thwarted by any individual or Government Department. It is simply that the European Community directives make it clear that to ensure equal conditions of competition for public works it is not permitted to introduce contractual processes that promote the employment prospects of the residents of inner cities.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that the London Docklands Development Corporation has been a major success story in revitalising that part of London? Will he remind the House of the number of jobs and homes that have been created there since the LDDC was formed?

Mr. Trippier: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The LDDC has been a huge success, though much of its work still remains to be done. It will become even more successful. As for employment prospects, to date 10,000 jobs have been created.

Mr. Heffer: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the Government are prepared to put EEC directives in front of the interests of the people of the inner city of Liverpool and of those who live in other inner-city areas? If the Government are really serious about dealing with the inner cities, they must be concerned about creating employment for the people who live in them, including areas such as Liverpool 8, Liverpool 6 and Liverpool 5, where large numbers of young people who require work are out of work. If the Government are serious about it, why do they not say to the EEC, as the Prime Minister has said to it on other occasions, that our interests are more important than those of the EEC?

Mr. Trippier: There is a dichotomy in the hon. Gentleman's proposal and the stance adopted by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) in his substantive supplementary question to No. 1 on the Order Paper. We cannot have it both ways. Both the Department of the Environment and other Government Departments are anxious to encourage the use of local labour, but the hon. Gentleman is aware, more than most, of the difficulties that can be experienced through lack of skill shortages in the construction industry. The hon. Gentleman is an expert in that area. It is as clear to me as it will be to him that it might be extremely difficult to provide the necessary skills within a certain area to match the vacancies to which he refers. That problem can be resolved only through the Manpower Services Commission and the Construction Industry Training Board. Through those two bodies, we are taking steps to put that right.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is a sad reflection on modern local government that part of the reason for the success of the London docklands scheme was that it was able to bypass local government?

Mr. Trippier: That is undoubtedly true. If we were to examine carefully what would have happened if the LDDC had not been created for London docklands, we should find that the significant success that was referred to in earlier questions could not have been achieved.

Mr. Fraser: Despite more than £150 million of public money having been spent on London docklands, unemployment there has risen, no ordinary local person is able to afford to buy a house there, no homes are available to rent and the homeless on the edge of docklands are being evicted by the Liberal council in Tower Hamlets. It is no good the Minister blaming Brussels for his failure. The fault lies with the Government, who have confused development opportunities for land with development opportunities for people. It is about time that they had an inner-city development strategy that helped people, not property developers.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman knows well that there is an affordable homes policy within the London docklands area which I should have thought he would pursue. I should love to hear him say to the people who are living in those affordable homes what he has just said to us, because I think that his comment was an insult to them. It must also be made clear that the urban development corporation created those affordable homes and that 45 per cent. of all occupiers of new homes on LDDC sites come from the areas to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Low-cost Rented Housing

4. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he proposes to take to increase the availability of specifically low-cost rented housing, public and private.

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Mr. William Waldegrave): We are aiming to increase the overall supply of rented housing, some of which will be available to those on lower incomes. In addition, we are giving local authorities new powers to grant-aid private rented housing and enabling housing associations to combine public and private finance.

Mr. Hunter: Will my hon. Friend comment on the proposition that in many parts of the country there is a dire social need for more low-cost rented housing and that although the Government's initiative on reactivating the private sector is welcome, unless there is an appreciable Treasury input low-cost rented housing will not become available?

Mr. Waldegrave: One of the most hopeful developments is the application of private money to meet the needs of housing associations. However, I remind my hon. Friend that the other side of supply is getting the houses built. If we oppose the building of all housing in high pressure areas, we may be in some difficulty.

Mr. Rees: Will the Minister talk to his right hon. and learned Friend who is responsible for the inner cities and who, to his credit, visited the centre of Leeds and south Leeds last week? If he does, he will find that the Leeds, South council has done an excellent job over the years. However, the particular problem that we face, and about which I should like to get something done, is that we have had to knock down some flats that were built only 20 years ago. We shall also have to knock down some duo slab and other housing—[Interruption.]——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rees: If I had wanted to make a political point I should have said that they were built under Conservative control. It is no good telling us about increasing the amount of low-cost housing, because we need to replace the housing that has been knocked down. Will the Minister do something to help us to do that?

Mr. Waldegrave: Several interesting schemes are coming forward in Leeds at the moment, for example, the Hillcrest scheme. The council is willing to consider bringing in private sector money and is talking to housing associations and so forth. Such schemes are interesting and we shall do our best to carry them forward.

Mr. Heddle: I applaud the manifesto commitment to encourage responsible private sector capital to build new houses for rent, but does my hon. Friend not agree that hundreds of thousands of houses that are in the ownership and management of local authorities are empty at the moment and that they should be brought into beneficial use forthwith?

Mr. Waldegrave: I agree strongly with my hon. Friend. Indeed, that sentiment has been expressed many times by Ministers speaking at the Dispatch Box. I am sure my hon. Friend will agree that it is, and must be, part of that purpose to bring back into use large numbers of empty houses in the private sector. That is the purpose of our proposals for freeing the rented sector.

Mr. Rooker: I should like to agree with the first part of the Minister's first answer, in that the housing that needs to be built for low rent in high-pressure areas must be supported by hon. Members from all parties, which has not been the case in the past.

I should also like to point out to the Minister that we are not really talking about low-cost housing, which results in the exact examples that were given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees). By definition, low rent housing implies a subsidy. How much subsidy will be available to provide well-built housing that will last, at rents that people can afford?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman is right to make the distinction between cost and price. Some of the cheaply built houses of the past—built under both Labour and Conservative Administrations—have been a catastrophic part of our inheritance. I think the hon. Gentleman will agree that it would be a major achievement if we could apply some of the large resources that are available in the City to housing associations for building low-cost housing. I believe that we are not far apart on the importance of that.

Mr. Hill: I agree with my hon. Friend completely about the housing programme, but is he aware that it means much more money will have to be poured into the Housing Corporation, which will assist the housing associations to take over this sector? Will not my hon. Friend eventually have to face the fact that a complete review of the Rent Acts, stretching back to the 1950s, is about due?

Mr. Waldegrave: On the second point, we shall introduce radical proposals on new lets to try to bring back into use existing private housing stock which is empty, and to get new-build private housing for rent. On the first point, my hon. Friend is pessimistic. If we can reorganise the way in which finance for the Housing Corporation is categorised in the national accounts, we will not necessarily have to add to public expenditure, provided that there is real private sector participation.

Lead Plumbing

6. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environmnt if he will estimate the number of homes in England and Wales with lead plumbing, and the percentage of the total this represents.

Mr. Moynihan: About 9 million properties in England are believed to have lead pipes, and that is about 50 per cent. of the total housing stock. For the figures for Wales, I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) on 1 July by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Lloyd: Does the Minister understand that, even on his figures, in excess of 10 million people are receiving doses of lead seven times as high as the maximum permitted standard under EC regulations? When my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) raised this important issue and said that lead was unsafe at every level and was a threat to both mental and physical health, the Minister accused my hon. Friend of scaremongering. Is the Minister going to tell me that I am scaremongering, or will he say instead that the Government at last recognise the real need to fund an adequate replacement programme which will see an end to lead piping throughout England and Wales?

Mr. Moynihan: I do believe that the hon. Gentleman is scaremongering. The Government commitment is that any area where the lead concentrations exceed 100 microgrammes per litre must be tackled. For that reason, one of the most substantial programmes to reduce those lead levels is in action, with a target date of December 1989 for the completion of the main programme of remedial action at the top of the priority list.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the Minister aware that my African grey parrot almost died recently from lead poisoning due to the ingestion of lead from the water supply in Newham? Will he tell the House what this programme will comprise? In view of the dangers to people's health from the ingestion of lead through the water supply system, will he make sufficient funds available to the water authorities, particularly to the Thames water authority and the London borough of Newham, so that all lead piping can be stripped from homes that at present get their water through such pipes?

Mr. Moynihan: The hon. Gentleman will know that there are two ways to tackle the problem. First, his parrot will be delighted to know that the water undertakers are at present embarked on a pH adjustment of the water in his area and are dosing it with orthophosphate. Secondly, it is the hon. Gentleman's responsibility to handle the problem of lead pipes in his home. He will undoubtedly be pleased to hear that 25,000 grants have been given under the Housing Acts to assist people to tackle that problem in their properties.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: Is my hon. Friend aware that many of my constituents live in properties with lead pipes, as I do? I welcome his intention to have a programme to deal with this. Will he accept a serious point, which is that the greatest danger is when the water has been in the pipes overnight? Does he agree that it is important to let a lot of water run off first thing in the morning before using water?

Mr. Moynihan: I think that public education programmes of that sort would be extremely useful for my hon. Friend's constituents.

Sporting Events (Drugs)

7. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what resources are to be made available to ensure that adequate drug testing is available at British-hosted sports events.

Mr. Moynihan: The Sports Council, which is responsible for funding the drug-testing regime, has allocated £350,000 in the 1987-88 budget for its doping control programme. In addition, the Sports Council for Northern Ireland has allocated £6,000, the Scottish Sports Council £18,000 and the Sports Council for Wales £39,000.

Mr. Wardell: As sport is seen as an important way of counteracting the use of drugs in our society, and as commercial sponsorship does not seem to be attracted to the funding of this activity, is the Minister absolutely satisfied that sufficient resources are now available for the programme?

Mr. Moynihan: The hon. Gentleman will know that this is a matter of great concern to the Government. That is why, only last week, a two-month review was set up, with Mr. Sebastian Coe assisting. One of the most important matters that will be examined in the review will, of course, be the resources required to implement effective drug control testing throughout the country and throughout sporting activities.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Will my hon. Friend comment on the position of the medical profession in relation to drugs in sport and tell us how he thinks athletes should react to advice from doctors?

Mr. Moynihan: Every governing body should have an appropriate code of conduct and a full set of guidelines and procedures on the drugs which enhance performance in its sport. The medical profession must be fully involved in drawing that up and, indeed, be responsible for the implementation of the policy among competitors.

Mr. Denis Howell: May I welcome the Minister to his new responsibilities and wish him well on behalf of British sport? As the Sports Council has held a two-year inquiry into these matters, and as the Minister has just told the House that that body is to spend £350,000 on drug investigation, why has he found it necessary to announce a new initiative involving himself and Mr. Coe? Does he intend to supplant or to augment the work of the Sports Council, and what will be the relationship between Sir Arthur Gold's Sports Council Committee and his initiative?

Mr. Moynihan: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his initial comments. The work of the inquiry is to augment the outstanding work undertaken by Sir Arthur Gold and the drug abuse advisory group. However, some important matters that needed to be examined lie outside the remit of the Sports Council — for example, trafficking in anabolic steroids.

Rating Reform

8. Mr. Ingram asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the cost of collection of the proposed poll tax compared with the present cost of collecting rates.

15. Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his estimates of the percentage cost of collecting a poll tax.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Michael Howard): Our preliminary estimate is that the cost per person liable of collecting the community charge may be broadly similar to the cost per person liable of collecting domestic rates.

Mr. Ingram: I understood that the Minister had said that it would cost twice as much to collect the community charge as it does to collect rates under the present system, so I am rather surprised at his answer. However, the Minister is the one who is really responsible for his Department and he therefore gave the right answer to the press — even the Labour press — on this occasion. What proportion of the cost of raising the community charge will be attributable to those who are not on the register through evasion or because the register has been incompletely or incorrectly compiled?

Mr. Howard: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's mystification is that almost twice as many people will pay the community charge as now pay domestic rates. I cannot apportion the cost as the hon. Gentleman suggests, because at the moment we have only very preliminary estimates available.

Mr. Redmond: Does the Minister agree that it is silly to talk about the two systems running side by side, given that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has estimated that the community charge will cost twice as much to administer? What would be percentage increase in costs if the two systems were to be run side by side?

Mr. Howard: That, too, is a question that cannot possibly be answered at this stage. As my right hon. Friend has said, no final decision has yet been made on that.

Mr. Raison: Does my hon. and learned Friend accept that it would be perfectly possible for the Government to go ahead with their proposals regarding a unified business rate and rate support grant, while at the same time looking for an alternative way of raising the balance of local government spending that is more equitable and more cost-effective than the present proposals?

Mr. Howard: No such alternative has yet been advanced.

Mr. Squire: Has my hon. and learned Friend yet had the opportunity to discuss with local councils the Government estimates for collection costs? If so, what was their response?

Mr. Howard: We are engaged in a series of consultations with local councils about the details of enforcing and administering the community charge. Those consultations will continue.

Mr. Cyril Smith: Would it not be cheaper to collect the tax if it was collected from fewer people? Has the Minister seen The Daily Telegraph of today, which says that it will cost the Church of England £4 million if the tax is imposed upon vicarages, and so on? Does the Minister agree that if the Government were to waive the charges on those religious establishments and did not tax prayer and care it would mean that the tax would be cheaper to collect?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman leaves aside the fact that one of the principal objectives of the community charge is to restore accountability to local government. The more people who pay the community charge, the more accountable local government will be. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not suggesting that we should, above all, go for the cheapest system. If that is the case, I look forward to the hon. Gentleman advancing the charms of the window tax.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that whatever the charge and whatever the implications, one of the principal advantages of the community charge over any other form of local taxation, bearing in mind the cost of the community charge, is that in future more people will pay? Consequently, more people will be interested in what happens in local government, and consequently more people will eventually vote, and that must be good for democracy.

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. What we are doing is to restore the link between those who use local services, those who pay for local services and those who vote for those who provide local services. That link has been sadly and deeply eroded by what has happened in local government in the past few years.

Mr. Home Robertson: As the Government have acknowledged that they failed to register on the electoral roll 5 per cent. of the people who should be eligible to vote, would the Minister care to speculate on how much it would cost to compile a full register for poll tax purposes? Indeed, is there any prospect of compiling such a register?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman leaves out of account the fact that the two registers will be compiled on a different basis, having different objectives in view. Therefore, any comparison of the kind that the hon. Gentleman seeks to make is totally misconceived.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Does my hon. and learned Friend not agree that a cheap system, if it is unfair, is an unacceptable system, and that the prime consideration must be fairness and accountability?

Mr. Howard: My hon. Fried is absolutely right. It is those two objectives that the community charge will indeed provide.

Dr. Cunningham: What has changed since the Minister of State's predecessor, the right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson), who is now on the Back Benches, told the House that the Government estimated that it would cost at least twice as much to collect the community charge as to collect rates? What has changed since then?

Mr. Howard: As I made clear earlier, nothing has changed. The fact that twice as many people will pay the community charge as presently pay domestic rates means that the cost per person liable is roughly the same under each system.

Mr. Cormack: Can my hon. and learned Friend tell us how many local authorities have expressed support for the proposed changes?

Mr. Howard: I do not think that I am in a position to —[Interruption.]—tell my hon. Friend either how many local authorities support the proposal or how many local authorities oppose it. [Interruption.]

An Hon. Member: Name one.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Howard: The fact of the matter is that the purpose of this reform is to benefit the people whom local authorities serve. It is their interests that we shall be serving by putting these proposals on the statute book.

9. Dr. Moonie asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the enforcement of individual liability for payment of the community charge.

Mr. Howard: The enforcement procedures for the community charge were described in some detail in the document on the operation of the charge, which was placed in the Library on 15 December 1986. Since then further consideration has been given to enforcement procedures, both within Government and in consultation with local authority offices and representatives of the local authority associations.

Dr. Moonie: Can the Minister guarantee that the head of the household will not be liable for the registration of other individuals therein?

Mr. Howard: The head of the household will be liable severally and jointly for his spouse or the person with whom he lives, but not for his adult children.

Mr. McLoughlin: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that what has changed since his previous incumbent was in office is that there has been a general election, which the Conservatives fought on changing the rating system, and that we received an overwhelming mandate to change the present ridiculous rating system? Will he assure us that that will be done regardless of the Opposition?

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is correct. The present system is deeply unpopular, deeply unfair and deeply unacceptable. It must be rare for a proposal for reform to have been explained in such detail to the electorate as the proposal that we shall put the before the House within the next few months.

Mr. Allan Roberts: If the head of the household is not responsible for including on the poll form the people in the house other than the spouse, will more than one form be delivered to each household in case the householder fills it in and does not include everybody else? If the spouse leaves because of a marital dispute and is not there when the form is filled in, but later returns, as sometimes happens, even in Bootle, how long will the head of household have to put the matter right before he is prosecuted?

Mr. Howard: So far as the form is concerned and I may have misunderstood the supplementary question that was asked earlier—the duty will be to enter the names of all adults who are resident in the house. When it comes to liability for payment, the head of the household will not be liable for the payment of the community charge by adult children in the house.

Dr. Hampson: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that on the Government's own exemplifications of the community charge there will be deep concern in many northern inner-city areas with high-spending Labour councils over the proposed level of community charge that people will face? Will it not be the case that there will be less attempt at avoidance if the size of the tax is reduced? Therefore, will he reconsider the proposal of Sir Keith Joseph to have a 75 per cent. direct education grant, as that is primarily a national and not a local service?

Mr. Howard: No. I do not think that that would really deal with the problem, which my hon. Friend has rightly identified, posed by high-spending local councils in the north. That problem can be dealt with by voting those councils out of office. The community charge, by restoring accountability to local government, will encourage that process.

Mr. Rooker: Will the Minister explain how the enforcement will work on heads of households in some of our inner cities where the head of the household, because of his religion and cultural upbringing, would not under any circumstances seek a place in a local authority old persons' home for his parents or grandparents but would have them, as his extended family, living with him? How will members of the Asian community, who are saving taxpayers' money, be treated in those circumstances?

Mr. Howard: The position is quite clear. The charge should be paid by as many adults as possible. Exemptions should be limited, and those in the position to which the hon. Gentleman referred will be liable to the charge in the same way as every other adult.

Local Government Finance

10. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will issue advice to local authorities who entered into deferred purchase agreements with merchant banks to delay prescribed expenditure before 22 July 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Advice to local authorities on scoring prescribed expenditure under deferred purchase deals entered into before 23 July 1986 was given in my Department's Circular 5/87.

Mr. Hayes: I thank my hon. Friend for his depressing reply. It shows that Hard-Left Harlow council is yet-again surpassing itself in fleecing ratepayers. Not only is its grant-related expenditure 162 per cent. above the norm, but it is spending above the norm. It is the highest rating district [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Ask a question, please.

Mr. Hayes: I put it to my hon. Friend

Mr. Speaker: Order. Please do not do that. Ask a question.

Mr. Hayes: The question that I put to my hon. Friend is that, now that the council is embarking on an illegal and shady deal with foreign banks [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is an abuse.

Mr. Hayes: It was a question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chope: In answering my hon. Friend's question, there is good news for him in the answer that I gave to the substantive question. Harlow's £50 million deferred purchase deal is caught by the Local Government Act 1987, I think rather to the surprise of that council.

Mr. Skinner: Why do the Government have two sets of standards for different institutions that engage in rescheduling debts? For instance, why should local authorities—mainly Labour authorities be hammered into the ground by the Government for entering into arrangements to provide services, while the four top merchant banks have recently been engaged with the Inland Revenue, with the connivance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to offset debt payments of, in the case of Midland bank, about £1 billion? It means that, at the end of the day, the taxpayer will have to find £875 million to bail out Lloyds, Midland, National Westminster, and Barclays banks. Why do the Government have double standards?

Mr. Chope: The hon. Gentleman's question would probably be much better directed to the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), who told the House on the Third Reading of the Local Government Bill that clause 1, the deferred purchase measure, should be on the statute book. The official policy of the Labour party then was in favour of outlawing deferred purchase.

Inner Cities (Investment)

11. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what legislation he proposes to direct investment into the inner cities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I have no plans for legislation to direct investment into inner cities. The creation of urban development corporations, together with urban development grant, urban regeneration grant, derelict land grant, and other grant systems provide effective incentives.

Mr. Adley: I welcome my hon. Friend's measures as far as they go. Does he agree that there is an alignment of ambition and policy simultaneously to generate further private sector investment in inner cities and detract from the attraction of putting private sector investment in areas of over-development, such as in my constituency? Will he have discussions with his colleagues in the Treasury to see whether national taxation policies can be amended to generate further incentives to developers to go into inner cities, and, at the same time, to discourage them from investing in areas of over-development?

Mr. Trippier: The point that my hon. Friend made in the earlier part of his question is fact and not hypothesis. The tax measure that he proposes would be considered by my colleagues in the Treasury. It is important to stress that we share the same objectives—to increase the leverage of public to private sector investment in the inner cities. We start from a very strong position at the moment, because for every pound of taxpayers' money that is invested in the inner cities through our programmes we are attracting four times that figure from the private sector. We must do all that we can to improve that ratio.

Mr. O'Brien: In view of the Minister's reply to the question, will he reconsider the distribution of urban aid to the smaller towns in west Yorkshire, where there is no urban provision whatsoever but where there is a need to arrest the dereliction that is occurring in those small urban areas? Will the Minister review his programme with a view to considering the smaller towns in west Yorkshire?

Mr. Trippier: I am always anxious to review the 57 programme authorities that we have currently identified as being of the highest possible priority. In deciding what areas should be assisted we must look at a synthetic index, which would cover not only such matters as levels of unemployment, dereliction, over-dependence on traditional industries and so on, but many other matters. If the hon. Gentleman wants me to look at a proposal or visit his area, I shall be delighted to respond positively if I can.

Sir George Young: Does my hon. Friend agree that investment in the inner cities would be greatly assisted if high-spending local authorities were rate-capped? Will he confirm that a statement will be made next week on the subject, and is he aware of the mounting anticipation in the London borough of Ealing that it will be included?

Mr. Trippier: I understand that we hope to make such an announcement.

Consett (Development Corporation)

12. Ms. Armstrong asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to set up an urban development corporation for Consett; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have no such plans.

Ms. Armstrong: I am sure that the Secretary of State will be aware of the progress that has been made in towns such as Consett due to the dedicated commitment of local authorities to do what they can by working with private industry to rebuild opportunities. The right hon. Gentleman is undermining the local authorities and excluding towns such as Consett from any additional aid. The opportunity for such towns to overcome the appalling social consequences of the large-scale unemployment that has been brought about by the Government's industrial policy is limited. What will he do for such towns that will not come within his inner city policy?

Mr. Ridley: When I visited Derwentside last Friday I was told by business men that the hon. Lady's constituency was extremely grateful for the £10 million that has been spent by the Government on derelict land grant and the £12·5 million worth of factory building by the English Industrial Estates Corporation. As a result, although 3,500 jobs were unfortunately lost when the steelworks closed, 3,300 of those jobs have been replaced since 1980. That is a fantastic performance and it is time that the hon. Lady stopped trying to talk the north down and proclaimed the achievements of the Government.

Water Authorities (Privatisation)

13. Mr. Martlew asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the chairmen of the English water authorities to discuss water privatisation.

Mr. Ridley: On 25 June this year.

Mr. Martlew: Will the Secretary of State accept that his proposals to create a National Rivers Authority, and his arguments so to do, have been completely destroyed by the statement of the chairman of the Thames water authority and the independent report of the economics department of Leicester university? Therefore, will he abandon these ridiculous proposals which are based only on greed and dogma and scrap this privatisation?

Mr. Ridley: No, Sir. The meeting that I had with the water authorities chairmen, to which I referred, was described as friendly and useful. We have now entered into discussions to get the detail right. I believe that all the interests that are concerned with water will welcome the setting up of a National Rivers Authority. If one chairman is out-voted by the other nine, I think that we have endorsement from the water industry that we are on the right lines and that we are finding the right solution.

Mr. Colvin: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is growing concern about the pollution of our rivers by fish farmers, for whom generous grants may soon be available from the EEC? Before proceeding with the privatisation of the water authorities, will he bear in mind that something ought to be done to regulate fish farming?

Mr. Ridley: It would be a responsibility of the new National Rivers Authority to ensure that the rivers were free from pollution, from whatever source. I have not heard of proposals for regulating fish farmers. We should concentrate on measures to ensure that pollution does not enter our rivers and keep regulation to the minimum.

London (Housing)

14. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he proposes to take to relieve homelessness, long housing waiting lists and disrepair in London.

Mr. Waldegrave: The measures that we set out in our manifesto will help London's housing by reviving the independent rented sector, involving a wider variety of landlords in the provision of housing for rent, and concentrating resources where they are most needed.

Mr. Cohen: The Minister's gabbled reply will be deeply disappointing to the many thousands of Londoners living in inadequate accommodation. When will the Government take effective steps to tackle the rising homelessness in the capital? It is rising by about 20 per cent. per annum. When will the Government curtail the degrading bed and breakfast system and provide a chance for those people on growing waiting lists who are desperate for a flat? When will the Government provide money to help improve the estates that are being run down? Are not the Government's housing policies the problem in London, not the solution?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman prepared his speech before he listened to my answer. If he reads my answer, which he may not have been able to hear, he will find that there are practical proposals in the pipeline.

Military Exercises (Radioactive Contamination)

3.31 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about armed forces exercises involving radioactive contamination.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Roger Freeman): The Ministry of Defence takes a responsible attitude towards all aspects of safety, including nuclear safety. The safety and health of the public and Ministry of Defence employees is of paramount concern.

The risks of a nuclear accident are extremely remote. In the 30 years during which nuclear weapons have been deployed in this country, we have never had an accident resulting in the release of radioactive material. Nonetheless, we take the prudent precaution of maintaining a highly effective organisation, known as the Nuclear Accident Response Organisation. We maintain detailed contingency plans against any nuclear emergency; and we undertake a series of exercises to ensure that our response forces are trained for the tasks they would have to carry out.

To be effective, training of the military and civilian staff involved has to be as realistic as possible. On occasion, therefore, but only when there is a clear and compelling training advantage to be gained, we do use live contaminant of very low levels of radioactivity.

Such activities take place only on Ministry of Defence property; are subject to stringent safety requirements; and present no hazard to the response forces involved or to the general public. Furthermore, the material's short half-life means that any residual contamination has decayed to negligible levels within three months.

The precautions regarding the health and safety of the personnel involved are equally stringent. Access to the contaminated area is strictly controlled. Individuals are required to wear protective clothing and are rigorously checked when leaving and entering the area. If there is the slightest indication of contamination, full decontamination procedures are undertaken.

In summary, although we believe the probability of an accident involving the release of radioactivity to the environment is extremely remote, it is clearly prudent that we should maintain an organisation to respond to such an emergency, and that the personnel involved should be properly trained. Where there is a clear training advantage, we do use very low-level radioactive material, but only under stringent safety procedures.

Mr. Wallace: I thank the Minister for his answer. I am sure that many people will accept that, as long as we have nuclear weapons, it is important that there are contingency arrangements in the event of an accident. Nevertheless, I am sure that the press reports this morning must have given rise to widespread fear and concern regarding what would appear to be the somewhat casual attitude that has been adopted in the past.

Will the Minister give some assurances with regard to the sites that have been used, particularly the one referred to in Staffordshire? Although the releases have been on Ministry of Defence land, the Minister, as well as everyone else, knows that radioactivity cannot readily be contained and does not necessarily recognise the boundaries of Ministry of Defence land. What further monitoring has taken place in that area and the surrounding areas?

With regard to the personnel who were involved not only in that incident but who, it would appear, have repeatedly had to go into a hangar at RAF St. Athan, over a number of years, what degree of radioactivity have they been exposed to? It would appear that the medical checks on them have been cursory. What continuing checks are being done? With regard to the future, can the Minister give us an assurance that, as has been said by one of his —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. [Interruption.] I do not need any help.

Mr. Wallace: Will the Minister give us an assurance that in future the type of casual approach that has been —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is quite unseemly for senior Members below the Gangway on both sides to shout at each other.

Mr. Wallace: Can the Minister give us an assurance that the casual approach reported this morning to both areas and personnel will not continue?

Mr. Freeman: I entirely reject the suggestion that the Ministry of Defence has taken a casual attitude. The hon. Gentleman has the matter out of context. The damaging effect of the ingestion of radioactive material by the Service men or civilians involved who were not wearing protective clothing would be broadly equivalent to smoking one cigarette.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): Is my hon. Friend aware that responsible Members—I suspect in all parts of the House—welcome what he has had to say? It is appropriate that there should be training of this type and that there should be true professionalism in our armed forces to enable them to deal with any contingency in the event of the most improbable or unlikely accident that could just happen. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the Minister answers, may I say to hon. Members below the Gangway that if they have any disagreements they should take them outside?

Sir Antony Buck: I say again that what my hon. Friend has said will be welcomed by all responsible Members. The Minister's answer shows that we are maintaining our forces in a state of true professionalism in all types of military activity so that they can be an effective shield that will prevent the holocaust against which they are training from ever happening.

Mr. Freeman: I entirely agree with my hon. and learned Friend. The general public would expect the Ministry of Defence to organise training exercises such as this involving the use of very low-level radioactive material.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Will the Minister agree that there should be a full debate before the summer recess on this very worrying situation? Will he tell us whether there have been any recent nuclear waste issues in a defence context? Can he tell the House whether this is part of NATO exercises and whether any of the Warsaw pact countries are involved in similar exercises?

Mr. Freeman: Many of the issues raised by the hon. Gentleman, including the matter of a debate and what the Warsaw pact forces do or do not do, are not matters for me. These are not NATO exercises or part of NATO training. They are routine but relatively infrequent exercises involving uniformed and civilian staffs of the MOD and the response organisations in the civilian community. They are doing a necessary job in preparing for the unlikely event of a nuclear accident.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Will my hon. Friend accept that we in the constituency of Stafford welcome his statement? We are glad to hear that, irrespective of where this incident may have occurred, rigorous controls are exercised over the way in which these matters arise. Does he also accept that serious concerns which arise are noted by people in my constituency but that they do not arise in this case?

Mr. Freeman: I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that his constituents and the constituents of every hon. Member can sleep safely in their beds. There is no harmful effect from the use on exercises of this low-level radioactive material either to uniformed or civilian staff on MOD property or to his constituents.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): As usual, the Minister has given us the bland and complacent answers that we have come to expect from Ministry of Defence spokesmen. Can he answer the following questions? When such exercises take place, which authorities are informed, at what stage and at what level are they kept in touch? What radioactive materials are used in such exercises and at what rate does their radioactivity decrease? What happens to the contaminated land after the exercises have taken place, and at what stage are the public allowed access to that land? What procedures do the Government have for monitoring the long-term health of the personnel involved? Is it not the case that——

Hon. Members: Reading.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Briefly, please.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is it not the case that British emergency services are not permitted access to United States nuclear weapon storage silos? Is not—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is not a new Member. She should not be reading questions, and she should be brief.

Mrs. Clwyd: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would be much quicker if the barracking from the Conservative Benches were less. Is not the appalling——

Hon. Members: Reading.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Please do not read notes.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is not the appalling implication that United States troops can prevent our emergency services from becoming involved in the event of a nuclear accident of this kind?

Mr. Freeman: There were many separate questions there. If the hon. Lady would care to table them all, I will answer them. I shall answer briefly two of the key questions. We are entirely satisfied with the liaison and co-operation between the British armed forces and the United States armed forces in dealing with a nuclear emergency or nuclear accident in the United Kingdom. The hon. Lady asked about our procedure for informing local authorities. We are satisfied with the liaison we have with local authorities and the emergency services in dealing with such incidents.

Sir Raymond Gower (Vale of Glamorgan): In so far as there has been a change in the medical safeguards for personnel, can my hon. Friend give an assurance that this constitutes an improvement on the medical arrangements of some years ago? Can he also assure us that there is no danger to people living in the environment of an airport such as St. Athan in my constituency?

Mr. Freeman: As I have already said, I can assure my hon. Friend that there will be no danger to his constituents living close to any military establishment where these exercises may or may not take place. As regards medical procedures, we have adopted the same procedures, which are very thorough. They are governed by regulations laid down both by the Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Defence. I can assure my hon. Friend that our Service men and civilians are properly looked after.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): Would the Minister show the same concern for civilian populations, particularly that in South Down which has for the past three years suffered from radioactive discharges into the sea from Sellafield, an establishment for which the Minister has part responsibility, and from Drigg radioactive material site nearby, which is causing daily pollution?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is wide of the private notice question.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Does my hon. Friend agree that, while the Warsaw pact countries continue to build up nuclear, chemical and biological warfare potential, inevitably if British troops are to be properly protected, it will be necessary for them from time to time to carry out responsible training in these weapons? Can my hon. Friend assure the Opposition that British forces are more responsible in the way in which they carry out this training than the Opposition would seem to give them credit for?

Mr. Freeman: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. Yes, the general public and the House woud expect our armed forces to carry out the necessary training to deal with the unlikely and remote prospect of a nuclear accident.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): Will the Minister accept that many members of the public are deeply concerned about the public health implications of these reports? Will he address himself to three brief questions? First

Hon. Members: One.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has a constituency interest in this matter, but he should be brief.

Mr. Fisher: One. Staffordshire county council says that at no point was it informed by the Minister's Department about these tests. Secondly, will the Minister confirm that these tests have taken place only in Staffordshire, or are they taking place in other locations? Thirdly, what is the situation as regards raising livestock on this land? We have seen from the Chernobyl disaster that the trace elements of radioactivity in meat are serious and long-lasting.

Mr. Freeman: As far as Staffordshire county council is concerned, all those that needed to be informed about the exercise were informed, and all those that entered the area of low-level radioactivity wore protective clothing. As regards where such exercises are taking place, I cannot help the hon. Gentleman, for reasons that he well knows. Not only this Government but all previous Governments have not commented on the location of exercises of this nature. Finally, as regards grazing livestock, I have already said that the maximum damage to his health that might occur to an individual who was accidentally exposed without protective clothes to the radioactivity levels involved in this exercise, and who ingested such levels, is broadly equivalent to smoking one cigarette.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): May I ask my hon. Friend one question? In the past, many hon. Members have directed only one question to Ministers and that allows many more hon. Members to speak. Does my hon. Friend realise that the vast majority of people in the country would think it quite wrong if the Ministry of Defence did not take these steps to ensure the proper protection of the forces and the public?

Mr. Freeman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. That is precisely the point.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Can the Minister confirm that none of this information would have been disclosed in the House of Commons without the report in The Independent? Secondly, can he give me a guarantee that all radioactive dust in Staffordshire has been cleared up and that there is absolutely no danger to the people involved? Thirdly, does he recall that the same assurances on safety that he has just given to the House were given to the atomic test veterans in the Pacific tests about total safety, yet they were damaged by those tests? As the Ministry of Defence has evaded the payment of compensation in that case, what rights will people have to compensation if they are damaged by contamination now?

Mr. Freeman: I reject entirely the suggestion that I am trying to evade answering hon. Members' questions. I have been as frank as necessary as required by the House.

With regard to the specific questions raised by the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), I can state that the material used is of very low-level radioactivity. It is a liquid that is sprayed on the ground surrounding the simulated accident involving perhaps an aircraft or vehicle. It is promptly cleared up after the exercise is over. It has a half-life such that after three or four months no trace of radioactivity is left. The exercises were safe when they were carried out and the area is certainly safe after three months.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): Will my hon. Friend sympathetically consider that he could probably allay public concern entirely if he could give definite comparisons of the low level of the radioactivity that has been caused? For example, can he say that the level in the training tests is far less than the level from a television set or from double glazing or far less than the natural radioactive level in the environment? If he could give such comparisons, I am sure that he would allay all fears on both sides of the House.

Mr. Freeman: I thank my hon. Friend. That is a very helpful suggestion. If he can take the trouble to table a question, I will answer it promptly.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): If the Minister is so confident, could we have the chemical formula of the live contaminant to which he referred?

Mr. Freeman: If the hon. Gentleman would care to table a question, I will see whether I can answer it.

Mr. Dalyell rose—

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Is my hon. Friend aware that the people of Staffordshire showed on 11 June which party they wanted to have in charge of the defence of this country? However, as there are certain legitimate concerns, will he write a detailed letter to all the Staffordshire Members precisely explaining the position?

Mr. Freeman: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall call two more hon. Members from each side of the House. Then we must move on, as this is an extension of Question Time.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): The Minister has given us two clear statements today — that the exercises took place on MOD land and that the contaminant had a half-life approaching three to four months. The Minister will already know that there are vast tracts of MOD land in this country on which people can walk and where animals can graze. Will he undertake to place in the Library details of the specific locations where this type of exercise has taken place? Further to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), will the Minister specify the type of contaminant element and the level of radiation that it was emitting at the time of the exercise? If he were to place details in the Library, I am sure that that would go some way to enable independent experts to allay the fears of the community, if the Minister is right.

Mr. Freeman: First, may I correct the hon. Gentleman? I did not say that the half-life was three to four months. I said that the half-life of the radioactive material was such that after three to four months there was no trace of radioactivity to be found. The hon. Gentleman asked where these exercises take place. I am not able to answer that question in the light of the wise convention followed by this Government and previous Governments. I do not carry the relevant chemical formula in my head, but I have given the hon. Gentleman an undertaking that I shall respond to that question.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Is my hon. Friend aware that my constituents in Staffordshire will welcome the reassurance that he has been able to give and the fact that Her Majesty's Government are undertaking these exercises and that the country will be better for them? The suggestion appeared in a national newspaper this morning that the material used to contaminate was spread over a half-mile radius. In answer to an earlier question my hon. Friend said that the material was confined to MOD property. Will he confirm that that would be the position even within a half-mile radius?

Mr. Freeman: First, I can confirm that the exercises take place on MOD property. The liquid is used only within a short radius of the vehicles or aircraft and within an area that is wholly within MOD property. The question of the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) has prodded my memory and I can tell the House that the contaminant used is, typically, radium 223 sulphate that is heavily diluted with barium sulphate and aluminium oxide. It is always of very low radioactivity.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is the Minister aware that for those of us who have always supported nuclear power these nuclear war games are most embarrassing, even if there is no health risk? Will he confirm that materials other than those radioactive could have been used during the course of these exercises?

Mr. Freeman: No, Sir. I dealt with the material that is used in responding to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth). The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell Savours) knows that these are not nuclear war games. These are serious exercises that take place under strict regulations. They occur infrequently and are designed to improve the sophisticated techniques of the Ministry of Defence to deal with nuclear accidents.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Is this not possibly the case of some disaffected ex-Service man spreading his bile through the national media? Would it not be more positive if the media had a more responsible view and that these issues were checked out—the scale of these issues—with the authorities concerned with national defence and security so that there should be no alarm raised where there is no alarm to be raised, as my hon. Friend has so capably demonstrated?

Mr. Freeman: I agree with my hon. Friend. I think that the moral is not to believe everything that we read in the newspapers, including The Independent.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): Is the Minister aware that the failure of his officials to make disclosures to the chief executive of Staffordshire county council does not allay the anxieties of individuals that authorities are not being consulted? Secondly, will the Minister give an assurance that the land that is being used—I am led to believe that this land can be anywhere in the country—does not afford access to the general public? I shall not put words in the Minister's mouth about Salisbury plain, for example, which is an example of land that is shared by the military and the public. Can the Minister give an assurance that excercises of this nature will not expose members of the public who are not in the armed forces to any danger? At present the hon. Gentleman has convinced neither the public not the military that they are safe from these exercises.

Mr. Freeman: I can give the assurance that the hon. Gentleman seeks. There is no danger, there has never been any danger and there will be no danger to members of the general public, members of the armed forces or civilians in the Ministry of Defence, as a result of these exercises.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No, I shall take the applications under Standing Order No. 20 first.

British Rail (Redundancies)

3.54 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the announcement today of 9,000 white-collar redundancies by British Rail."

This is a matter of extreme urgency because British Rail has made it clear that of the 22,000 jobs in the administration division, 9,000 are to go in the next three years. Of those, 2,000 are to be lost in 12 months' time. Although it has been suggested that there are to be no forced redundancies, it is absolutely impossible to believe that it will be possible to reach those targets without compulsion. It is clear that British Rail is following the guidelines laid down by the Minister of State, Department of Transport, who, when he came to my constituency during the general election, said:

"We have given instructions to British Rail and the result now is to be a 9,000 job loss in the white collar jobs."

It is totally unacceptable that that should happen without the House of Commons having the right to debate a matter of such extreme urgency at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that she thinks should have urgent consideration, namely;

"the announcement by British Rail of 9,000 redundancies".

I have listened with great care and concern to what the hon. Lady has said, and I hope that she will find other ways of bringing the matter to the attention of the House. However, I have to rule that it is not appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20, and I therefore cannot submit her application to the House.

Military Exercises (Radioactive Contamination)

3.56 pm

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the report of the armed forces scattering radioactive material in exercises dealing with nuclear accidents".

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Lady will produce a new factor.

Mrs. Clwyd: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is a new factor. There is now a contradiction. If the 1981 Senator exercise, which was discussed a few moments ago, was a simulation of a road accident involving the transport of nuclear weapons, the need for such an exercise was apparently contradicted in a Written Answer from the Minister for Traffic and Roads, the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), which stated that radioactive materials being transported

"could not present a significant danger".—[Official Report, 10 February 1986; Vol. 91, c. 314.]

Since that complacent answer, there has been a road accident — involving a nuclear weapons convoy in Wiltshire last January.

The secrecy surrounding such exercises is unnecessary and damaging when it acts as a cover for inadequate procedures, unjustified risks and carelessness with people's lives. We need answers to these questions and remedies for these problems, and we need them now.

Mr. Speaker: May I have the hon. Lady's application, please?

The hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order Number 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that she thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the report of the armed forces scattering radioactive material in exercises dealing with nuclear accidents".

Again, I have listened with great care to what the hon. Lady has said, and, indeed, to what was said in the exchanges on the private notice question. However, I regret that I do not consider the matter that she has raised appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20.

Points of Order

3.58 pm

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance in a most serious matter. At the opening of this morning's proceedings in the Welsh Grand Committee, the Chairman, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Coleman), formally announced that during this Parliament he would call hon. Members to speak in proportion to party strengths on the Committee. That appears to be in contravention of "Erskine May", which states in respect of the Chamber that you, Mr. Speaker, will generally call Back-Bench Members alternately from either side of the House. The statement by the hon. Member for Neath clearly has the most serious constitutional implications for the House and, indeed, for the country as a whole. I would be grateful, Mr. Speaker, if you could give a ruling, as the Welsh Grand Committee will sit again in a minute's time.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) is intentionally misleading the House. I was present this morning in the Welsh Grand Committee when the Chairman said that he would bear in mind the fact that there were very few Welsh Conservative Members of Parliament, that there are even fewer Scottish Conservative Members of Parliament and that the Labour side of the Welsh Grand Committee is heavily stocked. The Chairman certainly did not say that he would act in accordance with the direct proportion of Members of Parliament; he said that he would bear in mind the wishes of the people of Wales.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: This is a matter I can deal with now. Now that I have heard the point of order put from both sides, I can say to both hon. Members and to other hon. Members who may wish to speak on this that it is not a matter for me. I have no jurisdication over the Chairmen of Standing Committees. A number of Chairmen of Standing Committee are in the Chamber this afternoon, and they know that they are responsible in Standing Committee for their actions. There is no appeal to me.

Mr. Rogers: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It cannot be further to that point of order, because there is no appeal to me.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Because of the ruling that has been reported to us, are there not implications for the line that you will take in this Chamber? Had this ruling been followed in the last Parliament, when there were 200 Opposition Members and 400 Conservative Members, is it not a fact that at least half the Opposition speeches need not have been made?

Mr. Speaker: I do not know what was said in the Welsh Grand Committee. On both sides, or at least on one side of the House, there seems to be a misunderstanding whether it was a definite statement. However, in this Chamber, I intend to carry on with the selection of speakers as I have in the past. Hon. Members know that at Question Time I have to bear in mind the weight of Members on either side of the House, as well as minority interests and many other considerations.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance about common courtesy. Did the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan), who raised this matter in the first place, have the courtesy to inform the Chairman of the Welsh Grand Committee that he intended to raise the matter on the Floor of the House?

Mr. Raffan: I did.

Mr. Rowlands: When?

Mr. Raffan: I informed him at lunchtime.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This matter must not be discussed across the Floor of the House.

I cannot take points of order on what happened in a Standing Committee. I can take points of order only on issues that arise in this Chamber.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It has to do with this Chamber. I speak as somebody who is desperately concerned about United Kingdom interests. I have a Welsh wife and a son who is in a Scottish regiment. The Library has kindly provided me with information in which both you and the House will be very interested: that in England there are 358 Conservative Members of Parliament, only 155 Labour Members of Parliament and a mere seven Liberal Members of Parliament. For every three English Labour Members there are seven English Conservative Members. It will be interesting to watch what happens in Committee. If there were to be changes in Committee in terms of party weight, this Chamber would be very interested, because it might have some lessons to learn. I should not like there to be a move in that direction, for the reasons that I have already given.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a separate point of order, Mr. Speaker. At one time, it was the custom for the Speaker to call on private notice questions and statements every hon. Member who happened to be standing. I understand your dilemma. However, you will recall that during the private notice question about the scattering of radioactive waste a number of Conservative Members were shouting down Opposition Members. It would be outrageous if——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was watching as well as listening. I do not think that the hon. Member can allege that the shouting came from only one side.

Mr. Cryer: But it was mainly from the Conservative side. My point is that, in order to achieve the balance that we seek to maintain, it would be quite wrong if a handful of Conservatives asked a few pat questions of a Minister and then sat down, leaving perhaps half a dozen or a dozen Opposition Members without a chance to speak on a matter that we consider to be of paramount importance, even though sycophantic Conservative Members who wish to suck up to the Minister seek to diminish its importance. The essence of democracy is accountability and the essence of the Opposition's task is to ensure that the Government are accountable. In seeking to ensure that accountability, it is important that searching Opposition questions should be allowed to the full, rather than that they should be determined by a group of bootboys and sycophants.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take one point of order at a time. The hon. Gentleman has only recently returned to this House. To my knowledge it has never been the practice of the Chair to hear every hon. Member who wishes to speak on a private notice question. That would leave us with hardly any time for the rest of the day's business. Today I gave rather longer than I normally give for private notice questions, which are an extension of Question Time. Normally I allow not more than 15 minutes. Today, however, because of the interest in this matter, I allowed supplementary questions to continue for over 20 minutes.

Before we proceed with the points of order, I should point out that there is important business ahead of us and that the House is likely to sit late into the night. If there are any genuine points of order that relate to matters that have taken place in this Chamber, I shall deal with them. I call next a member of the Chairmen's Panel.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider what has been said in the Chamber this afternoon. I accept your ruling that you can be concerned only with what has occurred in this Chamber, but what occurs in the House as a whole clearly reflects also on this House, and you hold a very important position in the House. Would you be prepared to consider what has been said in a Committee of this House and to come back to this place on a future day to advise the House about what you believe has occurred and whether it is right?

If what has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) actually occurred today in the Welsh Grand Committee, it must reflect on the procedures and the practice of this House. As I am a member of the Chairmen's Panel, which is a privileged position, I feel that it is important that you should give your ruling—I am sure that the country as a whole would value it—on this issue.

Mr. Speaker: I am pleased to give it. If the hon. Member will look at page 672 of "Erskine May" he will see that it says:

> "No appeal can be made to the Speaker regarding the decisions or rulings of the chairman of a Standing Committee."

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Many hon. Members thought that the last Parliament was exceptional, in that there were twice as many English Conservative Members of Parliament as there were English Labour Members of Parliament. It is all very well to refer to party political interests, but what about constituency interests? Has it occurred to you that a constituency has twice as much of a chance to be represented if it has a Labour Member of Parliament as if it has a Conservative Member of Parliament? Is that fair? Should we not be considering constituency interests rather than party political interests, since the electorate has already given its decision as to how it wants to be represented in this House?

Mr. Speaker: That might be an argument for what is alleged to have happened in the Welsh Grand Committee. These are very difficult matters for both the Speaker and the Chairman of every Committee. I have already said that I have no jurisdiction over what happens in Committee, but in this Chamber I shall bear those points carefully in mind.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With permission, I shall put together the four motions on Statutory Instruments.

Ordered,

That the draft Welfare of Battery Hens Regulations 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Fish Farming (Financial Assistance) Scheme 1987 (S.I., 1987, No. 1134) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Fishing Vessels (Acquisition and Improvement) (Grants) Scheme 1987 (S.I., 1987, No. 1135) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Fishing Vessels (Financial Assistance) Scheme 1987 (S.I., 1987, No. 1136) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c. [Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Orders of the Day

Finance Bill

Further considered in Committee.

[SIR PAUL DEAN in the Chair.]

Clause 58 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 3

OCCUPATIONAL PENSION SCHEMES

4.9 pm

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I beg to move amendment No. 77, in page 75, line 32, leave out paragraphs 1 and 2.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Paul Dean): With this, it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 69, in page 75, leave out lines 37 to 42 and insert—

'(2B) In subsection (2A) above "the permitted maximum" means, unless Parliament otherwise determines, the aggregate of £100,000 and the sum produced by multiplying £100,000 by a figure expressed as a decimal and determined by the formula (RD-RI) – RI where –

RD is the retail prices index for the month in which the employee retires; and

RI is the retail prices index for March 1987 and, if the result is not a multiple of £1,000, rounding it up to the nearest amount which is such a multiple.'.

No. 78, in page 75, line 38, leave out '£100,000' and insert '£104,000'.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: We discussed this point in some detail yesterday and I should like to spare the committee the necessity of considering it again. Therefore, I seek only to move amendment No. 77 formally because it is possible that other hon. Members may wish to contribute on this subject again today in the slightly different context of schedule 3. I have said all that I wish on the point and as I know that the Chair does not wish us to cover ground unnecessarily, I shall now resume my place. If another hon. Member has a contribution to make on either of the amendments that are grouped with this amendment, I shall naturally make room for them to do so because I have nothing further to add.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): Will my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury reconfirm that if the Treasury alters the occupational pensions limit of £100,000, it will not be altered downwards but only upwards?

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): I wish to raise only one point. We have already been through the question whether the lump sum is correct in principle. As the House knows, my hon. Friends and I are basically sympathetic to the idea of a lump sum.

I should like to put two points to the Minister. First, I presume that the two paragraphs refer to all occupational pension schemes and that they cover all such potential occupational pension schemes or at least those that people join after 17 March or schemes that come into being after 17 March. My second point arises from that. Since the new lump sum provisions apply to schemes that come into being after 17 March or that people join after 17 March,

I presume that the entitlement of those people who are already in schemes that were in being before 17 March if those people were in the schemes before 17 March will be unaffected. I should be grateful if the Financial Secretary would confirm that.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): I shall not detain the Committee for long but there is an interesting principle in amendment No. 69, which was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts). I make this minute contribution to see whether the Financial Secretary will establish the Government's approach to the index-linking of lump sums. I cannot recall having seen on record any reason why there should be any opposition to any such index-linking. Surely the alternative will be the necessity to return to this House in successive Finance Bills – even when inflation is as low as it has been during the past few years.

I wonder whether my right hon. Friend will be prepared to inform the House of the Government's view of the whole business of index-linking in relation to lump sums. I for one do not look forward to having to return perhaps every five years to update the figures that are embodied in a particular Finance Bill relating to a particular year.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): I tabled amendment No. 69 precisely to make the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) has just made. I note that the proposed new subsection (2)(b) contains the power to raise the limit. It would seem more sensible and for the greater convenience of the House if that were done automatically through a formula such as the one that I propose, except in those years when the Government bring forward a proposal, which is agreed by the House, that indexation should not apply in that year. Like my hon. Friend, I should be interested to hear my right hon. Friend's reasons for resisting – if he chooses to do so – the principle of indexation of lump sums.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): First, in reply to the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), yes, the clause covers all occupational pension schemes, although not statutory schemes, which have their own legislation and which may need to be amended. On existing members and the lump sum rules – not the accrual rules – the lump sum rules will not affect existing members at 17 March 1987, but would affect someone who became a member after that date.

Mr. Blair: I am grateful to the Financial Secretary for giving way. I want to sort out this matter now because some people are troubled by whether those who have been in schemes before 17 March will still be able to take the benefit of the lump sum provisions without any cap being put on them. I suppose such people would have an incentive not to move after 17 March into schemes in which such a cap will be placed on them. Has any consideration been given to that and to the effect that it might have on job mobility?

Mr. Lamont: Obviously that factor has been taken into account in some of the points that have been made on the various provisions. The mobility of labour argument has especially been used. After 17 March the lump sum cap applies. We made that decision taking all the arguments into account.

On the indexation of the lump sum limit, we debated that matter yesterday. However, I am happy to repeat, for the third time, that we do not intend that the limit should be eroded. We shall review and adjust it from time to time. I was asked the specific question whether we intend that it should be adjusted downwards. I made it clear that we did not intend that it should be eroded. Yesterday, my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clarke) seemed well satisfied with that reply. Therefore, I hope that other hon. Members who have posed that question for the third time in Committee will be satisfied also.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I should like the Minister to clarify one point. I hope that in making that assurance to my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon South, (Sir W. Clarke) the Financial Secretary is not excluding further consideration of the recommendation that I have made on a number of occasions, that future accruals of lump sums, whether of £150,000, or more or less, should be liable to tax at the statutory rate. I put that forward as an extremely serious recommendation that I believe solves many of the problems that face the Inland Revenue at this time. I should not want my right hon. Friend to find himself caught by a remark that might be misinterpreted, so that he will be held not to be able to consider that recommendation any further. I trust that he will assure the house of that and of what he meant by the assurance that he gave to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Lamont: I do not wish to create a lot of uncertainty in the pensions world. My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) is dangling all sorts of words in front of me that he would like me to use. Of course, I always take my hon. Friend's comments seriously and it was in that sense that I said that I would consider the various points that he raised yesterday. However, he knows that at present we have no intention of introducing specific arrangements for what he has now suggested. If I were to respond otherwise, that would create considerable uncertainty in the pensions world. However, in response to what my two hon. Friends have said about the lump sum limit, I emphasise that we are not intending to erode that. I hope that that assurance will reassure them.

Mr. McCrindle: With great respect to my right hon. Friend, and with apologies for not having heard him on the first and second occasions when he made that point, he did not reassure me in quite the way that I had hoped, for the simple reason that if it is impossible to increase that figure to take account of the change in the retail price index for five years, during years one to four – on the assumption that inflation has not been nil – I remind my right hon. Friend that effectively there is an erosion. Is that not an argument in favour of linking into some index so that the lump sum never falls behind, and so that it cannot fall behind?

Mr. Lamont: I am sorry that I was rather brief, but we went into this yesterday, when I made it clear that notwithstanding the arrangements that we had made, for example, for personal allowances, it is the Government's general view that we do not wish to build into fiscal legislation automatic escalators or index provisions. Although I recognise what my hon. Friend is saying, £100,000 and £150,000 are substantial lump sums. We intend to review the matter and to deal with the matter as I said. We do not think that it would be right to have a year-by-year automatic escalator, as my hon. Friend suggests, for reasons that I well understand.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Since my right hon. Friend has given me an assurance on my proposal – I am sure that the Committee understands precisely what he said on that point, namely that he is not in the least committed in favour of what I am advocating – and since we have had a useful short debate, particularly following on what was said yesterday, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I beg to move amendment No. 79, in schedule 3, page 76, line 21, leave out 'the benefits provided by the scheme'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 80, in Schedule 3, page 76, line 23, leave out 'whatever' and insert 'which may be drawn to the notice of the Board by the Occupational Pensions Board.'

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: This, once again, has a close relationship with the remarks that I made yesterday and I shall speak briefly.

I have made the point that it is wrong that the DHSS should seek to regulate schemes by the size of the contributions which are made at the start and that the Inland Revenue should seek to regulate schemes by the size of the benefits that are received at the end. This dual system of control is extremely confusing and hampering for pension schemes and people who contemplate making new arrangements for their retirement and it should be ended. If there must be a choice we should accentuate the positive and encourage people to make contributions rather than to discourage them in relation to the benefits that they receive.

As I have put my point again, I do not think that I need to labour it. It is germaine to this part of schedule 3 and I trust that my right hon. Friend can find a moment to give the House his further thoughts on dual control and the reform of the Inland Revenue.

The second point, which arises from amendment No. 80, is simply to draw attention to the enormous latitude conferred on the Inland Revenue by the use of the word "whatever" in line 23 of page 76 which seems so broad that the House should stumble on it. I think that it would be better if such an expression were not offered to the House because it is too broad. In order to improve this I am making the same suggestion that I made yesterday which is that consultation with the OPB would be the appropriate course. I hope that that will commend itself to the House. I do not think that I need to dilate further on these points and I should be glad if my right hon. Friend could let us have his observations.

Mr. Blair: We are grateful to the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) for raising these matters and I simply wish to make two short points arising from these amendments.

There has been some anxiety about the change in the system of discretionary approval and it is right that we ask the Financial Secretary to explain the Government's thinking on it. The National Association of Pension Funds is particularly worried that it will in some way result in a wide range of new restrictions on the types of occupational pension schemes that will be approved. I would be grateful if the Financial Secretary will confirm that the purpose of paragraph 3 of schedule 3 is to replace the practice notes which the Inland Revenue uses with a set of regulations.

If there are to be changes in substance, perhaps he could tell us what they are to be. But as I understand it the purpose is simply to swap the present system of discretionary approval by means of practice notes with a more formal structure in the form of regulations. If the Minister can assure us that that is the case, that will lay some fears to rest about the new paragraph 3.

My second point arises directly from the amendment. I have some sympathy with the hon. Member for Kensington about the inclusion of the word "whatever" in paragraph 3(5) because that seems to be extremely broad. The only difficulty with his amendment is that it does not simply mean that the OPB should be consulted; it confers some special statutory status on the board as opposed to any other body and that may be a little difficult to achieve. But his basic point is clear and deserves an answer from the Minister.

It would help enormously if the Minister could give us a clear answer on those points because they have caused enormous anxiety outside the House. If we can lay those fears to rest during the debate, it will have been well worth having.

Mr. McCrindle: I am somewhat fearful that this matter may also have been raised when I was absent yesterday, so I shall intervene even more briefly than before to dissent from my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams).

I can see what my hon. Friend is trying to do and I would be prepared to leave out the word "whatever", but I am not sure that his replacement words would be of any major service to the advancement of occupational pensions. If my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary is disinclined to accept the amendment, perhaps he would accept the point that to encourage the OPB to be able to take a rather broader view of a scheme, including the benefits, may not necessarily be bad, as my hon. Friend implied, and that possibly a middle course between the proposed deletion and the proposed new words may be considered before further legislation on occupational pensions is introduced.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Amendment No. 79 returns to a subject which we have debated on several occasions, the controls on benefits. My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) believes that the world would be a much better place if provision for retirement were essentially based on money purchase schemes rather than on final salary schemes. His amendment seeks to sweep away the present tax approval rules for occupational pensions which operate by references to the maximum benefits which the schemes can provide and he suggests a rule that the aggregate contributions to the occupational pension scheme, that is the amounts paid by the employer and employee combined, may not exceed 20 per cent. of the individual's salary. As I have already said to my hon. Friend, that would be a far-reaching change and would take us into Green Paper territory.

The issue has been aired considerably. My hon. Friend has discussed it with me and the Minister for Social Security and the Disabled. I am well aware that my hon. Friend is postulating a vastly different world and a different set of arrangements for pensions. I see that the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) is looking worried about my reference to 20 per cent. I anticipated that we would take the next group of amendments with these amendments and I do not wish to be out of order, but there is a certain connection between the two. I was being extremely careful, if not a little vague, in my choice of words because I did not wish to stray out of order. The two groups are inextricably linked and it is difficult to discuss the first without the second and the 20 per cent. figure.

My hon. Friend seeks to sweep away the controls on benefits and instead place controls entirely on contributions. The hon. Member for Sedgefield and his colleagues may have reservations about that and certainly it would be a far-reaching change. I have discussed this matter with my hon. Friend on many occasions and I can assure him that it will continue to be aired and that we shall continue to listen to him. However, during the proceedings on the Finance Bill, I cannot suddenly introduce such a far-reaching change. I hope that my hon. Friend will not think me wholly unreasonable in resisting his revolution. He has deployed the argument on many occasions and I think that he has a lot of logic on his side. However, I do not wish to create havoc and uncertainty in the pensions world. My hon. Friend has been fighting this war for a long time and he very much wants to win it. He will have to fight for a little longer but he has advanced somewhat in his battle and has perhaps made some converts.

4.30 pm

On amendment No. 80, I was asked about the inclusion of the word "whatever". I emphasise that the intention is to preserve the maximum flexibility and, in answer to the hon. Member for Sedgefield that no substantial change is intended. Clearly it is not the intention to direct schemes to invest in a particular way. The purpose is to make it clear that controlling director schemes cannot invest in for example, holiday homes or yachts for use by directors. The provision makes no substantive change in present practice; it merely strengthens anti-abuse practice. In his wording my hon. Friend was perhaps reverting to one of the themes that we covered quite thoroughly yesterday – the liaison between the Inland Revenue and the Department of Health and Social Security and the Occupational Pensions Board. I made it clear to my hon. Friend that on many of these matters it would be absolutely natural for us to consult the occupational pensions board, and we shall do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) suggested that we should think about giving the Occupational Pensions Board a somewhat wider remit, and I listened to his point. Yesterday, I defined narrowly and precisely the matters for which the Occupational Pensions Board was responsible and I shall draw my hon. Friend's remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: It has been useful for the Committee to go over the ground once again, because we have been going slightly further than we did yesterday. What my right hon. Friend has said has been constructive within the limits of the difficulty in which he obviously finds himself; in the Committee stage of the Finance Bill he is being dragged into very philosophical issues on the whole question of provision for retirement. Final salary schemes are based on the idea of collective funding. Money purchase schemes are based on the idea of an individual entitlement which can be put together in a fund with other individual entitlements; they are an aggregation of individual entitlements. In final salary schemes, it is difficult to determine who owns what. That cloudy and rather Socialistic approach to retirement pensions is wrong and is rather out of character with Conservative thinking.

I would not like it to be thought that I was totally opposed to final salary schemes and wished them to be destroyed. What is in line with the general tenor of the Government's thinking and what is absolutely right is that we should build up, even within a final salary fund, a core of personal identifiable individual entitlement which can be taken as a transfer value if the beneficiary decides to leave the scheme as an early leaver. It would be an identifiable amount and could be calculated actuarially. That is very important. I would not disagree that, if a final salary scheme, having covered what may be thought to be a suitable minimum personal entitlement for all the members of the scheme, then has sufficient funds to do more, it might be at the discretion of the trustees or the sponsoring employer to put those funds into additional benefits for members of the scheme and their dependants. I would not wish to destroy final salary schemes but I want to ensure that everybody knows where he stands rather than being in a scheme where he is not able to identify his rights. That is why I keep drawing attention to the constributions rather than the entitlements in legislation governing the schemes.

I note what my right hon. Friend had to say about the Occupational Pensions Board and the Inland Revenue. I floated the idea of removing "whatever" because I did not think that it should go through without comment. After this short debate I think that we have exhausted the subject.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I beg to move amendment No. 81, in page 76, line 34, leave out from 'exceed' to 'of' in line 36 and insert

'a figure which, when taken together with the contributions paid by his employer, is equal to 20 per cent. or such higher percentage as may, in a particular case, be prescribed by the Occupational Pensions Board.'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 82, in page 77, line 8, leave out from 'exceed' to 'of' in line 9 and insert

'a figure which, taken together with the contributions paid by his employer, is equal to 20 per cent. or such higher percentage as may in a particular case be prescribed by the occupational pensions board.'.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Here we have a reference to a point that I made, or sought to make, on Second Reading, and I have revived the figure of 20 per cent. partly because it corresponds to what I said on Second Reading. I mentioned that when I touched on the subject during the Committee stage of the Finance Bill in 1970. I brought up the concept that what one puts aside for one's retirement benefit might be related to the concept of 10 minutes in the hour, which, of course gives a figure of 20 per cent. That figure is not just a round figure which it is convenient to use for the sake of argument; it is approximately the figure that I think needs to be put aside for retirement so that the average person receives a pension which is approximately two thirds of his final salary when he comes to leave full-time work. It could be regarded as a target. I would not necessarily wish it to be regarded as a maximum, which is why I have said that in particular cases the Occupational Pensions Board might be willing to consider a higher figure. On other occasions, I have recommended a figure of 25 per cent. I am happy to see large sums flowing into pension schemes because that is for the good of the economy as well as for the good of the members.

The amendment would have the effect of putting contributory and non-contributory schemes on the same footing. When I was working in personnel management we took it for granted that there was not such a thing as a non-contributory pension scheme. In a particular employment it might well be expected that employees might put 5 per cent. into the occupational pension fund but if they were not called upon to do so by their employer we assumed that that would be taken into account in the general remuneration package and that the salary, on current account would tend to be adjusted in relation to the market for the particular type of employment because there was no requirement to contribute to a pension scheme in certain cases.

By putting the employer and employee contributions together, I am also making a recommendation that produces big administrative simplification when members belong to several different schemes. In some of those schemes the employer will make contributions jointly with employees, and in others the employee will possibly make voluntary pension contributions on his own. If we are to have a regulation whereby the maximum permitted access to the tax haven-type of pension provision is controlled with regard to contributions it might be reasonable to put employers' and employees' contributions together in a single lump.

I think that I am right in saying that the taxpayer has to pay 20 per cent. on top of current remuneration of employees in the public sector to provide the pension benefits required under the public sector unfunded schemes and yet we have much smaller contributions than that in the vast majority of private sector schemes.

I have looked at the minimum contributions required for employers and employees jointly in contracted-out schemes. That contribution is so small that it does not bear any relation to the figure of 20 per cent. Therefore, we could say that the private sector schemes are likely, on average, to be about half as good as what we think appropriate for the public sector. As the Committee is dealing with pension matters in such detail in the Finance Bill debate today I do not believe that we should pass by without comment upon the fact that, in the private sector we seem, at the present time, to be content with a very much lower standard of provision than we think is appropriate in the public sector. That is an observation that arises from the fact that I have put a figure of 20 per cent. in this amendment. I am not seeking to force this amendment on my right hon. Friend, but I believe that it would be valuable for the Committee to have his observations on it.

Mr. Blair: I congratulate the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) on raising an amendment that has a logical symmetry to it.

I have attempted to come to grips with the pension legislation and I believe that one of the curiosities of that legislation is that the limit on contributions refers simply to employees although the actual benefits that arise out of a scheme are the product of the contributions of employers and employees. There is a limitation on those benefits. As I understand it, the main thrust of the argument put forward by the hon. Member for Kensington is that the contributions of the employer should be lumped together with the contributions of the employee. The hon. Gentleman has chosen a figure of 20 per cent. as opposed to the limit of 15 per cent. to be placed on the employee. I suppose that, in some cases, that could mean a reduced amount of contribution since the employers' contributions are not, as I understand it, subject to any limitation. It is correct to ask why we treat the contributions in this way since both the contributions are going into a scheme and at the end of the day a limit will be placed on the benefits of that scheme.

I would be grateful if the Financial Secretary could explain the Government's thinking. In particular, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman can say whether he believes the hon. Member for Kensington is right in saying that if the amendment was accepted and the percentage was set by the Occupational Pensions Board or whoever and thus the contribution was set, that could give a more accurate reflection on the rules concerning the limitation of benefits when schemes finally come to fruition.

Mr. McCrindle: I support the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams). I believe that to move in the direction of raising the limits is a perfectly good idea. Although I would be a little surprised if my right hon. Friend were prepared to accept the amendment in the specific form in which, inevitably, it has been tabled, I wonder whether he will take the opportunity to comment on why we still believe, in 1987, that it is desirable to have a percentage restriction.

I would like to put into a scheme a particularly large percentage of my earnings to achieve a particularly comfortable retirement pension. I believe that the Government should tell us why such a percentage should be restricted. Of course, I know all the historic reasons for that restriction, but I do not believe that there is any disadvantage in taking the opportunity of these Finance Bill debates to update our thinking and remind ourselves why we believe a percentage restriction should be placed on such schemes.

As I understand it we are talking about a 15 per cent. limitation in relation to additional voluntary contribution schemes. I believe that 17·5 per cent. is the limitation on personal pensions. Perhaps my right hon. Friend will take this opportunity, to remind us why, in an area in which, in all conscience, there is sufficient complication, we should eschew the possibility of uniformity. We seem to be approaching two different types of pensions with different percentage limitations.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) is putting forward the second part of his platform for the complete reform of pensions. The new controls that he wants to see on contributions are a substitute for the removal of the benefit controls that he wants to sweep away.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington explained in an earlier intervention that he believed that it would be much more in accordance with Conservative philosophy if we had a series of pensions where each person had his own accrued personal rights. That relates to his strong views on transferability. My hon. Friend has a specific amendment that incorporates that principle. We shall debate that amendment as it sums up in figures exactly what he has put down in this amendment.

4.45 pm

I am afraid that my reply to my hon. Friend is similar to the reply I gave to his last amendment. Amendment No. 81 encroaches on the territory of the Green Paper. If I were to accept the amendment it would go against the assurances that have been repeatedly given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

A number of my hon. Friends have queried various aspects of the limits on contribution. My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) asked about the 15 per cent. limit for AVCs and the 17·5 per cent. limit for personal pensions. There is a lower limit for the AVCs because of the benefit of employer contributions. I believe that there is an amendment about this and we shall be able to discuss the matter further. However, the employer's contribution is the reason why there is a difference between the personal pensions and the AVCs.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) asked why there was no limit on employer contributions. He said that, in certain circumstances where there is a 20 per cent. limitation, that might result in a lower employer contribution because, presently, there is a limit on employees' contributions. There is a limit on benefit, but no limit on the employer's contribution. It is the employer's contribution that has been abused in certain instances. We discussed that abuse yesterday when we spoke about maximum accrual rates over a short period that resulted in large sums of money sometimes exceeding the payment of salary. Such employers' contributions have been channelled in a way to generate large sums in a relatively short period.

Benefits are based on final salaries. Employers' contributions follow the advice of the scheme actuary as to what is needed to keep that scheme solvent. I am afraid that I cannot give any explanation other than that to the hon. Member for Sedgefield.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar said that many of these limitations had grown up like Topsy and were rooted in history. My hon. Friend for Kensington is certainly trying to impose greater coherence on pension schemes.

Personal pensions, AVCs and occupational pensions serve slightly different purposes. The one thing they have in common is that they provide pensions, but they are subject to different circumstances. I do not believe that one could have the same controls on the benefits and contributions of personal pensions, largely for the self-employed, as on occupational pension schemes. However, as these new instruments develop, I have no doubt that the opportunity will arise when we can consider more possibilities for harmonising the arrangements and the framework within which the different schemes operate.

The campaign of my hon. Friend the member for Kensington continues. He wants to move to this money purchase scheme rather than a largely final salary scheme —or, as he made clear, if we have final salary schemes, he wants them to be much more on a basis similar to the personal pensions but within company pension schemes. I understand entirely what he is campaigning for. We will certainly continue to listen to him. My right hon. Friends intend to have discussions with him about this. I hope that he will understand that his radical sweeping reforms cannot simply be introduced through this one little clause in the Finance Bill.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Once again, this has been a helpful short debate. I hope that our debates will be studied by people in the pensions movement because my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury is making some very constructive suggestions that show that he has fully grasped the points that I am making. I know that we will be extremely grateful to him for that and I hope that we can carry him further along those roads in the future.

Employers who read the debate might take fright at the sight of a 20 per cent. contribution and think that that is now hanging over them. It would not be inappropriate that employers' contributions should be a minimum of 10 per cent. and that a further 10 per cent. should be at the option of the employee in the average scheme. However, even 10 per cent. is a lot for some employers on top of what they may be funding for other employee benefits.

I offer my right hon. Friend a self-denying ordinance —that the Treasury might possibly renounce its claim to employers' contributions to national insurance, which is already in excess of 10 per cent., and put that all into pension provisions. Before long, the Government would have much smaller bills for assistance to people in retirement with supplementary benefit. However, that takes us somewhat wide of the clause. Having had this useful debate, I beg to seek leave of the House to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

The First Deputy Chairman: We come now to amendment No. 51, with which we are to discuss No. 52.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: As I have given an undertaking to try to help the Chair to reduce the length of our debates, I recommend that with amendments Nos. 51 and 52 we take Nos. 53 and 56, which have a similar objective. If that is agreeable to the Chair, I think that will assist the Committee and help to shorten our debate.

The First Deputy Chairman: Does the Committee agree to that? So be it.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I beg to move amendment No. 51, in schedule 3, page 70, line 4, at end insert

'15A. In paragraph 10 of that Schedule for the words "The Board" there shall be substituted the words "Subject to paragraph 11 below, the Board".'

The First Deputy Chairman: As the Committee has agreed, we will also discuss the following amendments: No. 52, in schedule 3, page 79, line 4, at end insert

'15B. After paragraph 10 of that Schedule, there shall be inserted

"11(1) This paragraph applies where an employee who is a member of the scheme ('the main scheme') is also a member of an approved scheme ('the voluntary scheme') which provides additional benefits to supplement those provided by the main scheme and to which no contributions are made by any employer of his.

(2) The Board shall not have power under paragraph 10 to make any regulations imposing any limits on the amount of a benefit provided for the employee

(a) under the main scheme to the extent that it requires account to be taken of the amount of benefit under the voluntary scheme.

[The First Deputy Chairman]

"(b) under the voluntary scheme to the extent that it requires account to be taken of the amount of a benefit under the main scheme".

No. 53, in schedule 3, page 82, line 24, leave out paragraph 25.

No. 56, in schedule 3, page 82, line 32, at end insert

"(3) Sub-paragraph (2) above shall not operate so as to reduce the benefit provided for the employee by an approved scheme to the equivalent of a pension of less than one-sixtieth of his final annual remuneration for each year of service or such fraction if a lower fraction as is provided for in the rules of the scheme.".

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Amendment No. 51 is introductory and simply paves the way for amendment No. 52, which is the central recommendation that I propose.

We come here to one of the aspects of the Budget that I think was regarded as a controversial feature when it was first announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in March. It immediately caused consternation in the pensions movement. When it reappeared in the summer Finance Bill, the proposal that I am attacking at this point was regarded with widespread dismay. I am sure that I am not the only member of the Committee who has had earnest representations that the Government's proposals should be amended.

When I was discussing another issue yesterday I took the opportunity to read the observations of the Occupational Pensions Board in connection with the association that is intended at the moment of the AVCs with occupational pension schemes. The difficulty is that, in practice, the proposals that the Government are making in the schedule will prove unworkable because no one can tell employees precisely what maximum contribution they may pay to a free-standing AVC because it is impossible to know whether the aggregate benefits from the AVC and their occupational scheme will, on retirement, exceed the limits imposed by Inland Revenue.

If the aggregate benefits on retirement exceed the revenue limits, the Inland Revenue will expect them to be reduced. This would be unacceptable because, if an occupational scheme reduced its benefits, it would be profiting from the success of the employees' own investments. On the other hand, an AVC provider could not reasonably deny the employee the product of his investment. It would fall back on the trustees of the occupational pension scheme to break the rules of their scheme and to dishonour their trust to accommodate the fact that the thrifty employee had done a sensible thing and chosen a good AVC.

The employee would rule himself out of an entitlement that he would otherwise have enjoyed under his firm's occupational scheme. That must be wrong. It constitutes retrospective legislation, because it means that, where the AVC has proved to be a fruitful form of retirement provision, no benefits can accrue to the member because retrospectively what he might have hoped to get from his occupational pension scheme, is cut. I suppose that somebody else will get the money, in that either the employee will then get the benefit because he does not have to put such a large topping-up contribution into the scheme, or there is more money for the trustees for other purposes.

As the Committee has agreed to take amendment No. 56 together with this group, I would like to point out a side effect that is also important for it to bear in mind. If the occupational pension trust is frustrated from giving an annuity immediately because of the Inland Revenue limit that would apply according to the proposals that the Government are making across both schemes, it might decide that it will take that money away from the beneficiary and use it for something else or hold it back for a subsequent purpose. The implication is that one cannot finance future increases to protect the pension from inflation.

That is wrong. If there is more money than can be used to provide an annuity, sometimes the trustees of an occupational pension scheme can use it as time goes on to provide greater increases to a member's pension than it otherwise would have done. Rightly or wrongly, this is an area that is still open to the discretion of the trustees.

Under the new legislation there is a requirement on the trustees to reduce the benefits provided by the scheme so that maximum benefits are not exceeded. This seems to be a change in attitude. It is now implied that there is no residual amount that is in some sense the property of the member. Part of his voluntary contributions must be used to reduce the liabilities of the scheme. It seems most undesirable that this reduction should have no limit. A member could pay AVCs in good faith and, because of exceptional investment success or lack of proper advice, he could find that his money was entirely wasted. For that reason, the amendment attempts to provide that the pension paid by the scheme cannot be reduced below the basic entitlement provided for in the scheme's pensions formula. That is the very least that is fair.

I hope that the Government will extricate themselves from the dilemma by listening to what professional people and the pensions movement are pressing on them, which is that they should regard the AVC as a totally separate and free-standing undertaking for pension provision and that there should be no liability on the occupational scheme to adjust its benefits to correspond to the success or failure of the AVC. This is a matter where the Committee is seriously engaged and we look forward to what my right hon. Friend has to say.

Mr. Tony Blair: This amendment was urged on me by several outside bodies. In the end, I did not put my name to it because I was not sure exactly where the balance of the argument came down, but it raises some points to which the Financial Secretary should respond.

I understand that there is a limit on the contributions, which are aggregated for both the additional voluntary contributions and the occupational pension scheme. In other words, the 15 per cent. limit applies to the total amount paid either in the occupational pension scheme or in additional voluntary contributions. If, under the occupational pension scheme, an employee is contributing 4 per cent. of relevant earnings, with an additional voluntary contribution he can top that up another 11 per cent., which gives an aggregate of 15 per cent. The regulations will also provide limits on the benefits that can be paid out under the schemes on the basis of aggregation. The limit on benefits will be two thirds of final salary, or whatever.

The National Association of Pension Funds Ltd. and other bodies say that if there is a limit on contributions to the scheme, one will not need to aggregate the benefits.

that simply depends on how well the additional voluntary contribution scheme or the occupational pension scheme have gone. They say that, if benefits are limited on an aggregated basis, one will presumably not enjoy the proper fruits of one's investment. They also say that if one invests a certain amount of money well, the returns will be more than the limit on benefits that the regulations impose, that such money will be lost, and that, because of the limits, one will not be entitled to the fruit of one's investment.

There is also the worry that it will be extremely difficult to see how to limit the benefits paid for what the additional voluntary contributions buy. Limits will occur in the occupational pension scheme. Some pension funds worry that it will mean that occupational pension schemes will become less attractive to people because they will have a limit on the fruits of their investment.

I saw another difficulty in the legislation. Perhaps there is an answer to it, in which case I shall be happy to support the hon. Gentleman's amendment. I assume that, when an employee purchases additional voluntary contributions, the body through which he purchases his investment will judge what the likely benefits will be. It will not be an entirely random event. Some attempt will be made by an employee, when he engages in additional voluntary contributions, to work out exactly what the likely benefit will be at the end of the scheme. It is not as though an employee will go into it with his eyes completely closed.

The main difficulty—this is why I said that there was a symmetry in the hon. Gentleman's earlier amendments—is that there is no limit on employers' contributions. I suppose that it will be possible to obtain two thirds of a salary—the maximum benefit—under the occupational pension scheme and then have additional voluntary contributions making a further top-up. The hon. Gentleman may say that there is nothing wrong with that. The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) asked why there should by any limit on the amount of contributions.

We are talking about tax relief. Therefore, we must balance the interests of the Exchequer, acting on behalf of the whole body of taxpayers, against the interests of any type of investment, such as pensions, that we want to encourage. I should be unhappy if there were to be a widespread opportunity for higher earners to make additional voluntary contributions, if such benefits are not aggregated with the benefits under the occupational pensions scheme and, therefore, purchase for themselves a much greater pension than will be available to others. If that were to be the case, it would involve a change in the balance between the interests of the Exchequer and individual taxpayers. We must think carefully about that matter. I should be grateful if the Financial Secretary will respond to the points that I have made. They are worth raising.

Mr. McCrindle: I agree with the remarks of the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) about why there should be limitations on contributions. He will understand that, for the purpose of the debate that I was trying to generate, it would not have been appropriate if I had conceded the point then, but I readily concede it now. It will be recalled that, during my contribution to the earlier debate, I raised the contrasting treatment of tax relief on contributions between AVCs and personal pensions. I received an explanation from my right hon. Friend of why it should be 15 per cent. on one and 17.5 per cent. on the other. To some exent we may return to the matter another day.

I accept the Financial Secretary's explanation of why such differences should apply.

The amendments to which we now turn our attention are aimed at bringing equivalence. So far as I can read them, they are designed to ensure that AVCs are, in effect, as freestanding as personal pensions already are under the legislation that has been introduced. Therefore, it seems to follow, as the amendment implies, that benefits should not be aggregated with those of the occupational pensions scheme. When, in retirement, total benefits exceed Inland Revenue limits, the benefits will not need to be reduced if the amendments are passed.

I now raise the central point to which I draw my right hon. Friend's attention and to which it would be helpful if I could have a response. If we now agree, as we did during earlier debates on other amendments, that for the reasons that we conceded, there must be a limit on contributions, why must we have, in effect, a limitation on contributions and a limitation on benefits? One of the ways in which we could most effectively move forward would be to accept that if there must be one, it does not necessarily follow that there must be another. To that extent, I commend the amendments that were moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams). I look forward to hearing what my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury has to say.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I echo some of the arguments and worries that have been expressed. I, too, have received representations from the National Association of Pension Funds Ltd. and similar organisations. There is a good deal of consternation, even at this stage. I am aware that we are running short of time within which the Government are seeking to introduce new, important and generally helpful innovations. It is almost a revolution in the provision of pensions in this country. I support the Government's main thrust, but I have two worries about voluntary contributions as presently proposed. First, the scheme as presently proposed by the Government is unmarketable for the reasons that have been stated by the——

Mr. Norman Lamont indicated dissent——

Mr. Kirkwood: The Financial Secretary shakes his head. It is difficult to see how AVCs can be sold in the context in which the Government propose them. I wait to hear what he says, and so will the industry. I cannot see how a salesman, an insurance company, or whoever will purvey the schemes, can put together a prospectus that will convince me that a scheme is sensible, if it were appropriate to my personal circumstances to adopt a scheme.

Secondly, I agree with what was said earlier. The scheme is unmanageable. I do not see how the people who are responsible for AVCs—presumably they will be trustees—can possibly work out exactly what will happen at the end of the day and prevent the possibility of benefits exceeding the limits that have been set down. I am worried about what happens to the benefits. Will they fall into the hands of trustees or employers? I am not entirely sure. I am certain that the trustees of any such scheme, when they try to determine what future benefits will be, may run foul of the Securities and Investments Board plc in terms of the monitoring of the scheme.

[Mr. Kirkwood]

Trustees may say to prospective purchasers, "We think that the projection will be this, that and the other." Of course, we have had debates in the House on other legislation about the need to counsel caution in respect of projections and scheme sales. If the trustees of the new AVCs adopt such an approach, as they should, and they find that they have been over-cautious and that the benefits will exceed the limits, what will happen to the money that accrues from investment? There are difficulties and, although I am not an expert, I can foresee problems on the horizon for trustees in the monitoring of the scheme.

I understand that the Government are issuing consultative documents to trustees to try to meet that point. The proper and obvious way of solving the matter, as has been suggested, is to ensure that free standing AVCs are as free standing as personal pensions so that their benefits are not aggregated with those of an occupational scheme. How much would that cost the Government? What difference would it make? Would it disrupt some of the schemes, benefits, guidelines or the rules and regulations that abound in this sector? If so, I should be pleased to hear about them. With the information that is presently available to me I do not think that it will cost a lot or be difficult to administer. It would enable the scheme to progress in the way that industry was expecting, which would be to the benefit of all concerned.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We shall study carefully all the points that have been made, but I should like to distinguish sharply between personal pensions and AVCs. AVCs are not personal pensions, which was the main reason for their introduction. I shall rest my case on the strong distinction between them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) seeks to disapply the benefit limits for members of schemes who are paying free standing AVCs. If the benefit limits did not apply it would be possible for someone in a non-contributory occupational scheme to invest up to 15 per cent. of salary in a free standing AVC scheme and increase his total pension benefits way beyond the two-thirds final salary maximum that applies under the existing rules.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) asked about costs. I cannot possibly answer that, but I can envisage circumstances in which the cost could be substantial. I understand why the industry should want this change. I was shaking my head because it is not surprising that the industry wants it. It says that free standing AVCs should be like personal pensions, but we have introduced personal pensions for that purpose. If people want personal pensions they can take them out. We have introduced AVCs to help people who wish to make up part of their occupational pension scheme; we already have in-house AVCs. We are introducing free standing AVCs to give people choice in investment management. Given that we have these rules for free standing AVCs —they are part of occuptional pension schemes— it is logical that they should be constrained in the same way as occuptional pension schemes.

I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington wants nothing to do with limits on occupational pension schemes. In this instance we are not having a wide ranging debate, we are on a narrower point as to whether AVCs should be constrained on benefits. In my view they should be because they are part of occuptional pension schemes. They are not personal pension schemes under another name; if they were we would have introduced one new instrument and not two. they are for different purposes.

A number of hon. Members, particularly the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, have suggested that the benefits may be impossible to police. We shall consider that point and review it in the future, but I do not think that the problems with which one is faced will be inherently different from those of in-house AVCs.

Members of occupational schemes have a right, under social security legislation, to know the value of their pension rights, and therefore what the scope is within the overall benefit limits to pay AVCs. That is a calculation which AVC managers should carry out under present rules on in-house AVCs to guard against excessive contributions. For free standing AVCs they will have to make a calculation and that information will be conveyed by the scheme member to the AVC provider. I do not think that that will be inherently impossible. I do not wish to minimise the point, but I am not surprised that the industry wanted a different regime.

5.15 pm

We must pay attention, as the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire reminded me, to any practical problems. I am not convinced by what has been said thus far about possible problems, but we shall keep the practical aspect of the matter under review and we shall do what we can to make it workable if there are genuine difficulties. On the point of principle with benefits, there is a strong case for a limitation on benefits.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I should like to raise the point that was made by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) as to the cost of allowing a bigger flow of savings into AVC pension schemes by removing the restriction that is intended by the Government's provisions. The result, insofar as the AVC results in the payment of a higher annuity, would be that the taxpayer loses nothing because the principle is, as I have often said in slogan form, "save now, pay tax later." The taxpayer recovers much more money because if it is put into a fund to fructify, which is then able to grow and is well invested, when it emerges as an annuity more tax is paid than if tax were deducted and the money went straight out in the pay packet in the first instance and was not saved. The taxpayer must gain if an annuity is ultimately larger; the economy gains, because by encouraging thrift and savings instincts and by getting money put into these schemes, which then go out into investment — we hope into productive manufacturing industry or worthwhile projects — the economy is healthier and there is a better yield to the taxpayer.

In insisting that the provisions must stand as they are my right hon. Friend is not only creating almost impossible dilemmas for administrators he is also doing something which is not in the public interests or in the interests of the economy. Therefore, before we close on this point, will he say whether he is prepared to consider further suggestions which we might be able to work out between now and Report, which I think will be next week? I should like to feel that we had not left this point, if I withdraw my amendment, because there is much concern about the administrative difficulties, quite apart from the wider implications, and the Government would be wrong to steamroller the House into accepting the provisions. I therefore hope that my right hon. Friend will be prepared to say to the Committee that this is a matter which he thinks appropriate to come back to on report.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have tried to respond to the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir Brandon Rhys Williams) has made during this lengthy consideration of the pension provisions. I have tried to respond as constructively as I can. I hope that my hon. Friend will agree, despite the radical proposals that he has put forward, that I have responded in a positive manner.

As to the principle of the benefits on AVCs, I cannot give an undertaking to come back on report because I feel that the principle is correct. I listened carefully to what my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington said about administration and the practicality of it. I have noted what was said and I shall seriously consider that point. However, I do not think that I can come back on report with a new way of looking at the administration of it.

I cannot agree with my hon. Friend on the central point about benefit limits. I listened to my hon. Friend. He says that there may be no cost because the benefits are subsequently taxed. That is in the long run. The immediate cost will be substantially higher. The benefits may not be paid for up to 40 years. Of course, I have no idea what the cost of having no benefit limits would be. However, it would simply allow free standing AVCs to be used as a tax shelter for investment generally.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Why not?

Mr. Lamont: I do not think that my hon. Friend has carried all Members of the Committee with him in that comment. I am afraid, he has certainly failed to persuade me that in the present regime, with the limits on benefits in occupational pension schemes, AVCs, which are not personal pensions, ought to be subject to a regime that is analogous to that of personal pensions schemes rather than that of occupational pensions.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: On the matter of recommendations to allow large contributions to tax haven schemes, I am not trying to suggest that outrageous proposals should be permitted that have no real relationship to orthodox provision for retirement but are simply an exploitation of the tax haven element. I do not want to be associated with the idea that there should be no upper limit whatever on contributions. However, I think that contributions should be encouraged to rise from what they are now. It is a pity to talk about limitation to the extent that we do. I think that contributions of 20 per cent. or 30 per cent. of current remuneration would be perfectly appropriate and that higher figures, in many cases, might even be appropriate.

On this question, I have been reflecting lately on what I might like my friends to write on my tombstone after my death. I think that I would like them to write, "God knows I tried." I hope that anyone who reads the debate in the pension movement will see that I have tried to persuade the Government on this point. If I have not succeeded on this occasion, no doubt the House will have need to come back to it at another time. My right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary has been so clear. The House is grateful to him for the extremely appreciative way in which he is approaching the debates. I have no criticism of him whatever. I think that he happens to be mistaken on this particular point, but a man who never made a mistake, never made anything. However, having made those observations I beg to ask the leave of the Committee to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Watts: I beg to move amendment No. 71, in page 80, leave out lines 7 to 50.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to consider the following amendments: No. 8, in page 80, line 8, leave out paragraph 19.

No. 55, in page 80, line 9, at end insert

'(1A) In this paragraph, and in paragraphs 20 and 21 of this Schedule, the words "each year of service" wherever they occur shall have effect so as to include those years of service in a previous employment to which any transfer value accepted by the scheme relates.'.

No. 36, in page 80, line 13, after 'service', insert

', including any previous periods of service as a member of any other retirement benefits scheme of the same or any other employer and any other periods of service which the Board may prescribe by regulations under paragraph 18(2) above.'.

No. 54, in page 80, line 13, after 'service', insert

', including any previous periods of service as a member of any other approved retirement benefits scheme of the same or any other employer.'.

No. 75, in page 81, leave out lines 1 to 26.

Mr. Watts: The effect of amendments Nos. 71 and 75 is to delete paragraphs 19, 20 and 21 of schedule 3 which introduce a new and much less favourable regime for accelerated accrual of pension rights. At present, late entrants to an occupational pension scheme can accrue maximum benefits over a period of 10 years. The new regime proposed in the Bill extends that period to 20 years. It seems inevitable that that change will discourage labour mobility, particularly among older employees. No one over the age of 45 will be able to change jobs and still accrue a maximum pension.

The change seems to run counter to some of the legislation we enacted in the previous Parliament to improve the position of early leavers in respect of their pension rights. For example an early leaver at the age of 50, who is entitled to transferable benefits guaranteed by the Social Security Act 1985 may find that he is not able to realise the benefits of those transferred funds on retirement because of the changes now before us.

I have struggled in vain to identify any rationale or logic in the proposals contained in the paragraphs. In my view, they are ill-thought-out and should be taken away by my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary for further consideration. All they show me is the rather deplorable Inland Revenue Prejudice that pension provisions, and much else that people do, are solely means of tax avoidance and little else. I am sorry to see so much of that prejudice reflected in the drafting of legislation. Of course, I hope that I am wrong and that my right hon. Friend may be able to lead me down the road to Damascus and to greater enlightenment. However, I doubt whether that will be the case.

Mr. Blair: The amendments of the hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) take a fairly drastic blue pencil to much of page 80 of the schedule. My amendment, which is included in this group, is more modest but I hope that it has a constructive effect. I simply want to probe the Government's intentions in relation to the new rules. The present rules allow the accrual of the maximum pension over a minimum period of 10 years. The new rules will substitute 20 years. The effect of amendment No. 36—there are others that have a similar effect—is that if the employee leaves one firm and joins another and both firms have occupational pension schemes, one simply aggregates the service. In other words, there must be at least 20 years' service to obtain the maximum benefit but that service can be with different employers.

As I understand it, the Government wanted to change the rules from 10 years to 20 years because they thought that the 10-year rule was allowing some over-hasty accrual of the maximum pension and that, therefore, the provision was being used for tax avoidance.

I confess, that at first I found it difficult to see how there could be avoidance on that basis unless the particular employee was joining a scheme and had no previous pension. In that way an employee, over the 10-year period was effectively allowing a huge and rapid accrual of benefit. I may have got that entirely wrong. As I understand it, the Government want to change the rules because they thought that 10 years was too short a time to accrue the maximum benefit and that the system was open to avoidance if the employer started to make large contributions to the scheme.

If the new rule of 20 years is permitted and the earlier service is included, which is the effect of the amendment we have tabled, the long period of 20 years would still have to be taken into account but it simply would not have to be with the same employer. My concern about the Government's requirement is that it places an obstacle in the way of job mobility. People would have to remain with the same employer in order to obtain the rapid accrual of benefits. I cannot see any reason why they should not move from one occupational pension scheme to another and simply take the benfit of their service with them. Indeed, I would have thought that that would fit in neatly with the Government's scheme of pension provision.

There is the further point that the personal pension scheme has no such restriction in the sense that it is simply taken with the employee wherever he goes. Therefore, the personal pension scheme will have an advantage over occupational pension schemes and will put them at a disadvantage.

If the test of the Government's provision is that it should prevent avoidance and they think that 10 years is too short a time to prevent that avoidance, they have to justify not so much the 20 years but why the 20 years has to be with the same employer. If we were able to have those provisions with different employers, it would meet the Government's objective in relation to avoidance and it would allow full flexibility of pensions.

5.30 pm

Mr. Kirkwood: On balance I am in favour of the approach adopted by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) as opposed to the rather sledgehammer approach adopted by the hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts), although I entirely agree with everything that he said and support the way in which he introduced the amendment. Like the hon. Member for Sedgefield, I should like to probe the Government about the thinking behind this scheme. Like the hon. Gentleman I cannot see easy ways of adopting avoidance tactics against the background of the maximum-period rules that formerly applied.

This is a substantial change and as the hon. Member for Slough said, it will have the effect of decreasing potential job mobility and portability of pensions. Some serious consequences could accrue from this change. The solution to the problem as we see it, and as the amendments see it, is simply to aggregate the service in the way that the hon. Member for Sedgefield suggested. What would that cost? I know that such questions are difficult to answer, but is there any way of knowing the effect of adopting the approach suggested by the hon. Member for Sedgefield of aggregating years of service? That seems to be an effective compromise that would give a balance against potential avoidance and avoid some of the worst effects that the hon. Member for Slough mentioned. To make the argument all-party, I certainly subscribe to the arguments advanced by the hon. Members for Slough and for Sedgefield.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) admirably moved amendment No. 36 standing in his name. I should like to draw to the attention of the Committee the fact that my amendment No. 54 is in identical terms but does not go quite as far as his. However, it seeks to make the same point. It worries me very much that transferability would be restricted by what the Government propose here. Obviously, the whole object of securing a transfer by an early leaver when he leaves one firm and enters another—if it is a final salary scheme that he joins—is to achieve the negotiation of added years. It appears to me, although I may be wrong, that what the Bill is proposing will make it more difficult if not impossible to secure added years in the second employer's scheme.

It has been strongly urged on me that in personnel management, particularly when negotiations about movements of very senior people are concerned, this provision that the Government intend is likely to be extremely damaging. I find that very disheartening not only because it is bad for the workings of the economy but because it is hard on individuals if they are impeded from making the best of their opportunities at the peak of their career by pension scheme provisions which may have a very substantial value by the time a man is in his late forties or fifties.

It is disheartening when I and other hon. Members who have worked for so long to try to improve the conditions for the early leaver find that the Inland Revenue is moving in precisely the opposite direction by introducing rules that will actually make it harder for the early leaver to get a fair deal. This is an indication of the fact that the Inland Revenue has lost sight of the public interest and is simply concerned to find ways of stopping the exploitation of the tax haven provisions that are allowed in retirement benefit schemes.

I am afraid that once again we are detecting at the back of the Revenue's thinking its terror that someone will exploit the tax-free lump sum opportunity. What it is doing here is once again aimed at blotting out exaggerated tax-free lump sum arrangements, but once again in the wrong way. I do not need to emphasise to my right hon. Friend what I think would be a better arrangement, that future accruals of lump sum entitlement, should be taxed at the standard rate. That would not be a retrospective action. It would be 40 years before it fully took effect, but where the stopping of eccentric or unacceptable plans for exploitation of lump sums is concerned it would have an immediate effect. That is the right way and what the Government are doing is the wrong way. I trust that the Committee is about to hear from my right hon. Friend that the Government have thought again about these proposals.

Sir William Clark: I support the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts). My amendment No. 8 is precisely the same as his, except that he cut two lines and removed the title. Presumably, that is why my hon. Friend's amendment was taken first. Perhaps I was upstaged. I do not want to reiterate the arguments that my hon. Friends have advanced. In many cases high flyers or middle management in the private sector have to move from one employer to another. That does not apply to civil servants. I shall not go into indexation of Civil Service pensions, but if a civil servant moves from one Department to another, whether from the Department of Transport to the Treasury or to the Home Office or elsewhere, he has the same employer and, consequantly, his pension is not affected. However, pensions in the private sector are affected by job movement.

Let us look at the employee who does not want to move and is made redundant. Is he to be penalised? I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) who said that on many occasions the Inland Revenue gives the impression that it is absolutely scared stiff that one person may find a loophole in some piece of legislation. Consequently, the Inland Revenue wants the legislation complicated and it is hedged around with so many restrictions and regulations that the ordinary man in the street and, indeed, the informed man in the street, can seldom make head or tail of it. It is time that we stopped this sort of restrictive practice. We ought to propagate Conservative philosophy by encouraging more and more people into private pension schemes.

Without amendment, this clause will have an inhibiting effect upon such movement into private schemes. I urge my right hon. Friend to have another look at this. We should stop this nonsense of trying to block loopholes that probably do not exist. The only effect is upon the employee, and I reiterate that it will invariably affect only the private sector employee.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We have had two different cases deployed. My hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) backed by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) simply wants us to drop the restriction on accelerated accrual. My hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield — sorry, not my hon. Friend although he has been most helpful in the course of this debate. The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) had an ally in my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) in suggesting that accrual should be based on service with previous employers. Although I understand the logic and the reason behind the suggestion by the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend, I shall spell out in some detail why that would not be the way to go.

First, I shall address my hon. Friend the Member for Slough and tell him and the Committee why we felt it necessary to make this change. I emphasise that, of course, job mobility, and especially job mobility for senior executives, is extremely important. Pension expectation is one factor, but only one among others that influence the decision. Even with pensions, many of the things that we have done are precisely designed to encourage mobility. I recognise that we have not got, under the present regime, a complete answer or transferability, nor everything that we need on mobility. Costs and other factors restrict mobility, and that is why we have been introducing schemes such as personal pensions and why there has been the revaluation of deferred pension benefits under the social security legislation. That is extremely important. It does not go as far as my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington wants, but it is a step forward and has made it easier, in certain circumstances, for people to move around.

We have attempted to tackle that problem through these various routes. None the less, although we recognise the importance of not placing obstacles in the way of people moving around, we have felt that there was a case for acting against the accelerated accrual. The maximum rate of accrual for occupational pensions under a final salary scheme is normally one sixtieth of final salary for each year of service up to 40 — hence the "two-thirds final salary" rule, although many schemes offer less generous pensions, which accrue at one eightieth or even one hundredth final salary for each year of service. For a variety of reasons, most employees will not serve 40 years in one scheme to retirement. Consequently very few — perhaps only 10 per cent. of all occupational scheme members — will qualify for anything approaching a pension of two thirds final salary on the normal basis.

In recognition of this, it has always been possible under the present tax rules for schemes to provide benefits based on the accelerated accrual, which has enabled maximum benefits to be obtained after as little as 10 years' service to retirement. The maximum rate of accrual for lump sums is normally three eightieths of final salary for each year of service up to 40—hence the "one and a half times final salary" rule. In the past it has been possible to take the maximum lump sum after 20 years' service—even where the total benefit was based on normal rates of accrual. In this way, people could maximise their tax-free lump sum at the expense of their taxable pension.

These are particularly generous concessions. It is very costly for employers to fund pensions on this basis, sometimes requiring annual contributions in excess of 150 per cent. of the individual's salary. As such contributions attract tax relief, this concession is also very costly for the Exchequer — particularly at the sort of salary levels which some employees currently enjoy.

5.45 pm

On Second Reading, I said that we have had interaction between the accelerated accrual and the lump sum, which has led to some large tax-free sums being handed out to people. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington feels that we should tackle the lump sum anomaly in an entirely different way, but we have not gone along that road. We believe, as the hon. Member for Sedgefield said, that there have been situations in which large contributions, through the employer — the employee contribution is limited — have been paid in, such as 150 per cent. of the salary per annum, to arrive at a two thirds salary.

For that reason, we propose a cut in these concessions, with effect from 17 March, when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor first announced these proposals. The maximum pension benefits will be possible only after 20 years' service to retirement — the same period that has always applied under the present regime for the lump sum. The lump sum can be boosted above the normal rate of accrual only if, and to the extent that, total benefits are boosted. This latter measure is a relaxation, in response to representations made after the original Budget day proposals. I stress that we have made changes under the social security legislation on the revaluation of deferred pension benefits and transfer values. All these things are designed to ease this problem, but through the employer's contribution some large sums have been paid in, sums that we regarded as difficult to justify.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield has tabled amendment No. 36 to which I shall address my remarks. My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington has tabled a similar amendment. Amendment No. 36 would mean that one employer would be providing an employee with a pension partly in respect of service with another, completely different, employer. This would entail substantial cross-subsidisation, particularly where schemes did not offer similar benefits.

It is not clear that employers could obtain tax deduction, under general tax principles, for their higher contributions, although I do not want to make much of that point. Only a handful of privileged employees would benefit from this amendment—the same handful who, under the old rules, could obtain maximum benefits after as little as 10 years.

Mr. Blair: With respect, that surely cannot be right. The purpose of our amendment is to keep the 20-year change but simply allow service with other employers to be counted. That cannot mean that the same people who benefit from the 10 years will now benefit from the 20 years.

Mr. Lamont: It does. The hon. Gentleman is missing a point of which my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington is aware, and of which he is prepared to pay the cost. What is being proposed would be a significant initial cost to industry, because when an employee moves from firm A to firm B what he takes with him is merely the pension that he has earned so far. That sum of money does not make up the difference between the two pensions and what he would have earned if he had stayed with one employer throughout his whole period. That is a substantial cost to add to British industry.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield has asked how much the proposal would cost. I am not sure what the cost to the Exchequer would be, but that is not the point. The point is that it would cost British industry if one said that in the funding of occupational pension schemes one should take account in the accrual of the years that would have been spent with other employers as well. This subject has been reviewed before. It was reviewed by the Occupational Pensions Board, which made recommendations on transfer values, and measures were included in the social security legislation. That also took account of the views of employers about the cost that would be imposed on them if they were always having to add back full liability for previous years with previous employers. I can give the hon. Gentleman a detailed arithmetical example if he thinks that that would be helpful.

I am in no doubt that this is a serious matter for industry. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington recognises this although he strongly believes that this is a price that should be paid, and that this is part of the price that we have to pay to move to a world of properly funded schemes more equivalent to money purchase ones.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): Does my right hon. Friend concede that at this moment, when many companies have found that they have overfunded their pension liabilities and are therefore writing back sums to profit, it is the right time to look positively at reforms which would be desirable on general grounds and which would involve an additional cost to industry to which my right hon. Friend the Minister referred?

Mr. Lamont: That may be so. We have debated surpluses and the proper way in which to use them. We have debated that in Committee and certainly the Committee would find that such a proposal would be strongly resisted by industry in general.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams indicated dissent.

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend is shaking his head. I shall be interested to hear what he has to say. However, the matter has been discussed with industry and I understand that industry has made it clear that this is not a cost that it would easily assume. I am speaking of matters that are largely the concern of the DHSS and we must take the views of industry into account. We would be imposing substantial costs on industry.

Mr. Blair: I want to ask for information. The Minister is being extremely lucid in his explanation. However, surely the question of the costs to industry is a matter that industry would have to agree in the terms of the pension scheme. There is no obligation on industry to contribute any particular amount or to hasten the process of accrual.

Mr. Lamont: That is absolutely right. Occupational pension schemes are voluntary arrangements. We want companies to develop occupational pension schemes. If we impose requirements on them that are too onerous, the development of occupational pension schemes will be hampered. The hon. Member for Sedgefield is quite right. Those matters are part of the remuneration package in the long run. We want to develop occupational pension schemes and I am informed that the proposal put forward by the hon. Member for Sedgefield which is supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington has been fiercely resisted by industry. However, I shall listen to my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: My right hon. Friend is misinformed about this. Of course there is a cost to the employer who is seeking to attract the services of a top person in the last and possibly the most productive years of that person's life. I do not think that that cost is one which the Inland Revenue ought to step in to prevent employers from incurring if employers know their own business and who they need to run that business in their last years.

The biggest cost to industry is the lack of mobility of top people, imposed by the Inland Revenue rules which restrict transferability. Transferability, particularly at the top end of the management scale, is being restricted by the Treasury in the name of saving industry from itself and saving employers from incurring too much expense in the way of "golden hellos". If industry needs a particular man, it should not be inhibited from negotiating the change of job of that person. I really think that my right hon. Friend the Minister must look at this again. I am quite certain that he will receive the very strongest representations from personnel directors and managing directors of large firms who need mobility of labour to carry forward their plans.

My right hon. Friend has drawn attention, as he did on Second Reading, to the fact that there are really outrageous schemes being contemplated which are intended to exploit the tax-free lump sum option. There are other ways besides what the Inland Revenue proposes to the Committee today to tackle these extreme and outrageous exploitations of schemes. There could be an upper limit on contributions insofar as they qualify for lump sums which would restrict plainly outrageous and unacceptable projects without doing the damage which will be done if the Government are not prepared to accept an amendment on the lines of the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) or myself.

I trust that my right hon. Friend will be willing to listen to this point. Certainly I, and I am sure that other hon. Members, have had the very strongest representations. Industry does not wish to be saved from itself in the negotiation of final salaries and conditions for top people. Employers know what they are doing when they are trying to get first-class people to help them in their work and the movement of people between jobs ought not deliberately to be impeded by the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My hon. Friend has made his case strongly, as he always does. However, he knows very well that requiring schemes to provide transfer values on this improved basis would impose substantial cost on industry. My hon. Friend has said that I should not save employers from themselves as employers do not want that. I assure him that substantial costs would be imposed on industry.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington is aware that the report from the Occupational Pensions Board in 1981 made limited recommendations, about which I know that my hon. Friend is extremely critical. Even those limited recommendations caused some worry to the industry and to the OPB. The board was concerned about what it was adding in terms of additional costs to industry.

I should make it clear that this whole area is primarily a matter for the DHSS, not the Revenue. My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington wishes to use tax approval and the tax rules in a rather different way from the way they are used at the moment. I am not in any way criticising that. However, he expects me to reply in a rather different way on a subject that is a matter for the DHSS. I shall certainly talk to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services about this. However, I do not want to mislead my hon. Friend the member for Kensington or the Committee in any way. I will not come back on Report with an amendment accepting this.

I have a lot of sympathy with the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington. I have total sympathy with what my hon. Friend is trying to achieve. I know that I have to say that on many occasions in respect of the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington, but I mean that genuinely and sincerely. However, he is trying to reform the whole pensions world, which has had many upheavals in recent years. Indeed, it has a lot to digest as a result of the Budget. My hon. Friend is trying to totally reform and bring to a culmination his long-standing campaign and I cannot at this stage in the Finance Bill reform the whole pensions world immediately as he would wish.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington knows that I and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services have willingly offered to go into these matters with him. We want to see improvements. My hon. Friend is right. We have not solved or dealt with the problem of transferability. Although preserved benefit changes, transfer values and other things introduced in the Budget have improved the situation, it is not right yet. My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington is 100 per cent. right. We need further improvements in that area.

The amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington is the same as that tabled by the hon. Member for Sedgefield. I cannot accept that for the reasons that I have given. With respect to the first set of amendments, although I know that this will disappoint my hon. Friends, I think that through the mechanism of the employers' contributions and the inter-action with the lump sum there have been some very large contributions made. The revised accrual rates when combined with some of the other things that we have done to encourage mobility will not noticeably worsen the position. However, we are very concerned about the mobility problem as is my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: As usual, my right hon. Friend the Minister has been speaking in a very accommodating and perceptive way. I think that I have made some progress in opening up this subject together with other hon. Members who have spoken on both sides of the House.

If there is a defect in the drafting of my proposal which has made it obligatory on the receiving employer to take on board an overwhelming obligation which perhaps would not be covered by the amount of the transfer fund that the employee was able to bring with him, that is a fault of mine. I hope that my right hon. Friend would be willing to consider on Report an amendment which did not carry this obligatory character which he seems to read into what I have proposed.

I should like to see something which is at any rate permissive so that the possibility of negotiated transfers at the top level in industry is not damaged by the Inland Revenue's provisions. With that thought, I do not wish to press the matter further. I leave it to those who have proposed other related amendments to decide whether they wish to take the matter further.

6 pm

Mr. Watts: Having listened to my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, I am even more convinced now that the approach that has been adopted is misconceived. My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) has dealt with the misconception that there will be an imposition of costs on industry. I cannot see that the existing regime, or the modified proposals advanced by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) and supported by my hon. Friend, impose a cost on industry. That is because there is discretion. The changes that my right hon. Friend proposes will deny companies the opportunity of having a scheme that allows for a faster accrual than 20 years and will not allow account to be taken of service with any other employer.

I accept that there may be a problem with excessive contributions by employers—my right hon. Friend cited contribution rates of up to 150 per cent. of salary, which must be an abuse — but it seems that my right hon. Friend has chosen to tackle the problem in an inappropriate way. As my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington has said, the way to tackle excessive levels of contribution is to have some control over employers' contributions into schemes. I am still convinced that the Government's approach will prove to be a major disincentive to labour mobility, and I consider it to be entirely misconceived.

I might be more willing to be persuaded by the arguments advanced by my right hon. Friend if I believed that an Inland Revenue official who moved to another Government Department at the age of 45 or 50 would face the prospect of not being able to accrue a maximum pension over the remaining 10 or 15 years of service. However, we know that that is not the position. We are discussing rules that have been drafted by those who will not be subject to them, and rules that will operate to the disadvantage of the majority of those working in the private sector.

I recognise that my right hon. Friend is not prepared to concede now or on Report, but I shall not seek to press my amendment to a Division because I do not think that that would be a constructive course. I am convinced that we shall have to return to this matter when we discuss a future Finance Bill. The regime which the provisions before us will introduce will be so chaotic and disruptive to the interests of industry that that will be necessary.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Watts: I beg to move amendment No. 72, in page 82, line 15, leave out paragraph 24 and insert—

'24.—(1) This paragraph applies where—

(a) an employee who is a member of a retirement benefits scheme approved by the Board before 17th March 1987 retires on or after that date, and

(b) the rules of the scheme make provision for the payment by employees of voluntary contributions.

(2) Any rules of the scheme imposing a limit on the amount of a benefit provided for the employee shall have effect without regard to the amount of any additional benefits provided for the employee by any such voluntary contributions.'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 9, in page 82, line 15, leave out paragraph 24.

No. 73, in page 82, line 30, leave out from ' effect' to third 'the' in line 31 and insert 'without regard to'.

Mr. Watts: The effect of amendments Nos. 72 and 73 is to delete paragraph 24, which prevents additional voluntary contributions from being commuted. As we have an overall limitation on the amount of lump sums, it seems unnecessary to prevent part of the benefits that accrue from an AVC scheme from being commuted, provided that the lump sum comes within the overall limitation to which we have already addressed ourselves.

Secondly, the amendment ensures that members of existing schemes who retire on or after 17 March 1987 will not be subject to any limitations on the benefits which they derive from their voluntary contributions. My right hon. Friend will be aware from correspondence that has passed between us of a problem faced by a major company in my constituency that has arisen because its AVC scheme has performed too well. It is accumulating surpluses that cannot be paid out to the pensioners who made contributions initially because of the two thirds limitation on total benefit that can be withdrawn. There is no way in which the contributions can be refunded. It seems almost morally wrong that, having paid contributions over many years, members of an AVC scheme should not be allowed to draw part of the benefits to which they have contributed.

As my right hon. Friend said during an earlier debate, there must be some calculation of the likely benefits from the main scheme and the extent to which there is scope for them to be topped up by additional voluntary contributions, but those calculations can never be precise when one is looking forward 10, 15, 20 or 30 years to retirement. We already have a formidable array of controls that restrict the level of contributions into schemes — I understand that my right hon. Friend is not prepared to accept during our consideration of the Bill that that should be the only restriction on pension schemes in general — and it seems that it would be a modest step to accept that no such limitation should apply to AVC schemes, so the benefits that derive from contributions go to those who made the contributions when they become pensioners.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) has said, such limitations cannot apply to money purchase schemes because of their different nature. It seems unfortunate that there should be discrimination and that we can have funds locked into a scheme that cannot be used for the benefit of anyone.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): I support the argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts). I tabled an amendment similar to that which he has moved.

We all welcome the fact that an employee who is a member of an occupational pension scheme can top up his pension with additional voluntary contributions, and I cannot see why AVCs should not be included in computations. I shall be interested to hear what my right hon. Friend the Minister has to say about that. There should not be two or three different types of pensioner.

The restriction that we are discussing applies to AVCs but not to occupational pension schemes or public sector schemes. If it is the Government's policy to increase the number of private pension schemes and to encourage their growth — that is a policy with which I go along — one way of pursuing it is through AVC schemes.

Mr. Archie Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I support the argument that has been advanced by the hon. Member for Slough (Mr. Watts). The principle behind it is well worth supporting. I await with interest the Minister's justification for resisting the amendment, if that it be. Is there any way in which the Government can quantify the consequences of accepting the amendment? I think that its acceptance would lead to a considerable enhancement of the value of additional voluntary contributions. I can see no reason of principle for resisting the amendment. As I have said, the effect of the amendment would be to enhance the potential of AVC schemes in future. I add my voice to this cross-party appeal.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My hon. Friends the Members for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) and for Slough (Mr. Watts) have advocated both that the benefit limits should not apply on the free-standing AVCs as regards members of occupational pension schemes. Earlier, when my hon. Friends the Member for Kensington and for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) spoke, I made the distinction between personal pensions and AVCs. I do not think that I need repeat all that again. The Committee has heard my views and has at least understood them, even if they were not entirely welcomed.

The purpose of AVCs is to increase pension provision, and that is why we have brought about the free-standing AVC. In fact, that is the purpose of both in-scheme and free-standing AVCs. The schemes attract very generous tax relief, and we feel that their purpose should be to make up for deficiencies, perhaps the sort of problems that we discussed in relation to the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington. We do not consider it right that the additional voluntary contribution, with its generous tax reliefs, should be used simply for the lump-sum benefit.

This is essentially the same argument that we had before. I detect that many of my hon. Friends are very attached to the notion of the lump sum; we view it with some reservation. As we have said, we intend no changes, but when we introduced the concept of the free-standing AVC and the additional tax reliefs, we did not consider that that should be commuted to a lump sum. That was the simple reason for the restriction.

Having made the change on the free-standing AVC, we felt that it was logical to make the same change in respect of the in-scheme AVC, if the free-standing AVC was to be marketed and if people were to use the choice of investment managers outside. The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) said earlier that he did not think anyone would take up the free-standing AVCs, and we thought that it was extremely important that they should be established on the same basis.

Mr. Watts: I understand my right hon. Friend's desire to achieve parity of treatment between free-standing and in-company AVC schemes, but, in doing so, he creates another disparity. Let us consider two different company schemes. In one the employee is able to contribute 10 per cent. to his pension, and to commute part of the pension into a lump sum. Another employee with a less good company scheme in which he makes a payment of 5 or 6 per cent. might want to achieve parity with his neighbour by paying 4 per cent. into an AVC scheme, but he will be able to commute only from a much worse pension provision. In trying to create parity in one area, my right hon. Friend seems to be creating an injustice in another.

My right hon. Friend would be wrong to think that I have any particular attachment to lump sums. I have long recognised that they are the probably biggest anomaly left in pension provisions in that they have tax relief when money is contributed to the scheme, but no tax is paid when money comes out. I should understand if the suggestion by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington —that lump sums should be subject to tax or abolished —were taken up. But, if they are to exist, I can see no logical reason for imposing a restriction on AVC schemes that does not apply to other schemes.

Mr. Lamont: We have enlarged pensions provision and have allowed a new instrument to come into being. We think that that ought to be for the purpose of providing pensions, not cash-free lump sums. If any hon. Member is implying that there will be a tremendous restriction on the lump sum benefit which, of course, has been at the centre of considerable controversy in regard to pensions my hon. Friend has, in a sense, answered that. The person with an AVC and membership of an occupational pension scheme will be able to take more of his pension out of the AVC, and commute more of the pension into the lump sum within the occupational pension scheme. I do not think that that will have a disastrous effect on the lump sum availability. We simply did not consider it right to allow money to be commuted into the lump sum which is taken out tax free.

6.15 pm

I stress the tax deduction into the fund and the tax-free status when the benefit is paid out. That is a generous concession. We see the free-standing AVC as designed primarily to remedy the deficiency of people's earnings in retirement. The purpose is to provide pensions, not to be yet another addition to the lump sum provision. That is the rationale behind the measure.

I take my hon. Friend's point that I may have created a level playing field here and a bump elsewhere, but I think I have explained our decision adequately.

Mr. Watts: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Sir William Clark: I beg to move amendment No 10, in page 82, line 39, at end add—

'(3) An employee shall be treated for the purposes of this part of this Schedule above as a member of the scheme therein referred to before 17th March 1987 if—

(a) he was before that date a member of a scheme approved by the Inland Revenue;

(b) the company which employed him, or the group of companies of which his employing company was a member, was acquired by another company which operates a scheme approved by the Inland Revenue; and

(c) as a consequence of that acquisition the employee's membership of the scheme referred to in (a) above was terminated and he became, after 16th March 1987, a member of the scheme referred to in (b).'.

I do not think that I need detain the Committee for long, as this is merely a probing amendment. I hope that my right hon. Friend will tell me that I am wrong, but, as I read the schedule, it does not allow the employee to preserve his pre-1987 rights. I should like an assurance that, in the event of a takeover, when the pension arrangements may change, the employee will retain his pre-1987 rights.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I entirely sympathise with what my hon. Friend has said, and I am happy to assure him that his amendment is unnecessary. I can spell it out for him if he likes. I fully accept that it would be unfair to regard people joining a pension scheme on or after 17 March as new members for the purpose of the legislation, which is what is bothering my hon. Friend. The amendment deals with one such circumstance, in which the pension scheme is reconstructed following a takeover or merger. Of course, there are many other circumstances which the amendment does not cover for example, when an employee moves from one scheme to another, perhaps on promotion, or to a scheme established by another employer in the same group.

There has been concern over these issues, and the Inland Revenue has published a draft memorandum that set out the proposed transitional arrangements in some detail. The document was warmly welcomed by the pensions industry, and has now been revised in the light of comments that have been received. Copies have been placed in the Library. In due course, these transitional provisions will be contained in regulations made by virtue of paragraph 18(2) of this schedule. I am advised that my hon. Friend's amendment is unnecessary and that its effect would be narrower than the regulations that we intend to make. Therefore, I hope that my hon. Friend will feel able to withdraw his amendment.

Sir William Clark: After such a categoric assurance that my amendment is unnecessary and that its purpose is already provided for in the Bill and in the regulations, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave withdrawn.

Question proposed, That this schedule be the Third Schedule to the Bill.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I am concerned about the fact that paragraph 22 of this schedule appears to have a retrospective character. That point has not yet been raised. The Inland Revenue is seeking to take powers over a scheme with different rules and to use those powers in such a way that the expectations of a member of the scheme who is nearing retirement will prove to have been ill founded because of the proposed change in the law. I do not know to what extent that is significant, but we should never contemplate retrospective legislation without very careful consideration and examination if the result would be that individuals would suffer unexpectedly. That appears to be a blot on the schedule.

My right hon. Friend has done his best to persuade the Committee that it is in the general interest that the Bill should contain this schedule, but in my view it contains undesirable provisions and the Committee ought not to allow it to remain part of the Bill.

Mr. Norman Lamont: On the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) about retrospection, new members of occupational schemes will be subject to the new rules for final remuneration, but existing contractual arrangements are not affected. The proposed changes are intended to curb misuse of the present definition of "final remuneration" by high earners in order to inflate artificially the pensions figure — in particular, the tax free lump sum. In paragraph 4 there are special transitional provisions for non-controlling directors with salaries over £100,000 who retire between now and 6 April 1991. Changes in final remuneration apply only to relatively high earners. The vast majority of pension scheme members who have no opportunity to use the scheme will not be affected.

I shall look at my hon. Friend's point and see whether there is anything that I should add to it on Report. I think that my hon. Friend's concern is misplaced, but if it is not, I shall so report to the House.

As for my hon. Friend's other points on schedule 3, I cannot add to the many debates that we have held on the subject. My hon. Friend has a very clear view of what he wants for pensioners.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: As the Member of Parliament for Kensington, part of my work in the House is to speak for the relatively high earners in my constituency. My right hon. Friend points out that paragraph 22 is aimed at the relatively high earners, so I have done my best to speak for those of my constituents who are relatively high earners. There are also very low earners and people in Kensington who have no income and when it is appropriate to do so I speak for them, too.

I am reassured by my right hon. Friend's undertaking to consider whether the paragraph has a retrospective effect. If it does, I rely on him to make the necessary changes. He has confirmed once again that what we are hunting is the tax free lump sum. There is no need again to go over my remedy for that. I am reassured about the possible significance of paragraph 22, but I am still unhappy about the schedule's major provisions. I hope that the Committee feels that it would be better if the schedule were omitted.

Schedule 3 agreed to.

Clause 59 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 60

Payments of Interest etc. Between Related Companies

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: I am wondering whether I have correctly understood the effect of Clause 60. I understand that it is an anti-avoidance provision. It relates to companies that are in a group—normally banks. An avoidance scheme would allow the tax liability of the group to be deferred for a year. Will the Minister confirm that the purpose of the clause is to close that loophole?

The Paymaster General (Mr. Peter Brooke): I confirm that the purpose of Clause 60 is anti-avoidance and that it is intended to secure the objective that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 60 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 61 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 62

United Kingdom Members of Partnerships Controlled Abroad

Mr. Blair: I beg to move amendment No. 66, in page 32, line 1, leave out sub-section (2) and add —

'This section has effect with respect to years of assessment beginning on or after 6th April 1987'.

Clause 62 has fairly limited application and may seem to be a little esoteric, but it contains an important principle that the Committee ought to examine. I should be obliged if the Minister would confirm that clause 62 arises out of a court decision by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue against Padmore. It concerned a double taxation agreement between the United Kingdom and Jersey. It was held that, contrary to what had been supposed, the United Kingdom resident partner of a Jersey resident partnership was exempt from United Kingdom tax under the double taxation treaties. That was not supposed to be the effect of the legislation. Therefore, clause 62 is before us and reverses the decision in Padmore. It ensures that the United Kingdom resident partner of a Jersey resident partnership is no longer exempt.

We agreed that that loophole should be closed. However, the issue of principle to which clause 62 gives rise is that of retrospective legislation. Before clause 62 is passed, it is important that we should have firm assurances from the Minister and the Treasury about it.

Parliament should oppose retrospective legislation, for a number of reasons. The principal democratic reason is that people are perfectly entitled to do whatever the law permits them to do and that it is wrong afterwards to make it unlawful. The effect of the Padmore case was not intended by the Inland Revenue and the legislature. If people are able to do something that the Government do not wish them to do, it is their democratic right to go to law to have their rights properly assessed. If the courts find in their favour, as a matter of principle it is wrong that they should be deprived of the benefit of that decision. To introduce legislation to tighten up the future position is understandable, but it would not be understandable if the effect of a court decision were rendered nugatory. But that is what is happening.

It is important to consider the relationship between Parliament and the courts. Of course, Parliament is supreme and can do whatever it wishes, but the basic principle upon which people operate in our society is that they are entitled to take legislation at its face value, as determined by a court, for the time being. This clause would mean that those who have been doing that which they are perfectly entitled to do, as a court has found, will now have illegality visited upon them as a result of retrospective legislation.

6.30 pm

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I have been following the hon. Gentleman's argument closely. I think that he said a moment ago that clause 62 would render nugatory the decision of that court case. However, is it not true, when considering subsection (2), that that decision would stand so far as any particular taxpayer was concerned, and that in effect there would be two classes of taxpayer — those whose cases have been determined and those whose cases were outstanding, where an appeal was pending? There would also be those who might otherwise have been able to take advantage of the change. Is not that unfair?

Mr. Blair: The hon. Gentleman's point is absolutely correct. When I said that the effect of the decision would be rendered nugatory, I should have said more precisely that that would be the effect as it applied to anyone other than the litigants. The curiosity about clause 62 is that subsection (2) appears to leave out of the retrospection those people who are engaged in litigation, but includes everybody else. That is a most peculiar provision to enact. As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, it would mean two different classes of people, those who happen to have been before the court to argue their cases, and those who have not.

It would require something persuasive from the Financial Secretary to convince my hon. Friends and me to pass legislation that seems shot through with anomalies and offends a basic principle of our constitution.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) is absolutely right to identify this as an important clause that we should consider. I assure the Committee that, even if no other hon. Member had risen on this point, I should have got to my feet to make the meaning of the clause absolutely plain to the Committee because it has caused me considerable concern and we have not come to the decision that we have without much careful consideration.

As the hon. Member for Sedgefield said, the purpose of clause 62 is to restore the general understanding of the law to what it was before a decision of the High Court last December in a case involving foreign partnerships. That case was Padmore v. the Commissioners of the Inland Revenue. Briefly, the facts of that case are that the High Court ruled that a United Kingdom resident partner in a foreign partnership was not liable to United Kingdom taxation on his share of the profits of the partnership because of the interaction of the Jersey double taxation agreement with United Kingdom domestic law. However, similar decisions might well have been made in the case of several of our double taxation agreements.

I have said that the purpose of the clause is to restore the general understanding of the law. One crucial point, which the hon. Member for Sedgefield made fairly and rightly, is that what the Inland Revenue understands to be the law is not necessarily what is widely accepted to be the law. Obviously, that consideration has weighed in my mind. I am aware that some people questioned the general understanding of the law before that case. However, I believe that the phrase that I have used is, none the less, a fair statement of the position. Butterworth, for example, described it as the widely accepted view, and the journal Taxation described the decision as surprising.

The Revenue tells me that few taxpayers claimed exemption before that court decision. It is estimated that more than 15,000 foreign partners could have claimed exemption, whereas to the best of the Revenue's knowledge, only three partnerships have done so. I stress that the double taxation agreement has been in existence since 1952. Therefore, during that period a large number of an admittedly restricted class of person — partners in foreign partnerships — have accepted the position and paid tax accordingly.

The Government have come to the conclusion that the law should be restored to what it was accepted to be before the High Court decision. As the professional press has pointed out, leaving the clause unamended would lead to loopholes that would be much exploited. However, I appreciate that that is not the Committee's main concern.

I appreciate also how sensitive a matter retrospection is. I assure the Committee that we did not propose lightly retrospection in this instance. We touched on this matter in the debates on last year's Finance Bill. The type of retrospection on which the House has normally looked with disfavour is where the law is changed retrospectively so that people find themselves faced with unexpected and unprovided for tax liabilities for past years. In this instance, retrospection is somewhat different.

As the law now stands, after the High Court decision, a partner in a foreign partnership who has paid tax on the partnership profits in the normal way could obtain an entirely unexpected benefit in the form of recovery of tax for the previous six years. Thereafter, the purpose of retrospection in this clause is to prevent taxpayers from obtaining such a windfall tax advantage. It is not to inflict an unexpected tax charge on the unwary. I am sure that the House will want to think about the distinction that I have drawn between the different types of retrospection.

I have absolutely no wish to misrepresent the hon. Member for Sedgefield. However, last year in the debate on section 49 of the Finance Bill he drew that very distinction when he referred to the possibility of companies being able to take advantage retrospectively of the decision in the case of Collard v. Mining Industrial Holdings Ltd. as unsatisfactory. As I had just appeared as Financial Secretary, I can recall that the hon. Gentleman drew that distinction. It caused me a little difficulty at the time.

However, in proposing retrospective action in this case, the Government felt that with £100 million at stake over the six-year period during which claims could have been made we must therefore look to the interests of the general body of taxpayers on whom this expenditure would fall, rather than to a special class of taxpayers, to most of whom this tax refund would come as a complete surprise.

The Government are not suggesting that this should be a precedent for all time, but it seemed right in this case. Indeed, I should point out that there are such precedents. In 1971, the Government introduced legislation to claw back tax relief following an increase in family allowances. That happened after a court decision exactly the same circumstance as here. In 1976, there was a provision involving the effect of advance corporation tax on preference dividends. In both cases—the purpose of the legislation was to reverse the consequences of a High Court decision and in both cases, that took the form of deeming the change in the law always to have had effect for the reasons that I have given.

The Government are proposing, not to overturn the decision of the High Court in the case of the particular taxpayer involved, but to protect the taxpayer involved from the legislation. If the case goes to a higher court, the proposed legislation would enable the case to be decided there on the basis of the law as it was before the legislation. That is why the legislation is framed as it is. Our altering the law will not affect the outcome of the case and the case will still be determined by the courts.

Mr. Blair: I want to make sure that I have understood that. I find subsection (2) a little difficult to understand. Once the clause is passed into law I cannot see how the appellate court can find in favour of the taxpayer unless that taxpayer is put in a unique category and is uniquely entitled to this unexpected tax relief.

Mr. Lamont: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the legislation has been drafted precisely as I have described so that it will still be possible for the court to decide on the basis of the law as it was before this legislation. Perhaps if I can pinpoint the precise words for the hon. Gentleman later, I shall do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) said that we were making two classes of taxpayer and that the law was being applied differentially. That has been our choice. We do not wish to deprive the individual taxpayer who has taken this matter to the courts of the benefit of going to the courts. He has challenged the view. We believe that it is widely accepted that this is a technical deficiency in the law which will give an uncovenanted benefit at considerable cost to the public purse to a category of people who were not expecting it. We think it would be wrong to deprive the person who has taken the matter to the court of the consequences of the court's decision if he is successful. I cannot deny that that throws up the dilemma that my hon. Friend has described, but we decided that that was the price to pay for accommodating the taxpayer involved.

The legislation is retrospective, and no one likes retrospective legislation. I have tried to explain why the position has arisen, how it has arisen in other circumstances previously and how we must balance several sets of factors in this case. We believe that it is right that £100 million of tax should not be repaid to a small number of taxpayers to whom the court decision would have come as a surprise. In this case we feel we must consult the interests of the general body of taxpayers who would otherwise have to foot the bill for such a windfall.

This is in no sense a precedent for introducing in future legislation which is usually thought of as retrospective legislation, that is legislation involving people suddenly facing unexpected tax demands for past years. This legislation falls firmly in that category. In general the United Kingdom tax system seeks to tax all income arising in the United Kingdom, no matter to whom it belongs, and all income arising outside the United Kingdom belonging to persons resident in the United Kingdom. It follows that someone resident in the United Kingdom is normally taxable on all his income, no matter where it arises—that is, he will be taxable on his worldwide income. There is no good reason why a United Kingdom resident who is a member of a Jersey partnership or an overseas partnership should enjoy some special advantage over his fellow United Kingdom taxpayers by being excluded from the general scope of United Kingdom taxation.

Mr. Tim Smith: My right hon. Friend may well be right about the substance of the clause, but the question of retrospection is exercising the Committee.

I understand the distinction that my right hon. Friend sought to make. I have various diktats on retrospection and they were designed for the artificial tax avoidance schemes that were common in the mid and late 1970s. It was always said that some warning must be given to taxpayers and that the earliest date at which legislation could be retrospective was the date of announcement of a change in the law by the Inland Revenue or the Government.

6.45 pm

In 1958 Mr. Heathcoat-Amory, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, said:

"In my opinion, one essential pre-requisite, if retrospective legislation is to be used, is that those concerned should have every reason to be aware of the taxation consequencues of their specific actions and, therefore, have a chance of avoiding it if they wish."—[Official Report, 18 June 1958; Vol. 589, c. 1132.]

My right hon. Friend said that previously there was no doubt about the law. The Inland Revenue press release published on 17 March refers to the "general understanding of the law" and implies that there was not any uncertainty. But there must have been sufficient uncertainty for a taxpayer to challenge it and to think that there was a reasonable chance of persuading the commissioners that he had a case. There must have been that amount of uncertainty. Therefore, there was a degree of uncertainty, although the Revenue's description of the previous law was that there was a general understanding about it.

A constituent of mine, Mr. I. D. Barnett, who, I am sure, has no personal axe to grind, wrote to me in a personal capacity, although I know he is a tax advisor to one of our major industrial companies. This whole question turns on whether there was a general understanding of the law. My constituent writes that the statement in the press release

"is a considerable overstatement, to put it at best. It may have been the Revenue's understanding but it was not so generally accepted. We know this because much tax advice was given on the basis that was later established by the case itself to be correct: but there were other cases besides Padmore which had been left pending its outcome. Even if the Revenue were correct, would it justify making the proposed change? It would not, in my view."

Clearly, my constituent is not in any doubt about the matter.

My right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary quoted from a couple of learned journals on the subject. I do not know the answer to this question or the extent to which there was a general understanding of the law. My constituent tells me that it was not merely being challenged by Mr. Padmore, but by other taxpayers who were perhaps awaiting the outcome of the Padmore case. Therefore, we are in real difficulty here.

Perhaps it would be wrong to ask my right hon. Friend how much tax is at stake. It may be a substantial sum and perhaps we should know how much it is. An important principle is at stake and it is important that we understand what we will do if we agree to the clause.

Mr. Blair: First, I congratulate the Financial Secretary's researcher who dug out my speech last year when I was justifying an opposite proposition. That only shows that one should not serve on too many Finance Bills.

I understand the right hon. Gentleman's point. To summarise it, no principle is immutable. That should appeal to politicians. If large sums are at stake — the Financial Secretary gave the figure of £100 million — we may look more favourably on retrospection than we would otherwise. I have some sympathy with that. But I need to be persuaded on some points. I must be sure that I understood the Financial Secretary correctly when he said that potentially 15,000 people could claim this exemption. In other words, if this legislation was not retrospective, there would be a potential of 15,000 foreign partners who could claim the exemption backdated to 1952. That would obviously be very serious. The Minister said that only three people had attempted to claim the exemption. That does not seem to correspond with the information of the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), although if it is so it strengthens his hand.

There are still two difficulties outstanding. First, it is not at all clear to me that this was a universal understanding of the law. In a sense, that was shown by the fact that the case was taken to the court. Secondly, I am still troubled by the meaning of subsection (2) and I am not at all sure that it will have the effect that the Minister intends it to have. Presumably, he wishes to leave Mr. Padmore as the unique beneficiary of the tax exemption and so that he will claim exemptions where others cannot. I find that method of proceeding a little difficult to understand. Presumably, once this case got off the ground there were people hanging fire and waiting to see what happened. What will be the test? Do those people have to have initiated proceedings or consulted lawyers? Are not all the others to be rewarded in a similar way?

I am not sure that subsection (2) simply restricts the benefits of this tax exemption to Mr. Padmore. It says:

"Nothing in subsection (1) above affects . . .

a) the determination of any Commissioners or the judgment of any court made . . . or

b) the law to be applied in proceedings on appeal to the Court of Appeal."

Without greater definition that leaves things in a complex mess. The decisions of the High Court are precedents and when appeal proceedings are taken and the appeal court gives its rulings, those are precedents too. They are not decisions that affect individual cases alone. The Minister should ask his advisers again whether subsection (2) would limit the decision to Mr. Padmore. It would be strange if the clause left one taxpayer in a unique position. I do not know whether that has ever been done before or whether a taxpayer, through foresight, courage or luck has taken the Revenue to court and won, thus being left as the sole beneficiary of the loophole that he has discovered. If that has not happened, I am unhappy about the provision. The Minister should look at it again.

I have put the point about the principle of retrospection and I shall be obliged if the Minister will deal with it. If he is sufficiently persuasive, I am prepared to revert to my position of last year, but with regard to subsection (2), it seems that there are serious problems which have not been given the fullest consideration.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): I appreciate the Government's predicament. There are two questions of principle here. The first is retrospection, and I think that most people with Conservative principles abhor retrospective legislation. The other important point of principle was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) and by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). It is that taxpayers expect equality before the law. It has been suggested that we are to have two classes of taxpayer — Mr. Padmore and the rest — although from my reading of the clause its effects will be rather wider. However, this provision constitutes an important breach of a principle which is also breached in a later clause. Is this the first occasion on which the principle that all taxpayers have equal rights before the law has been breached, or are there precedents? Like my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Sedgefield I am unhappy about this, although I can well appreciate why the Government do not want 15,000 people to be able to claim all the tax that they have paid over a period of six years. Most of us agree that it is not right that people who are not resident in this country should not contribute to it in the form of taxes. While I appreciate the Government's problem, important issues of principle are involved, which have not been satisfactorily answered.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): The Government should think more deeply about this. In essence, the Revenue is adopting the new tactic of saying, "Heads we win in the courts and tails you lose in the Finance Bill" in order to enforce its private and unpublicised view of the law. That is like moving the goal posts when the ball has been kicked through them and the referee has signalled a goal, and we should not be doing that sort of thing. It seems to go against the generally understood view of fair taxation, and against constitutional propriety and natural justice.

The taxpayers' charter, issued by the Revenue in July 1986 talked about fairness and retrospection and, on fairness, it said:

[Mr. Michael Grylls]

"You will have your liability decided impartially and be required to pay only the amount of tax properly due according to the law; you will be treated in the same way as other taxpayers in similar circumstances."

That is not happening with regard to Mr. Padmore.

The normal presumption against restrospection has been breached in the past only in the taxpayer's favour —which, if fair enough—or to correct undisputed errors and omissions in drafting, and most people would understand that.

If the business world is to plan its affairs and its investments, it is crucial that it should know where it stands—subject, of course, only to the future decisions of the courts—when it enters into a transaction or a business decision. The business world is put in a very difficult position and cannot organise its affairs if it does not know where it stands.

I ask my right hon. Friend to bear in mind the points that I have made, because we should think carefully about this matter.

Mr. Tim Smith: My question is supplementary to the question asked by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) about subsection (2). The hon. Gentleman asked whether there were precedents.

Clauses 71 and 80 also have retrospective effects and clause 80(2) contains a similar provision to clause 62(2)(a) but it does not include a reference to proceedings on appeal. It simply states:

"Nothing in subsection (1) above affects the determination of any Commissioners or the judgment of any court made or given before 14 May 1987".

It does not then refer to the law to be applied on appeal. Is that because the Inland Revenue does not intend to appeal? Why is there different treatment in each of the three different clauses?

Mr. Norman Lamont: I hope that the Committee realise that I have not reached my conclusion easily or that I do not share the very considerable concern about this extremely serious matter. I have tried to outline the precedents. Sometimes, Governments, whether Conservative or Labour Governments have concluded that a court case has produced a result that has gone against the widely accepted view—not just the Inland Revenue view—of the law and have decided to reverse it, precisely as we propose to reverse it on this occasion.

The Government have exempted the person who took the matter to court. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) and the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) have asked whether there is a precedent for exempting a person who takes such a matter to court and the answer is, unambiguously, yes. That happened with the cases in 1971 and 1976.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) is correct in saying that that leaves us in the uncomfortable position that the law is being applied specially for one person. We have taken that action with our eyes open and for one specific purpose. It is not our intention to negate the role of the courts or in any way to frustrate the right of the taxpayer to take something to court. We certainly do not want to be in the position, as described by my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington, of simply overturning the decisions of the courts because it meets the convenience of the Inland Revenue.

7 pm

We have had other instances when large sums of money have been at stake. This matter centres on two elements of judgment. First, was it "widely accepted" by people outside the Inland Revenue that the law was as it was thought to be? Secondly there is a judgment to be made on the sorts of sums of money that were at stake. With regard to the two previous cases I do not believe that there is any doubt that substantial sums of money were likely to come as a windfall benefit to many taxpayers who had not expected that.

I anticipate that people will ask whether £100 million is a large sum of money. They will ask the significance of £100 million in relation to 15,000 partners of a Jersey firm. In one sense that sum is not large, but when concentrated on a limited class of people it is. It would be unrealistic and dishonest to pretend that the sum of money involved was not part of the consideration and subsequent judgment.

Mr. Grylls: Is it not the case that others besides Mr. Padmore have already won their cases in front of the Special Commissioners? Therefore, in a sense the decision of Padmore was not a freak one. However, others are to be denied the relief that will be allowed to Mr. Padmore.

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend is not correct and it would be extremely serious if that were the case.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield said that he thought that there had been a number of cases that had been left open. However, I am aware of only three cases where the matter has not been resolved.

I have never said that the view of the law was unanimous — indeed, unanimity hardly ever exists. However, do we have an instance where the view of the law was or was not widely accepted? I have listened with great care to what has been said and I will read the report of those speeches to see whether there is anything to challenge the conclusion that I have reached. I know of three cases. I quoted what various authorities have said. Those views do not close the matter nor end the argument. However, it must be significant that people with such a knowledge of the law took the same view and appeared to believe that the decision that we have reached is not entirely surprising.

Mr. Blair: If there are another three cases in train will they be treated in the same way as Mr. Padmore?

Mr. Lamont: No, they will not. The people concerned have not taken the matter to court. The other partners of Mr. Padmore will obviously benefit if the case is successful, but others who have not taken the matter to court will not benefit.

Mr. John Townend: Does my right hon. Friend agree that if the other three cases are not proceeded with while the Padmore case is resolved—the decision on that case given as the reason for not proceeding with the others—it is unfair that they should not be included in subsection (2) with Padmore?

Mr. Lamont: My hon. Friend is right and I am sorry if I misled the Committee. They will be treated in the same way as Padmore.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield has made some good and telling points—he always does in Committee—but I do not think it is relevant in this debate to say that, because someone takes something to court that means that the view of the law is not widely accepted. I am sure that, on reflection, the hon. Gentleman will consider that that is not the best argument to employ.

Even if a person does take a matter to court and even if there are two or three other people waiting to take the matter to court I believe that it is still possible, in a matter of this kind when substantial sums of money are at stake and when the law is "widely accepted," to come to the conclusion that the Government must reach their decision on the same basis as previous Governments.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): If the Government had not thought that the case before the commissioners had brought forward a surprising result and that the law had not been "widely accepted" would they have proceeded in this way? I do not know what was "widely held" as regards this section of the Bill, but if the Government adopt the same argument with regard to clause 80 they will be in a substantial amount of trouble.

Mr. Lamont: I do not want to comment on clause 80. We shall have a separate debate on clause 80. Each of the cases should be considered on its merits.

I have done my best to explain to the Committee that the different factors must be balanced in this instance. I reached my conclusion with extreme reluctance. I think that the officials of the Inland Revenue would confirm that I did not believe that this matter was a bunch of roses. I do not like doing this, but I am convinced that, balancing everything, the conclusion I have reached is inevitable. I believe that it is comforting that there are precedents for the Government's decision. Nevertheless we should consider the matter carefully. I am firmly against retrospective legislation, but in this instance I believe there are compelling arguments in favour.

Mr. Blair: I believe that the right hon. Gentleman has put as good a case as possible in defence of the retrospection within this clause. I echo the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) that those arguments may not apply to later clauses.

In essence, what the right hon. Gentleman has said is fair. It would be an extremely expensive demonstration of principle if we decided that £100 million could be sniffed at. I am not prepared to take that liberty. However, I can think of many ways in which I would prefer to spend £100 million than on foreign Jersey partnerships. My hon. Friends would be appalled if I took a different view. I believe that it was right for us to raise the question of retrospection. It is always right to do so in case we become lax about things over which we should be strict.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 62 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 63

LIMITATION OF GROUP RELIEF IN RELATION TO CERTAIN DUAL RESIDENT COMPANIES

Sir William Clark: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 32, line 15, at end insert —

'Provided that this subsection shall not apply where the loss arises from carrying on a trade on a commercial basis with a view to profit or where the relevant amount is a charge on income, which may be surrendered in accordance with section 259(6), and is either incurred for the purposes of the trade carried on by the surrendering company or is only available for surrender under that subsection because of section 15(5) of the Oil Taxation Act 1975.'

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. David Knox): With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 12, in page 33, line 10, leave out from 'period' to second 'of' in line 11 and insert 'its main functions consist'.

No. 13, in page 33, line 29, leave out paragraph (b).

No. 14, in page 34, line 5, at end add

'(8) Nothing in this section shall be taken to apply to genuine trading companies.'.

No. 15, in clause 64, page 34, line 22, at end insert —

'provided that this subsection does not apply where the successor is a trading company immediately prior to the transfer of the trade.'.

No. 16, in clause 64, page 34, line 28, at end insert —

'provided that this does not apply where the asset will be used for the purposes of the trade of the dual resident or where the asset is transferred by a non-resident and represents shares as defined in section 38(2)(c), Finance Act 1973.'.

and No. 18, in clause 64, page 35, line 19, at end add—

'(8) This section shall not apply to—

(a) companies excluded from the operation of section 48, by reason of subsection (8) of that section, or

(b) the disposal of any asset used for trading purposes.'.

Sir William Clark: This amendment covers clauses 63 and 64. I am worried about the effect of those clauses. It seeks to ensure that a genuine trading loss, which is incurred by a dual resident, a company or whatever, can still be surrendered to another group company by way of group relief.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Oh!

Sir William Clark: If the hon. Member for Great Grimsby would just listen he would, for once, learn something.

The amendment also seeks to retain the ability to surrender a loss arising from a charge on income, for example, interest payable on a loan, to the extent that the charge is incurred for the purposes of its trade.

Finally, it attempts to deal with a problem peculiar to oil companies. I admit here that I am a consultant to the Texaco Oil Company. The problem arises from the additional corporation tax restrictions imposed on oil companies. An oil company cannot offset charges on income against oil extraction income unless those charges meet the specific tests set out in section 15 of the Oil Taxation Act 1975. No such tests apply to non-oil companies, which can obtain their relief by offset against their profits, including trading profits. Previously, limited relief could have been obtained by surrender as a result of section 15(5) of the Oil Taxation Act 1975, inserted by the Finance Act 1982. Clause 63 may prevent this if an oil company is a dual resident. The amendment seeks to restore the position so that the new rules do not prevent relief in cases where relief is available only as a result of Section 15(5).

It is agreed that some companies have obtained tax relief in two countries — that is, in this country and in another country. I am advised that, unamended, the clause would mean that a company could not claim tax relief in either country. Quite obviously, this would be as wrong as claiming it in two countries.

The clause should exclude those companies whose main function is trading. If their main function is trading, whether they be oil companies or not, they should not be put in a position different from that of any other company. I do not know whether my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will agree, but there is ambiguity about balancing charges or balancing allowances on transfer between dual companies.

The clauses are far reaching and will have quite an effect on many companies. Why date the legislation from 1987 without giving those companies the opportunity of not necessarily re-arranging their affairs but dealing with the proposed changes? What is the rush? Why can it not be dated 1988 or 1989? There has been undue haste. In my view it will penalise those companies that are mainly trading companies. Therefore, I hope that my right hon. Friend will not only give sympathetic consideration to this but some assurance that something will be done to alleviate the unfairness in clauses 63 and 64.

Mr. Blair: I want to make one or two brief points about clause 63. I am advised that it stops a practice known as double dipping. I have not come across that term before, at least not in this context. Double dipping occurs when international groups of companies ensure that there is payment of taxation for both United Kingdom and United States purposes and then take relief in both countries. That is obviously wrong. I am also advised that the United States has effectively stopped the practice in respect of United States companies by introducing tax reform legislation that has been passed by Congress.

The amendment seeks to ensure that genuine trading losses can be surrendered to another group company. The hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir William Clark), in moving his amendment, said that the clause does not simply prevent the type of practice that I have described, it actually prevents companies reclaiming the tax in the other country. I would be obliged if the Financial Secretary could say whether that is correct and whether that is the intended consequence of this legislation.

The hon. Gentleman drew attention to the function of the company. He asked why, if they are genuine trading companies, they should be within the provisions of the clause at all. My hesitation in supporting him is that it seems to me that the tax avoidance purpose and practice is not necessarily a function of the fact that they are trading companies or otherwise; it is the use of the group structure that gives rise to the tax avoidance where there is dual residence.

If tax avoidance is occurring on the scale that the Government believe, we are right to pass legislation to prevent that straight away. I would be obliged if the Financial Secretary would deal with those points and also, if it is the case that the United States has passed similar legislation, that there is a certain symmetry in the legislation that we are passing.

7.15 pm

Mr. Norman Lamont: This is a highly technical and extremely complex area. I will look carefully at what my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir William Clark) has said. I intend to reply to that and, if other points arise, if necessary come back and report. I believe that his fears are somewhat misplaced. His amendments can be characterised in three groups. The first group — amendments Nos. 11, 12, 13 and 14 — broadly reflect a worry that the clauses may not fully provide for the exclusion of genuine trading companies that the Government are proposing. The clauses prevent a company that is resident in two countries and therefore able to obtain two lots of relief for the same loss, to obtain relief for that loss in the United Kingdom. A dual resident company that is not set up to create a tax loss, but which has taxable profits, is not affected by the legislation because it makes a profit. However, we recognise that the result may be harsh where a trading and profit-seeking dual resident happens to make a loss. Therefore, we intend that genuine trading companies should be outside the scope of the legislation.

The clauses are drafted to exclude such companies, but they are very tightly drawn to prevent abuse by companies that are not genuine trading companies. Genuine trading companies are excluded by clause 63(5) and (6). Clause 63(6)(a) makes it clear that a company whose trade is such that one of its main functions is to borrow, to purchase or to hold shares in another member of the multinational group, is treated as an investing company. Clause 63(6)(b) brings within the scope of the legislation any trading company which, although its main function does not include the activities covered by clause 63(6)(a), nevertheless in a particular accounting period carries on such activities for a purpose unrelated to the trade. Therefore, in substance clause 63(6)(b) makes it clear that where a trade other than trade within clause 63(6)(a) entails a financial activity such as the holding of investments or the payment of interest, it is only when those activities are disproportionate to the trade that the company will be caught by the legislation. This formulation was arrived at following detailed discussions with representative bodies and others.

The amendments proposed by my hon. Friend leave matters rather more vague. He relies on the undefined phrase "genuine trading companies". I fully understand his concern, but this is an area that has been exploited fully by the tax avoidance industry. We believe that it is necessary to be careful to ensure that only genuine trading companies are excluded. I hope that he will accept that I entirely recognise his concern and that he will accept my assurance that we do not intend and do not think that there will be a problem for genuine trading companies being excluded from the scope of the legislation.

The second group of amendments, Nos. 15 and 16, relate to clause 64. The general purpose of clause 64 is to prevent a dual resident investing company from side-stepping the denial of group relief provided for in clause 63 by using certain reliefs other than group relief in the United Kingdom, and, at the same time, continuing to obtain the equivalent of group relief in, say, the United States. It deals with a number of such reliefs in detail, and the amendments proposed by my hon. Friend draw attention to two of them.

Amendment No. 15 concerns the provision under which a trade that is transferred from one company to another without a change of ownership is treated as a continuing concern for all tax purposes, including capital allowances. The effect of the amendment is to allow all trading companies, and not just genuine trading companies, to continue to be treated in that way. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept my assurances that there should not be a problem for genuine dual resident trading companies.

Amendment No. 16 concerns the provision under which an asset can be transferred from one member of a group of companies to another member on a no-gain, no-loss basis. Again, genuine trading companies are outside the scope of clause 64 because they are not within the definition of "dual resident investing company". That is what the amendment is about.

My hon. Friend has tried to define "genuine trading company". We have defined "investing company" in various provisions of the legislation. A company that is not in the investing company category will be a genuine trading company. We consider that our approach and the particulars that we have listed are a better way of defining it rather than approaching the matter from another direction as my hon. Friend has tried to do by defining "genuine trading company". My hon. Friend's amendments do not succeed in that.

In any event, the abuse that the subsection attacks is the acquisition and sale of an asset by a dual resident investing company rather than its acquisition and retention. If anything were to be done to exclude assets retained from the legislation, it would be necessary to require the retention of the asset for a sufficiently long period to prevent abuse. That would obviously not be acceptable to my hon. Friend.

The third group of amendments, Nos. 58 and 59, are aimed at delaying the implementation of the legislation. In recent years, there has been a trend for more consultation and more warning to be given by the Government of impending legislation, to give those affected time in which to re-arrange their affairs. Dual resident companies will have to rearrange their affairs. That is absolutely inevitable. That is the answer to the point that my hon. Friend raised, in which the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) was interested, about interest not being available even in the United Kingdom. It will be necessary for companies to re-arrange their affairs. We know the consequences of the legislation. Companies have been on notice of the proposed changes for quite some time. Absolutely nobody could claim that we have been precipitate. We had two periods of consultation; one in 1985 and one in 1986. In March 1985, we gave a clear warning that legislation was likely to be introduced if exploitation of the dual resident company loophole continued to grow.

As my hon. Friend knows—the hon. Member for Sedgefield alluded to it—legislation went through the United States Congress last year. Our legislation will take effect three months after the United States legislation. Some people say, "If you have United States legislation, why do you need United Kingdom legislation? What is the point of it? It is not necessary." Of course, if we did not have United Kingdom legislation in addition to United States legislation, the costs would fall entirely to the United Kingdom. If our legislation were delayed any further, we would bear the cost of relief for dual resident companies at no expense to the United States exchequer. A further year's delay would be costly and would simply encourage a further year's abuse.

My hon. Friend is concerned about genuine trading companies, but I hope that he will accept that there are many examples of dual resident companies being set up for no purpose other than to get an interest deduction in the two countries. I guess—I may be wrong—that that is by far the most common reason for setting up a dual resident company. That is not to say that there are no genuine trading companies. We intend that genuine trading companies should be excluded from the effects of the legislation.

I tried to explain to my hon. Friend the way in which we have approached the problem. It is an extremely technical area. I shall study carefully what he said. I believe that it is right to approach it from the definition of "investing company" rather than rely on the term "genuine trading company". I recognise that it will be necessary for companies to re-arrange their affairs to avoid the consequences that the hon. Gentleman raised. People have had notice of that change being likely for quite some time. From the representations and discussions that I have had with interested parties, I know that the major players in the business knew what was coming and could hardly have been surprised. I assure my hon. Friend that I shall examine what he said. I make no commitment, but if any action is necessary, of course we shall consider it.

Sir William Clark: I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's comprehensive reply. I understand his difficulty. He said that the matter is complicated, and everybody would agree. I shall certainly study Hansard tomorrow to get the full import and purport of what my right hon. Friend said. He kindly said that he would examine the matter again and, if necessary, come back on Report—of course, without any commitment. With his assurance that he has taken on board my various reservations, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 65

CONTROLLED FOREIGN COMPANIES: ACCEPTABLE DISTRIBUTION POLICY

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Brooke: It may be helpful if I say a brief word about clause 65. The present position is that, under the controlled foreign company legislation, tax may be charged on the accumulated profits of an overseas company, but if the controlled foreign company pays an adequate dividend to its United Kingdom shareholders, tax will be chargeable on it. That is seen as meeting the requirements of the legislation. When the acceptable distribution test is satisfied, there is no charge on the controlled foreign company's profits. The clear intention of exclusion from the charge when an approved foreign company pursues an acceptable distribution policy is that dividends should be subject to United Kingdom tax.

However, attempts have been made to sidestep that, for tax purposes, by moving the residence of the overseas company to the United Kingdom before a dividend is paid. Thus, at the time it is paid, a dividend is not charged tax as a dividend received from an overseas company, but escapes tax as a dividend paid by one United Kingdom resident company to another. The device can be repeated, for example, by transferring most of the overseas company's assets to another tax haven company before changing its residence.

If necessary, existing cases will be challenged in the courts. However, since significant amounts of tax could be at risk, we have decided to take immediate action to restore the clear intention of the original provisions. The amendments that are contained in the clause ensure, therefore, that, whenever a CFC pays a dividend to pursue an acceptable distribution policy, there should be a charge to tax on the appropriate United Kingdom resident shareholder.

The increased yield from this measure that is given in the FSBR is £10 million for 1987-88 and 1988-89. That figure relates only to the handful of cases in which we know that the device has been used. The Exchequer yield in the form of tax on dividends that are paid by CFCs to meet the acceptable distribution test, is estimated at £60 million per annum. A significant amount of that tax—up to £40 million—could be at risk if the device were to be widely exploited. That is why we have introduced this clause.

7.30 pm

Mr. Blair: This section is not to be retrospective but prospective. I wondered why that was, in view of the earlier comments. I had not appreciated that we were talking about such large sums of money.

Mr. Brooke: As I said, if necessary, existing cases will be challenged in the courts, and the amounts of money to which I referred are those that we know. It is because there is a much lafger sum of money at risk, quite apart from the cases to which I referred, that we are introducing the clause.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 65 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 66 to 69 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 70

LLOYD'S UNDERWRITERS

Mr. Norman Lamont: I beg to move amendment No. 19, in page 40, line 45, leave out from 'Lloyd's' to end of line 47 and insert

'and in consideration of the payment of a premium, one underwriter agrees with another to meet liabilites arising from the latter's business for an underwriting year so that the accounts of the business for that year may be closed'.

The Temporary Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 20 and 24.

Mr. Lamont: These are technical amendments to clarify the wording of clause 70, which deals with the tax deductibility of Lloyd's reinsurance to close premiums.

Amendment No. 19 revises subsection (1) of the clause to provide a more detailed description of the Lloyd's reinsurance to close arrangements. The effect of the amendment is to put it beyond doubt that the clause is sui generis to Lloyd's reinsurance to close. The criteria for tax deductibility that is set out in the clause are free-standing and independent of case law on insurance companies' provisions.

As my hon. Friends know, one of the points that most concerned Lloyd's was that it should not be taxed on a provisions basis. The point at issue was that one should not have a provisions basis where there is no continuing entity. The point was that the provisions basis was therefore not applicable to syndicates whose membership was changing each year.

That is the purpose of this amendment. It is only one part of the issues that have arisen with regard to Lloyd's, so it may be convenient if I propose this amendment. There are other amendments on the Paper and we can debate the wider issues that relate to Lloyd's later.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): In view of what my right hon. Friend has just said, I wonder whether I should make my remarks in a moment. I should like to make a few general remarks, so perhaps my right hon. Friend will way whether it will be convenient for me to do so a little later.

Mr. Lamont: That is a matter for you, Mr. Knox, but it may be convenient if we dealt with the amendments one by one and had a debate on clause stand part.

The Temporary Chairman: That will be convenient.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 20, in page 41, line 2, leave out 'reinsurance'.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Sir William Clark: I beg to move amendment No. 21, in page 41, line 5, leave out

'at the time it is payable'.

The Temporary Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendment No. 67, in page 41, line 6, at end add

'for the avoidance of doubt, the value of the said liabilities shall be discounted to allow for the anticipated lapse of time before they must be paid.'.

Government amendments Nos. 22 and 23.

Sir William Clark: The purpose of these amendments is to clarify the wording of the test for tax deductibility of Lloyd's reinsurance to close.

There is a lot of loose talk about reinsurance with regard to Lloyd's. I should make it clear to the Committee that I am not a name at Lloyd's; I have no vested interest in Lloyd's and I speak as an independent person. Consequently, what I am saying is of genuine concern to me.

If a syndicate ceases to exist, the risks of that syndicate must be reinsured. A syndicate may have 20 names, and if it ceases it carries forward the contingent liabilities for what it has underwritten and when a different syndicate takes it on, it takes on the reinsurance.

The amendment deletes the words

"at the time it is payable".

In my view those words are unnecessary, and I believe that the Inland Revenue agrees with me. The words in the amendment, taken with the words "assessment of the value", might be construed as requiring reinsurance liabilities to be discounted. Llloyd's rules ensure that discounts cannot be given. Consequently, when the syndicate agent, in conjunction with Lloyd's, determines the liability for reinsurance, those future incomes, if they have been discounted, are taken into account.

I understand that it is not the Revenue's intention that discounting should be applied to reinsurance to close for the Lloyd's 1985 to close account, although I understand its concern that the clause should not rule this out if circumstances change.

The problem with the present wording is that it could imply that discounting must necessarily be appropriate for reinsurance to close premiums, and thus run counter to the Revenue's present intentions. In discussion with Lloyd's, the Revenue has said that there are no technical problems with the amendment and I hope that the Financial Secretary will be able to accept it.

The second amendment is a clarifying amendment. It is a matter of great concern to Lloyd's members, who are taking on uncertain liabilities, that the reinsurance to close premium that they receive should give them adequate protection against loss when the claims are eventually paid. The amount of those liabilities, and indeed their existence, is uncertain and may not be known for many years after the RIC premium is determined. Therefore, it is important that the test for tax deductibility should recognise the fiduciary and/or legal duty of the syndicate agent in determining the RIC figure, and that it is sufficient to give a reasonable assurance to those who are taking on the responsibility for the risks that they will not suffer a loss.

I understand that that principle has been agreed in discussions between the Revenue and Lloyd's and that the wording of the subsection is designed to achieve that. Lloyd's considers that the principle will be set out more clearly if the subsection is changed in the way proposed in my amendment. I understand that the terms of the amendment have been agreed between Lloyd's and the Revenue and I hope that the Financial Secretary will be prepared to accept it.

As I have said, the purpose of the amendments is to clarify the position on reinsurance. One could have a syndicate showing a profit of £10,000 after charging a reinsurance premium of, for example, £10,000. If the Revenue was to say, "Oh no, £10,000 is unreasonable," it could be that a person in the syndicate would be paying tax on deemed income that he would never receive. It is a fallacy to think that the names in one syndicate would be the same as in a second syndicate.

It is for those reasons that I hope my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will accept the amendments. The intention is merely to clarify the position between Lloyd's and the Inland Revenue. Under no circumstances should we do anything that would jeopardise the position that we have in Lloyd's, because I remind my right hon. Friend that Lloyd's and other parts of the City keep our economy going to a great extent and our invisibles are an important part of the income of this country.

Mr. Blair: The amendment that stands in my name is grouped with the other amendments, and I wish to speak to it. However, I should stress that, as with many aspects of the Finance Bill, I am going into territory with which I am somewhat unfamiliar.

As I understand it, the position is that Lloyd's syndicates will make up their annual accounts on a calendar year basis and that, in effect, the 1985 account will be closed at the end of 1987 and that at that time there will be outstanding claims against the syndicate. Therefore, the syndicate has to close its books but has to pay what is called a reinsurance to close premium to another syndicate that might involve the same or substantially the same individuals.

The reinsurance to close premium is to cover against outstanding claims that there may be against the syndicate. If the reinsurance to close premuim is too high, that artificially reduces the syndicate's profits and has the effect of deferring tax liability. It was that that the Inland Revenue sought to counter. The legal advice obtained was that the Inland Revenue was unable to question the figures that the syndicate gave in order to judge the reinsurance to close premium.

Clause 70 provides that the amount of the reinsurance "premium shall be allowable only to the extent that it is a" fair and reasonable assessment of the liabilities against which the reinsurance to close premium is insuring.

The difficulty that we foresaw arises out of the meaning of the words in subsection 2:

"at the time it is payable".

As I understand it, the effect of subsection 2 is to allow the amount of the reinsurance premium to be deductible as an expense of the underwriter only to the extent that it is shown not to exceed a "fair and reasonable assessment" of the value of the liabilities in respect of which it is payable. In other words, the value should not exceed a "fair and reasonable assessment" because that will then be used in order to compute the amount of reinsurance premium that is deductible.

7.45 pm

I may be wrong but I thought that the words

"at the time it is payable",

were included in order to address the problem that there may be certain outstanding liabilities at the end of the year but that they would not have to be met immediately. They might not have to be met for a year or two. It is not clear at present whether the provision against which the reinsurance premium is insuring is the actual value of the liabilities or the value taking into account the time when the liabilities accrue.

The purpose of my amendment was to make it clear that the provision made should take into account the time at which the liabilities become due. That will make for a different value from the nominal value of the liabilities. In other words, there may be certain claims that are outstanding against the syndicate that have a nominal value but there should be some allowance for the fact that they may not have to be met until a later date. I would be grateful if the Financial Secretary would clarify that.

Having looked at subsection 2 again, I thought that the words in relation to the value of the liabilities were supposed to achieve that result. However, I may be wrong. In any event, the basis of computation of the value should be clear because that will give rise to the tax deductible loss that is an important part of the reinsurance to close premium.

"at the time it is payable"

I hope that I have explained the purpose of my amendment and I hope I have explained my query as to the meaning of subsection 2. It is important that the Financial Secretary answers my queries.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I can certainly accept amendment No. 21 tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark). I agree that it would be a useful clarification and it is acceptable to the Government. My hon. Friend touched on the subject of discounting and I confirm that it is not the intention that the clause should be read as automatically applying the principle of discounting for tax purposes for reinsurance to close. I can also confirm that the Revenue will not seek to apply discounting to the Lloyd's 1985 account. How far discounting is appropriate when one is considering the deductibility of a provision is one of those areas where the tax position at present is unclear. One of the purposes of the clause as now drafted is to provide a free-standing objective test of the deductibility of a Lloyd's reinsurance to close premium which does not have to rest upon the tax law about provisions. Therefore, developments in that area will not, I am advised, have a direct read-across to this clause. Should the law change, it may be that we will consider how far discounting would be appropriate in relation to Lloyd's.

Mr. Blair: Will the Financial Secretary explain what he means by discounting in this context, because I am not sure that I have understood it correctly?

Mr. Lamont: If I understood the hon. Gentleman correctly, I think that he does understand what it means. Although he did not give it that name, he appeared to describe it when he was talking to his amendment. It seems that his amendment does have the effect that he wants it to have. I am afraid I had assumed that it was accidental. From his explanation, it appears that he is in favour of discounting. He is in favour of discounting the value of a liability to its present-day value—that is, taking account of future income flows in arriving at the amount necessary to meet future liabilities. That is what he appeared to be describing at one point in his argument.

Mr. Blair: I should like to clear up this point. As I understand it, the amount of the reinsurance premium will be based on the value of the outstanding liabilities because that is what is insured against. Presumably, the larger the amount of the outstanding liabilities, the larger the amount of reinsurance-to-close premium. If that is the case, I am worried that there may be a nominal value to liabilities even though the liabilities will not be met for some time. I may be totally wrong about that, but it seems strange that we did not take into account when computing their value the time at which those liabilities are to be met and, therefore, the risk against which one is insuring. If I have misunderstood the position, perhaps the Minister will tell me.

Mr. Lamont: As I understand it, the reinsurance to close premium does not at present take into account discounting. That is why the tax treatment is that which we are proposing. I agree that amendment No. 22 would be a useful clarification and it is acceptable to the Government.

The purpose of the subsection is to ensure that the tax deductions are not excessive and also to achieve a proper balance by ensuring that the rules for tax deductibility take due account of the need to protect against a loss those taking on the outstanding liabilities.

That principle is encompassed by removing the words
"neither a profit nor a loss accrues" and inserting:
"a profit does not accrue."
That is entirely acceptable to Lloyd's and the Government, and it clarifies the position. Perhaps I have already made it clear to the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) that we cannot accept his amendment.

Mr. Adley: I am a newcomer and an amateur in these things. When I was being shown around Lloyd's, I came across an underwriter who told me that he was dealing with a situation that I gather is not uncommon. It was that in 1898 insurance was taken out at Lloyd's by a United States railway. Just recently it was discovered that the sleepers on the track were sprayed with creosote in 1898. It is now being claimed in an American court that the spraying of creosote on the sleepers nearly 100 years ago has been deemed to be responsible for loss of value of crops in an adjoining area. Who is to judge, and how will he judge, what is a fair and reasonable assessment under the terms laid down in sub-section (2) of this clause?

Mr. Lamont: I am not sure of the point that my hon. Friend is making. We are not here talking about a provisions basis, and I must be careful not to use that term. No one could accept a situation in which the Revenue does not have a locus in examining the reinsurance to close premium. That does not say for a moment that the Revenue knows Lloyd's business as well as Lloyd's does or that the Revenue has an expert view of the appropriate premium for the sort of situation that my hon. Friend describes.

As with any commercial business, the Revenue has to come in and take a broad view about whether deductions for business purposes are or are not reasonable. It has to make that judgment on many businesses within any one industry. That is difficult to do, but the Revenue has to take a broad-brush view. What was at issue in the dispute that we had over Lloyd's was whether, as a result of a legal opinion, the Revenue had a locus in looking at the deductibility of reinsurance to close. In essence, that was all it was about. We put forward a proposition that was not acceptable. We had further discussions and have arrived at a form of words.

I should make it clear that I have accepted all three of the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend. This is not just a form of words, but sets out the principle that the Revenue should have a locus in looking at the deductibility of reinsurance to close. That is the best answer that I can give my hon. Friend.

Mr. John Townend: Has not the problem been caused because originally the impression was given that the Revenue knew better than the underwriters? As has been said, experience and expertise are necessary for long-tail insurance and the only person who can make the assessment is the underwriter, not the Revenue. The other point that has been overlooked is that it is rather different from the basis of provisions. That is because, if the reinsurance to close is excessive in the eyes of the Revenue and seems to be a means of tax avoidance, it also means, as my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) said, that the composition of the syndicates varies from year to year.

If there is an abuse of the system, it will mean that the current names have been defrauded for the benefit of future names. If that is the case, the underwriter and the managing agent and everybody involved are in breach of their fiduciary and legal responsibilities to all the names. I hope that my right hon. Friend will be able to assure us that the new clauses resulting from negotiation with Lloyd's will in no way undermine the right of the underwriters to decide the correct amount of the reinsurance to close premium.

Mr. Lamont: I am not sure that it is fruitful to go into the history of why this arose and to apportion blame, if that is the right word. Some people might say that the situation arose because a legal opinion was offered which said that the Revenue had no locus. We cannot accept that. The Revenue must have a locus. My hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) asks if there will still be freedom to fix premiums and resinsurance to close at the appropriate levels. Of course there will: that is a commercial matter, but the level at which these things are fixed must be examined by the Revenue. I am not saying that this is analogous to provisions because it is not and I accept that, but provisions in various financial businesses can be examined by the Revenue and businesses are able to over-provide if they wish or to take a certain view about provisions.

The tax authorities also have a view about the appropriate level of deduction that should be allowed. I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that he seeks. The wording of the clauses has been agreed with Lloyd's and I know that it is satisfied. We are satisfied that we now have this locus and I hope that the arrangement will work well. In no way is it the intention of the Government to harm the business of Lloyd's. My hon. Friend spoke about long-tail business. It is that which makes Lloyd's unique, together with its speed of response and flexibility. It is an extremely valued institution and it is wholly right that we should have a tax regime that takes particular account of its special position.

Question proposed, That clause 70, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Sir William Clark: I wish to use the clause stand part debate to ask my right hon. Friend the Minister a simple question. Subsection (3) deals with disallowance of a reinsurance premium from one name to a new name. As I read it, if there is a reinsurance premium of, say, £1,000 and only £800 is allowed, that is agreed between the Inland Revenue and the syndicate. That means that the name in the old syndicate has lost the tax on £200. The new name in the syndicate has to state not that he receive £1,000 but that he received £800. Consequently, he pays tax on only £800.

It seems to me a bit unfair that the new name will have the advantage of the net amount that was allowed to the old name. Can something be done about that? I would have thought that all this talk about fiscal neutrality and the fairness that we want for all taxpayers makes it odd that the disallowance for the old name benefits the new name. The old name has to pay tax and the new name saves tax.

Mr. Adley: I shall be rather Irish and declare that I have no interest in Lloyd's. My right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary may recall that on Second Reading I intervened briefly and asked my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary a question about this matter because I am considering becoming a name. I am still not sure, but I am not asking my right hon. Friend for advice on whether I should so do.

I am only partly reassured by what I have heard this evening. Lloyd's is built on trust and has prospered on the willingness of people to put at risk most or all of what they possess. However, the action of certain of the United States courts seems fundamentally to be changing the level of risk to which people are putting themselves. My concern is not just for myself if, possibly, in future I become a name, but that first by the bond-washing exercise and, secondly, by this legislation, we may tilt the balance against those people either who are names and want to remain names or who, like myself, are considering becoming names.

The interpretation of this clause still causes me a little unease. If I asked my right hon. Friend who was to interpret "fair and reasonable" he would presumably have answered, "The Inland Revenue". That comes down to the judgment of an individual and that judgment, on the basis of this legislation, may be different from that of an inspector in five, 10, 20 or 50 years' time.

I recognise that the clause in the Bill is very much less harmful and damaging than that which was in the previous Bill, and undoubtedly there has been a welcome improvement in communications between the Treasury and Lloyd's in the past few weeks. All that I want to say to my right hon. Friend is: please can we be careful about what we are doing, because the killer of the goose that lays the golden eggs would not be a happy epithet for this or any Government with regard to Lloyd's?

Mr. Norman Lamont: My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) referred to subsection (3), which provides that where part of the premium paid is not deductible under subsection (2), there shall be a corresponding reduction in tax on the receipt of the underwriter to whom the premium is payable. My hon. Friend gave a particular example. The excess £200 would be neither deductible in syndicate one nor taxable in syndicate two. I will have a look at his example to see whether there is anything on which we want to reflect.

Sir William Clark: My example was in simple figures. However, if there is a £1,000 reinsurance, £200 is disallowed. That consequently means that £800 is allowable in the computation of the syndicate's profits. The new syndicate has received £1,000 but it is deemed to have received only £800. Consequently, its tax liability has gone down by the tax on £200. This is the anomaly, and it means that the names in the old syndicate are suffering a disallowance and that disallowance is giving a benefit to the new names.

Mr. Lamont: I will have a look at that and come back to my hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) wondered about the words "fair and reasonable". There has been considerable exploration of different formulae. I appreciate my hon. Friend's concern about such words, but they have been acceptable to Lloyd's. It is not just a question of how the matter stands in the opinion of an individual tax inspector. The taxpayer has the right to take his affairs to the commissioners and ultimately to the courts if he thinks that the Inland Revenue's interpretation of "fair and reasonable" is not correct.

My hon. Friend asked me and the Government to recognise the unique position of Lloyd's and not to be so over-zealous about tax avoidance, that we damage the interests of Lloyd's and thus of the market. I emphasised at the beginning that our concern has been to establish that we have the locus to look at the deductibility of reinsurance to claim. That is a principle that nobody has sought to challenge today. I emphasise more forcibly than I have already done that we recognise that Lloyd's is a unique institution. I have referred to long tail business and its flexibility. It is different from other parts of the insurance market. Not only does that mean that it is appropriate that there should be a separate and different regime for such a unique body but that we have to be careful that we do not damage something that is important in the City of London, and that is wholly understood.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I think that we ought now to agree that the clause, as amended, should stand part of the Bill. I am not connected with Lloyd's and I am not associated in any way with reinsurance. However, a number of my constituents were gravely disturbed over proposals that were incorporated in the Finance Bill that was presented to the House in March. I tabled an amendment to it which I hoped would alleviate the situation somewhat. I was therefore very pleased indeed when I discovered that there had been movement and when the Bill was presented to the House again, this provision had been substantially changed. I am even more pleased that my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary has been listening to the arguments of the experts and has accepted a number of amendments which we believe may prove to be satisfactory. I think that we should now give this a try.

I do hope that my right hon. Friend will bear in mind that this is a very sensitive area and it could well be, even now, that what is in the clause as amended may not prove to be entirely right. As he has been so accommodating over this and has approached the matter in a highly commendable spirit, I am sure that we can rely on him, if it is found that the clause, in the form in which we have it in the Committee now, is not entirely satisfactory at some future time, if representations are made, to be prepared to listen and possibly make further amendments. As matters stand, I think that we have made a lot of progress. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend on behalf of my constituents, who I know will be very glad that he has approached this matter in the way that he has. Therefore, I think that it would be right that the clause should now stand part of the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 70, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 71 to 73 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 74

GENERAL RULES

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: I simply want to make sure that I understand correctly the effects of clause 74. As I understand it, under existing law a company will pay tax on capital gains at capital gains rate of 30 per cent. Under clause 74, a company will now pay tax at the full corporation tax rate of 35 per cent. On the other hand, companies will be able to use advance corporation tax in payment of tax on chargeable gains. I would be grateful if the Minister can confirm that that is the case. I have difficulty in construing the clause.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. I can tell the hon. Gentleman sincerely that he comes to these debates, reads the clauses and constantly asks whether he has interpreted them correctly. He does interpret them rightly. He was correct in what he said on the previous clauses and he was also right in his summary on clause 74.

It may be for the benefit of the Committee if I go into a little more detail. There was some controversy about certain aspects of this point earlier. However, we hope that with the changes that we have made, particularly in clause 75, that some of the controversy has been removed. Clause 74 in conjunction with clauses 75 to 77 and schedule 5 amend the way in which tax on the capital gains of companies is computed and extends the scope for setting off advanced corporation tax as the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) said.

Under present law, a company's capital gains are effectively taxed at 30 per cent. The effective rate is achieved by a fairly complicated mechanism. We take the capital gains made by a company and multiply them by six sevenths — the reducing fraction — and tax the resulting figure at 35 per cent. That gives an effective rate of 30 per cent. which applies to companies large and small. The small companies' rate does not apply to capital gains.

The point about ACT set-off has been made over many years. I think that it has been widely welcomed. It seemed to us that with the main corporation tax rate reduced to 35 per cent. the case for a differential lower rate on gains was necessarily much weaker and as the Chancellor explained in the Budget speech, for small companies the tax rate of 27 per cent. would be lower than the present 30 per cent. CGT rate.

Some people have said that the change is retrospective because it applies to gains accrued but not realised before Budget day. Of course, tax on capital gains is essentially a tax on disposals. Changes in the regime thus inevitably apply to the whole of the gain realised when a disposal is made. Essentially, we see that as a simplification of the system. Certainly the way in which capital gains are calculated seems to be unnecessarily complicated. We hope that this will be acceptable to the Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 74 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 75

LIFE ASSURANCE BUSINESS

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

8.15 pm

Mr. Blair: The Financial Secretary to the Treasury quite rightly said that clause 75 should be taken with clause 74. The effect of the clause is to ensure that life assurance companies continue to pay the capital gains tax at the old rate of 30 per cent. As I understand it, the Inland Revenue will be conducting a review of the taxation of life assurance companies. Has the Financial Secretary to the Treasury any idea when that review is likely to be completed?

Mr. Norman Lamont: The hon. Gentleman said that capital gains of life assurance companies would be taxed at 30 per cent. I want to make it quite clear that we are talking about the capital gains of policy holders. We have drawn that distinction. The capital gains of the life companies themselves, the gains reserved for shareholders, will be taxed as before.

We have said that we believe that there should be a wider review of the taxation of life assurance companies. It is true that there is room for argument about the burden of taxation that falls on life companies. Certainly, I do not believe that even if we had stuck to our original proposal the effects would have been as onerous on the companies as some of the critics have said.

The taxation of life companies has developed in a somewhat piecemeal fashion. It is certainly highly complex and it has been argued that it no longer fulfils the function of taxing the shareholders' interest in a broadly similar way to the shareholders' interest in any other company and of taxing a proxy for policy holders' interest.

The review will consider whether the burden of tax on life assurance companies and policy holders is appropriate and whether there is consistency between one class of business and another and also between insurance and other broadly similar activities. Naturally, the life assurance industry and other interested parties will be fully consulted during the review.

With regard to the timing, I am afraid that all I can say is that we will press ahead with all possible speed. However, given the need to look comprehensively and thoroughly at what is a very complex area, it will inevitably take a little while. I am afraid, therefore, that I can give no assurance about the timing of any action which we may decide to take in the light of the review.

Rate Support Grant (England)

8.20 pm

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Michael Howard): I beg to move,

That the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 2) 1986-87 (House of Commons Paper No. 35), a copy of which was laid before this House on 9th July, be approved.

This is the first rate support grant report which this Parliament has to consider. It will, I am afraid, be by no means the last. However, a new and greatly simplified grant system is on the horizon so in some ways I offer hope to the House. This debate marks the beginning of the end of the present system.

This supplementary report is concerned principally with school teachers' pay. The Government intend that school teachers should receive an average pay increase of 16·4 per cent. this year. They have already had half of this with effect from 1 January 1987. The Government's intention is that the second part should be payable from 1 October 1987.

We have already provided the Exchequer's contribution towards the cost in the present financial year. This supplementary report honours the Government's commitment that the taxpayer would make a significant contribution to the extra costs in 1986-87. It will make available an extra £51 million block grant to match the estimated extra cost of £111 million, from 1 January to 31 March. The extra costs are fully reflected in increases in education authorities' GREs. In this respect it follows exactly the method used in the 1987-88 first supplementary report considered by the House on 5 May. Like its predecessor, it is an extra supplementary report which would not normally be appearing now. It is brought forward at this stage at the express wish of local authority associations.

My predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) tried hard to explain the effects on education authorities of the 1987-88 changes. I shall follow his example. The increase on education GRE is £111 million and in block grant £51 million. This is the same grant percentage, 46 per cent. as in the settlement for 1986-87. However, hon. and right hon. Members will know that the block grant system does not give this percentage of grant to all authorities. The grant percentage in each case depends upon, among other things, the authority's expenditure in relation to its GRE and its rateable value. The block grant system is designed broadly to equalise the rate poundage costs to ratepayers of providing services efficiently at a standard level. That is why some local authorities seem to get a higher percentage of the cost of the teachers' pay rise in grants than others.

This supplementary report makes a number of other changes which together tend to make it difficult to see the effects of teachers' pay changes. The first is that it takes account of revised estimates of total expenditure for the year based on returns of expenditure and rates from almost every local authority. The previous teachers' pay supplementary report used essentially the same expenditure information, that is budgets, as the preceding main report. Most of the returns used in the present supplementary reports were completed long before accounts were closed, indeed most 1986-87 accounts are still not closed, and it will be many more months before audited returns are available. Nevertheless, we now have a better idea of what actual expenditure was in 1986-87 than was given by the budgets which were used in the last supplementary report.

Total expenditure in aggregate is lower than budgets by nearly £70 million but the picture is very patchy. There are some very large falls, and some large increases. Some changes are undoubtedly due to creative accounting and may not reflect real spending at all. The results of the changes in grant terms are to move quite large amounts of grant around England. The total goes up £51 million, but shire and metropolitan areas together gain over £61 million while London loses £10 million. This brings me to the second reason why the effects of the supplementary report are difficult to follow.

Those hon. Members who have taken part in these debates in the recent past will remember that 1986-87 is the last year for which we recycle grant. Let me embark upon the daunting task of trying to explain this piece of rate support grant jargon. Some authorities have chosen to increase their spending for this year. In most cases this reduces grant entitlements. The surplus grant which these authorities had previously received is returned to the pool and recycled—that is, distributed back to all authorities, including the high spenders. This had the serious shortcoming that every authority's grant depended in part on every other authority's grant and therefore authorities could not know precisely how much grant they would receive.

Legislation in the previous Parliament abolished recycling for 1987-88 and subsequent years, so that there is no longer a fixed grant pool. Any underclaim of grant will not be distributed. Conversely, if authorities were to make savings and spending fell below the amounts assumed in the settlement, there would be an overclaim and we would provide more grant. But for 1986-87, we still have recycling. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science, when he was Secretary of State for the Environment, promised authorities that at least £500 million would be recycled in 1986-87. That promise was fulfilled in the first supplementary report, when we recycled £618 million. The recycled amount has changed very little in this report. It is difficult now to calculate the figure on a comparable basis because many of the parameters in the system have changed. Nevertheless, it still seems to be about £617 million. It is certainly much more than £500 million.

Like the previous supplementary report, this report makes certain other changes to grant related expenditures —for example, to take account of actual land drainage precepts and other later information, and it takes account of the boundary changes which took place at the beginning of 1985 and 1986.

Finally, we have removed the temporary safety net that was incorporated in the first supplementary report. This is another piece of RSG jargon. A safety net is a device which prevents losses of grant from exceeding a certain amount. I suppose the metaphor is that of grant falling. The consequences of too great a fall are being prevented by a safety net. In the first supplementary report, grant losses due to GRE changes were limited to the equivalent of a 2p increase in rate to ratepayers. But that particular limit was intended to be only temporary because, while the losses could not have been expected, it was right that they should flow through in full once authorities had had a chance to rate for them. We always said we would remove it to allow the remaining losses to flow through in the next supplementary report, and that is what we are now doing.

There are other consequences to that decision. Because of grant recycling, the cost of the temporary safety net was borne by all authorities. The other side of the coin is, therefore, that those authorities now get the grant that would have been theirs but for the safety net in the last supplementary report.

I turn now to another feature of the 1986-87 RSG. I refer to the matter which has become known as the Bromley error. The House will recall that there was an error in the 1986-87 RSG settlement. An inappropriate method was used when assessing how much extra expenditure each London borough would incur on highway maintenance following the abolition of the Greater London council. As a result, some boroughs, including Bromley, received no extra grant despite taking on new responsibilities. Other boroughs, including Greenwich, received more grant than was justified. This error was quickly spotted, and we undertook to correct it at the first available opportunity. The effect of the judgment in legal proceedings instituted by the London borough of Greenwich, however, meant that the Secretary of State did not have the power to make the necessary correction. The Secretary of State told the House on 5 March that he had appealed against that decision.

Since then we have been assessing the position. It has become clear that, even if we win the appeal, that will not necessarily be a complete solution. A successful appeal would allow us to correct the error for 1986-87, but the effects of the error have fed through to the 1987-88 settlement also. And, as the law now stands, even if the Greenwich judgment was reversed, it is doubtful whether we have the powers to effect a correction for that year. A similar situation will arise in due course for 1988-89.

Just to complicate matters further, since March the London boroughs of Bromley and of Kingston-upon-Thames have started their own legal actions challenging the Secretary of State's decision not to make the Bromley correction.

We have made it clear from the outset that we regard the situation as inequitable. We are determined that the error should be corrected so that the authorities concerned can receive their fair grant entitlements. It is clear, however that if we proceed with the appeal it may be some time before all the legal issues are resolved, and there is no certainty that the full implications of the original mistake could be corrected.

In the light of these factors, we have concluded that the best course is to withdraw the appeal. Instead we shall take a suitable opportunity in the current Session to take legislative powers to ensure that we have the necessary powers to correct the Bromley error in 1986-87 and 1987-88. In the meantime, the 1988-89 settlement will have to go ahead on the uncorrected basis. We shall then make the necessary correction for that year in a supplementary report when we have the necessary powers.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Howard: As the issue is known to all and sundry as the Bromley error, I should give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims), who represents part of the borough.

Mr. Sims: If I have understood my right hon. and learned Friend correctly, those who represent Bromley in this place, and not least the ratepayers, will welcome his remarks. It seems, however, that it will be some while before the error is corrected. Am I correct in assuming that the £3 million a year that the Bromley ratepayers lost as a result of the error will be recouped for 1988-89 and retrospectively?

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is entirely correct. Let me take the opportunity of paying tribute to him and his colleagues from the borough, all of whom have paid close attention and taken a close interest in the matter, and have ensured that the views of residents are made known to me and to my predecessors.

Let me summarise the effects of the supplementary report. It increases block grant and the GREs of education authorities to help to pay for the teachers' pay increase from 1 January to 1 March 1987. It updates GREs to reflect later information and boundary changes. It removes the temporary safety net imposed in the first supplementary report. It has been brought forward now at the unanimous urging of local authority associations, and I am sure that it will be welcomed by them.

8.30 pm

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Let me take this opportunity to welcome the Minister to his new post, but also to warn him that, as he probably already realises, he is entering a legal and financial minefield. Many of us spent nearly every Tuesday and Thursday morning for a whole year trying to put right many of the Government's errors following challenges made in court. The only people who seemed to benefit from the work that I did last year were the lawyers. However, I believe that the Minister is a lawyer, so I do not suppose that that worries him too much.

I describe the subject as a minefield because—as is clear from the Minister's summary of the "Bromley error"—it is impossible to predict when the next challenge in the courts will take place. If an appeal in court is successful, it means that we will be upstairs in one of the Committee Rooms week after week, discussing turgid legal briefs and deep financial affairs. However, we broadly welcome the main part of the Minister's statement. The report meets the request of the local authority associations for an early implementation of the extra grant consequent on the teachers' pay award. But some parts of the report are not consequent on that settlement, and will seriously affect the rate budget in 1987-88. I shall return to that in a moment.

Let me deal briefly with some of the consequences of the way in which the cash to pay for the teachers' award has been given to local authorities. As the Minister said, the estimated cost in 1986-87 is about £111 million, and the government promised an extra grant of £51 million. That is what the report is implementing. However, the local authority associations asked the Government to provide alternative funding arrangements rather than channeling the extra assistance through block grant, because there were obvious problems for some local authorities.

ILEA, for instance, receives no extra assistance as a consequence of the award, because it does not receive block grant. As ILEA is rate-capped in both 1986-87 and 1987-88, that is a double punishment. Moreover the Minister may wish to comment on this later I understand that some of the extra block grant will not go to local education authorities. The Minister may have made that point in his speech, in which case I apologise. But the Minister shakes his head. Perhaps he will look into the matter, either this evening or on another occasion. If the cash was intended to pay for the teachers' award, it should go to LEAs.

The net effect of the changes proposed in the report is that there will be some heavy gainers and some heavy losers. When he summarised the figures, the Minister said that there would be a loss of £10 million for London and of £16 million for the combined metropolitan areas. The shire districts would lose £28 million, and the shire counties £17 million. A point that the Minister did not make, and which I hope that he will take into consideration, is that many local education authorities paid teachers' back-pay in their May pay packets. The timing of the report means that authorities will not receive the extra grant until August, so that they will suffer an adverse cash flow. I should be glad if the Minister would look into that as well.

The matter of GREs is rather technical. Paragraph 1 (b) of the report says that one of the main objectives is to redetermine multipliers

"to remove the limit imposed in the first Supplementary Report on grant losses as a result of the fresh determinations of GREs specified in that Report."

Being a lawyer, the Minister may be able to make sense of that, but I am sure that, if I set it as an examination question and they were asked to comment, many hon. Members in the Chamber tonight would hand in a series of blank pages at the end of the three hours. But let us try to translate it and to show what it means for some local authorities.

In the first supplementary report for 1986-87, the Secretary of State made a number of changes to authorities' GREs which resulted in changes in grant for authorities. To protect them from the effects of those changes—some of them unexpected—in the middle of a financial year, a limit equivalent to a 2p rate was placed on the grant losses that an authority could incur as a result of the changes. In rate support grant jargon, it is known as a "2p temporary safety net". The Government made it clear that that was only a temporary measure, and that the full effect would be implemented in a future supplementary report.

In the normal course of events, the "future supplementary report" would not have been implemented until April 1988. The removal of the safety net during 1987-88 will be particularly hard on rate-capped authorities. Those authorities' rate limits were set by the Local Government Finance Act 1987, which the Government had to introduce to restore the legality of the whole RSG and rate-capping system. The rate limits set out in the 1987 Act made no explicit allowance for the loss of 1986-87 grant, which authorities would not ordinarily have expected to be implemented until 1988-99. Furthermore, if authorities had been aware of the timing of the losses, and if the normal procedures under the Rates Act 1984 had been operating, the losses could have been taken into account in discussions with the Secretary of State over the rate limit. The procedures of the 1987 Act, which temporarily jettisoned the 1984 Act, did not provide for such discussions.

I am glad that the Secretary of State for Wales has come into the Chamber early, because he may understand the paragraph that deals with the rate support grant in Wales. He may have a translation of this complex sentence into meaningful language. Indeed, if he wants it in Welsh, I am sure that I can persuade one of my Welsh-speaking colleagues to come in in about 60 minutes to present the case in Welsh and to ask him a few questions, to which he will respond. The right hon. Gentleman is a very intelligent man. He will have been on a crash course in Welsh and, no doubt, in a few weeks will present the case on these complicated Bills in Welsh. However, in most cases, it does not matter whether the case is presented in English, Welsh or Afghan, as Labour local authorities always end up worse off.

I have here a table setting out the large losers in the Association of Metropolitan Authorities. One of them is the Tyne and Wear passenger transport authority. It is to lose £1·7 million. The area that I represent is part of Tyne and Wear, and it suffers from very high unemployment. It is absurd that any local authority or passenger transport authority should lose any money. The north-east of England needs every penny that it can get to help it over its dire and difficult problems.

My constituency suffers from massive unemployment. We are to lose a development corporation, but we shall not benefit from additional money, in the way that the inner cities will benefit. I digress slightly from this debate on the rate support grant settlement. We welcome the additional cash that is being made available to the inner cities, but there are other parts of the United Kingdom that suffer from just the same level of unemployment. They also suffer from poor housing and general deprivation and they, too, need additional cash. There is disquiet in my constituency and in similar constituencies about the fact that they are being shoved aside while attention is focused on the inner cities. The Minister ought to be aware of the problems that we face and of the issues that will be raised in the coming months.

Apart from those reservations, to which I know the Minister has listened carefully and to which I am sure he will respond, the Opposition welcome in general the rate support grant settlement for 1986-87.

8.42 pm

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): My remarks will be brief, thanks to what my hon. and learned Friend said when he opened the debate. He explained what is to happen about the Bromley error, which deprived the ratepayers of Bromley of £3 million a year. I am delighted to hear that it is to be returned to us, even though it may be 1988-89 before that happens. When he replies to the debate I hope that the Minister will clarify what is to happen about the outstanding sums. Bromley has been deprived of £3 million a year and it has also lost interest on that money. We hope that we shall not be out of pocket and that the loss of interest will be taken into account when the final repayment is made.

The Minister is aware that the Greater London council operated a Londonwide concessionary fares schemes. The scheme that replaced it meant that the costs were shared, pro rata to population, but the way in which the money has been distributed bears no relation to its collection. Most inner London boroughs were presumed to spend far more than they do on concessionary fares, whereas the reverse applies in outer London – for example, in my borough. The cost of the concessionary fares scheme in Bromley for 1987-88 is £3·5 million, whereas the grant related expenditure assessment is only £1·4 million. That is inequitable.

I took up this matter with the previous Minister of State, and in his letter of March 1987 he explained that at the time of abolition his Secretary of State did not have the power to distribute concessionary fares in London in the way that I had asked him to do. He explained that the Rate Support Grants Act 1986 had changed the position and that his Department had considered the possibility of introducing a change in the 1987-88 settlement. He also said that after careful consideration he had decided not to do so but that that did not preclude it from being given further consideration for adoption in the following year's settlement. When he replies to the debate, I should be grateful if the Minister could assure me that the concessionary fares adjustment will be made in the forthcoming year so that Bromley will receive its fair share.

8.46 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): This is the first speech that I have made in the House since May 1983, so it is opportune to say a few words about my predecessor before I deal with the rate support grant report. Tom Torney was a widely respected Member of Parliament and worked diligently for his Bradford, South constituency. I wish him a long and happy retirement, particularly in view of the fact that shortly before the election he lost his wife. In normal circumstances, he could have looked forward to spending his retirement with her. It was a sad end to his parliamentary career, but he can reflect on the fact that he made a distinguished contribution as a Member of Parliament. He was an unremitting critic of the Common Market, and he expressed his views clearly and pungently, whenever he felt that it was right to do so.

The unemployment in Bradford, South is relevant to the order, which will provide additional money for local authorities. That will help to create jobs. In Bradford, South, unemployment stands at over 13·5 per cent., so jobs are sadly needed in my constituency. Nearly 6,000 people are unemployed there. The Government are fond of omitting percentages and dealing with absolutes. They say that they have spent so many millions of pounds on creating jobs. However, 6,000 people in Bradford, South are still unemployed. The percentages are even higher in Bradford, North and Bradford, West. The talents of those people are being wasted. Unemployment creates a sense of alienation among people who have been on the dole for so long. It is all due to the Government's economic policies.

The rate support grant report is important because the local authority is the largest employer in Bradford. Every source of income is important. Bradford employs teachers, whose pay award is reflected in the order. I do not intend to comment on the pay award. That will have to be negotiated. However, there is a strong and enduring sense of injustice among teachers because of the arbitrary fiat of the Secretary of State for Education and Science. By it, their negotiating rights have been removed. That sense of injustice will continue so long as negotiating rights are denied to teachers. Deep as they are in their dogma, I hope that even at this late stage the Government will recognise that if people are in regular employment they should have the right to influence the terms and conditions of their employment.

There are a number of ways to create jobs. Money helps, of course. The order reflects the Government's response to the representations of the local authorities, but the money on offer is too little. The Government should have been much more generous. Money should have been made available much earlier, because money helps to create jobs.

There are a number of ways in which that could be done in Bradford, South. The local authority and local Members of Parliament have made representations about the reconstruction of some of Bradford's schools. The local authority wanted a total expenditure of £21 million a year for five years. Bradford is almost unique among significant towns and cities in the country in having an expanding school roll. However, central Government have allowed only about £6 million for one year and Bradford is not, therefore, in a position to plan ahead.

The Minister knows well that when money is injected into the economy through the rate support grant, it is, in the main, the private sector that is stimulated, as it does most of the work for local authorities. Therefore, the repair and refurbishing of schools would benefit the private sector. Of course, the community at large would also benefit from providing children with decent surroundings in which to be educated. At the moment, apart from any major refurbishments, about £3 million is needed to meet the bill for routine maintenance and repairs to schools in the Bradford, South constituency.

The second straightforward and rapid way of creating jobs in Bradford, South would be to improve the housing stock in the public and private sectors. There are many examples of Boot houses, which may be something about which hon. Members do not readily know. Such houses were built in the 1920s, in the prefabricated method. They are held together by large tie bolts and were built to have only a short life. Those tie bolts are now rusting and the houses must either be rebuilt, which is expensive, or demolished and replaced with new housing. Again, an injection of money by central Government for the difficulties facing local authorities would be only natural justice.

If the Department of the Environment were to restore its broken pledge to local authorities—that if they sold council houses, they could have that revenue for building new houses and for repair—by rights Bradford should have about £6 million to spend. If that pledge was restored, there would be a further cash injection to improve houses in the public sector and to help those in the private sector. The Government could assist materially by providing money for improvement grants, which have virtually dried up because of central Government's meanness.

Transport facilities are listed and included on the order. Deregulation has produced some horrendous ommissions in our bus services. In part of my constituency called Wyke, people used to be able to catch a bus into Bradford's city centre. Now they must catch three buses, with three fares. That is a significant item of expenditure for people who struggle from week to week to make ends meet.. I know that that may seem trivial to Conservative Members but I advise them that during the election I received between 20 and 30 complaints about it. I have also had letters subsequently about it.

The passenger transport authority has said that, under the terms of the legislation, it cannot provide the type of service that it provided prior to deregulation. The Government should seriously take on board the fact that money should be made available to ensure that those services are restored to provide an opportunity for people living in Wyke to travel to the city centre, as cheaply and as reasonably as possible.

Jobs could be provided in other areas. Electrifying the line from Leeds to Bradford would enable Bradford to maintain, without qualification, its position on British Rail's inter-city map. The construction of a link between Bradford Interchange and Bradford Forster Square would also create jobs in the construction industry, in which about 400,0000 people are on the dole. Such capital investment would be welcomed. The Government are always complaining about the difficulties of creating jobs and about how hard up they are for doing that task. The Prime Minister goes on the Jimmy Young programme to say how concerned she is about the lack of jobs. If the Minister talks to the Prime Minister he can slip into her red box the suggestions that I am making so that they can be acted upon because these capital projects can be used to improve inner-city areas and to provide jobs for their citizens.

Bradford needs more rate support grant because it is facing difficulties in, for example, the National Health Service. I know that that is not absolutely germane to the order, but it supports my case for more rate support grant. Bradford has the longest waiting list in the region, with 6,874 people waiting for operations. I hope that the Government will discourage greedy consultants from encouraging people to go private in their attempt to avoid the long waiting lists. That is a temptation for many people. However, it should be a priority for the Government to cut waiting lists. If we had won the general election, it would have been a priority task for the Labour Government.

Finally, the Minister will no doubt say that money is in short supply, that the cake is limited and that the local authorities can have only a modest increase in this supplementary rate support grant. However, I must point out that the Government can provide money when they want to. The cost of their foolish Falklands expedition was £2 billion and there is an annual expenditure of about £800 million on fortress Falklands. When the Prime Minister, who is by way of being a nuclear nut, pushed through Sizewell B, and appointed an inspector to produce approval for it, as she did, and when successive Secretaries of State for Energy repeatedly state their sympathy for the Sizewell B nuclear power station, £1·5 billion is put forward for it.

Only yesterday there was jubilation from Tory members because there will be a slight saving on the Trident expenditure. It is a modest saving the Trident programme will cost just under £10,000 million instead of £11,000 million. I know that the Minister is concerned about wider issues and I can point out to him that Trident is in breach of the United Nations nuclear non-proliferation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. We are discussing local government expenditure.

Mr. Cryer: That is absolutely right, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You have underlined the point that I am making. I am saying that the rate support grant order, allocating as it does a supplementary grant, is not sufficient. I am pointing out to the Government that they can come back to the House, next week if they like, with another order providing more money which we would all enjoy debating, if they cut expenditure on Trident and at the same time kept international treaty obligations, such as the United Nations non-proliferation treaty.

The measure provides a little more for local authorities, but it will barely enable them to keep their heads above water. They are short of cash. They provide vital services for our communities and I hope that this supplementary grant is not the last injection of cash to maintain those services and to provide much needed jobs, not only in Bradford, South, which is obviously an important area, but throughout the country, especially where unemployment is at its worst.

8.59 pm

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): I am not sure whether I am supposed to welcome back the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer). The other night I heard my hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Local Government refer to a similar Labour Member as a "parliamentary retread." Therefore, I welcome back the parliamentary retread for Bradford, South. I should warn him that retreads usually have attached to them a warning that they must not go too fast down the motorway. The hon. Gentleman may have been going a bit fast tonight.

I certainly endorse what the hon. Gentleman said about his predecessor, Tom Torney. I recollect meeting the present hon. Gentleman a few years ago walking through Wandsworth and I imagine that he was going through a process of re-education which I hope will serve him well in the House now.

I rise briefly to welcome the statement made tonight by my hon. and learned Friend the Minister, particularly about the extraordinary circumstances of the case which has affected the borough of Bromley and the royal borough of Kingston upon Thames. My hon. Friend the Member for Chiselhurst (Mr. Sims) also welcomed the announcement that the ratepayers of those boroughs would be completely reimbursed for the past peculiarities of the operation of the law as a result of the case brought by the London borough of Greenwich. I hope that this evening my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State will give a complete assurance that our ratepayers will in no sense suffer from the most peculiar anomalies of this case.

The case has been used in Kingston upon Thames by the present hung council, particularly members of the Liberal and Social Democratic parties, as a means of pillorying the Government for alleged inequalities and inaccuracies in their interpretation of the rate support grant. I hope that as a result of my hon. and learned Friend's statement we can return to the ratepayers in the royal borough with a complete assurance that in the near future they will be completely reimbursed for their rates. I look forward to such an assurance from my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State. With all due respect to my hon. Friends on the Front Bench it seems that the law has to some extent proved to be an ass and I trust that tonight they will fully reassure my constituents.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): I congratulate the Minister on the elegant way in which he tiptoed around the appalling jargon of the rate support grant. I fear it will not be long before he gets stuck into it and produces additional jargon of his own. That is the usual track record of Ministers in his Department.

I wish to comment briefly on two aspects of this settlement, both of which have been referred to. First, this settlement has had a curious impact on the Inner London education authority. The Minister said that the net effect for Greater London of the various elements in the order is a loss of £10 million, but he did not point out that the impact on ILEA is singularly curious. The object of the exercise in this order is to reimburse local authorities for the Government's share of the teachers' pay settlement. For the Inner London education authority in the current year that would be some £38 million, but because the Government have chosen to use the extraordinary mechanism of the block grant system to provide the extra money not one penny piece of it will go to the ILEA. That will mean that inner London ratepayers will have to pay all the additional cost out of their rates. In addition, they will have to pay, through their national tax, a share of teachers' pay in other parts of the country. In that sense, inner London ratepayers and taxpayers may be paying double their contributions.

No doubt Ministers will say that that is the direct result of the spending policies of the ILEA, and I am not here to defend all of those. The ILEA has some extraordinary priorities when it comes to spending public money. However, that is not much consolation if one considers that inner London ratepayers will be contributing £950 million towards the £1,025 million to be spent by ILEA this year.

My second point relates to the removal of the 2p temporary safety net. The Minister fairly pointed out that that was a temporary arrangement and that it had been planned to come to an end. However, it was generally thought in local government that it would come to an end in April 1988 at the end of a financial year. Its removal part of the way through the financial year will cause obvious problems. It is part of the general pattern that local government has come to expect in the past few years: the goal posts are constantly changed half way through the game. Uncertainty is the only thing of which one can be certain in local government finance.

The alteration presents particular problems for the rate-capped authorities which do not have the same freedom of manoeuvre. The rate-capped authorities, especially in inner London, will have problems. I remember the great banners draped across every public building in my constituency, which said, "Rate-capping means cuts." In the first two years, rate-capping has certainly not meant cuts. Spending has continued to increase, because the authorities have found every sort of ingenious technique of creative accounting, as it is called in the trade, and every ingenious system of borrowing to ensure that spending continues to increase. In some cases the authorities were frank about that strategy which was based on the hope that a Labour Government would come riding to their rescue and bail them out. That hope has not been fulfilled and the pigeons must now come home to roost. However ingenious the borrowing may be, it has to be paid back sooner or later and much of it is extremely short-term borrowing, based on public buildings, parking meters, street lights and so on. I think it was the leader of Islington council who said that debt in her borough had reached Third world proportions, and that is the case in a number of inner London authorities. They are beginning to realise that the happy borrowing has to come to an end and not on a planned basis but at some speed. Those of us who have experience of local government know that if cuts have to be made in a hurry they are not always the sort of cuts that ought to be made. One cuts the services that one can cut swiftly, and they are not always the low priority services.

We can all criticise those in power in the authorities who saw the iceberg in front of the Titanic and simply went full steam ahead into it, but now they are having to make cuts at speed. It is sad that at a time when the Government — I give them credit for this — are saying that more needs to be done to tackle the problems of deprivation in inner London, there are now to be unplanned and sometimes damaging cuts in local authority services. That will be in direct contrast to the Government's wishes.

Given the Minister's complicated preparations for the poll tax, I hope that he has not overlooked the problems of the inner-London boroughs. If it is possible to ease the further staging of rate-capping so that it is possible to enable those authorities to plan down their expenditure in some sensible way that would be in the interests of the people of inner London.

9.9 pm

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): When the Minister opened the debate he said that this will probably be one of the last times that we discuss the rate support grant. The Minister said that he was looking forward to a new system being introduced. Given the majority that the Conservatives have got that will be done. However, it will not be as easy as the Government think. Many people are now awakened to what the poll tax means.

It is significant that we read in the newspapers that the Government are now thinking about bringing in the poll tax in stages. At last, they have realised the significance of the poll tax and the vicious way in which it will hit the majority of people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has just made his maiden speech. I cannot see why it should be called a maiden speech because if one looks at his record in the past years, both in voting and speaking, it is second to none. I look forward to the renewed partnership between my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South. That partnership has been missed for a number of years.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South and I have had differences of opinion, but my hon. Friend would not want it any other way. I appreciate the feelings that my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South expressed about his predecessor, Tom Torney, who was a well-loved Member of this House. He was well known for his speeches and support on agriculture, which is a great interest in my constituency.

This debate gives us an opportunity to discuss a number of things. The teachers' strike is still with us. We are grateful for the amount of money that is being put back into local government to help with the teachers' pay award, but it is not sufficient to come up with a solution to deal with the teachers' strike. I remind the Minister of the effects of the Government's policies on rate funding and rates, especially in south Yorkshire and in my area of Barnsley metropolitan council.

I remind the Minister that representatives from South Yorkshire's fire service met his predecessor to discuss the serious state of affairs in south Yorkshire. Not too long ago I wrote to the Minister on this matter. If the letter has not reached him he will probably delve into his files to find out where it is.

The South Yorkshire fire service is in serious difficulty. That service has the remit of Home Office approval regarding the fire cover for that area. According to Home Office figures that service is undermanned. Last year the service had to tap reserves to try to maintain the present service. That present service is still not up to the level that the Home Office requires. If extra money is not given to the South Yorkshire fire service there will be serious cuts in manning and the number of appliances on the road. This is not a political gimmick or a political plea. The fact is that the fire cover in that area is necessary and at present that service is undermanned. If money is not forthcoming or the Government envisage further cuts, that service will be severely undermanned. That would be a tragedy.

I spent a long time as a retained fireman in south Yorkshire. I know of the essential necessity of maintaining a turn out of about three minutes for the first call, four minutes for the second and about five minutes for the third. If that turnout time is extended there is a danger, not to property, but to life. I ask the Minister to look at that situation carefully because there were clear indications from his predecessor that he realised that there was a problem and that there would be an attempt to resolve it.

Before the abolition of the South Yorkshire county council we enjoyed one of the cheapest and most efficient transport systems in this country. The Government did not like it because of its cost. The Government closed their eyes to the fact that it was not just a cheap transport system — it made it possible for people in remote areas to take jobs with low wages because they had a cheap transport system on which to travel. Once the cost of transport was increased, they were priced out of their jobs.

A lot of my constituency is rural. Any further cuts in transport will mean a cut in rural services. The popular services will be retained because they pay for themselves. The less popular services will be subsidised by the transport executive. However, the least popular services will disappear. In areas where there was a bus service once every two hours, there will be a service once every four hours, or it may disappear altogether.

In the Barnsley metropolitan area, things seem to be moving gradually in the right direction. There seems to be a levelling-off in unemployment. I look forward not just to that levelling-off but to a decrease in unemployment. To achieve that we need the co-operation of the local authority because central Government cannot do that. An amount of money has been put into the area for factories and such things.

The problem with the rating system is that it treats Barnsley more or less as a shire county. It is not. Nor does the rating system take into account the number of collieries which have closed and on which the town relied for its prosperity. That has not been taken into consideration, so we are getting too little, too late. The Government's intention to raise employment levels and decrease our problems will fail if they do not give sufficient cognisance to the problems within the rating system. The new rating system will not work in my constituency. That is why I intend to fight it to the bitter end. It will do my constituents no good at all.

[Mr. Allen McKay]

I welcome what little relief there is in the Bill, but again it is too little, too late. The Government should learn a lesson from previous years. They should stop screwing local authorities into the ground. They have got their approach completely wrong. There should be a partnership between central Government and local government, not the enmity that is occurring. A partnership will improve the situation; the way central Government are going at present will ruin it.

9.18 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Christopher Chope): This is the second supplementary report for 1986-87. Two more reports and another year will pass before we and local authorities will know the final grant settlements for the year which ended last April. That is just one indication of the complexity and instability of the current system. That is why we shall be introducing a new, simpler grant system from 1990. I hope that everybody present in the House tonight will welcome that. That new system will take full account of the different spending needs of local authorities. No longer will grant depend on authorities' levels of expenditure and nor will there be any need for resource equalisation, which produces many of the incomprehensible aspects of the present system and, for example, many of the debating points that have been made this evening about ILEA.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) for the work that he did when he was a Minister in the Department of the Environment. He now argues strongly on behalf of his constituents, as he did before, about the injustice of the Bromley error. He understandably asks for complete reimbursement of the money that was lost as a result of that error. As my hon. and learned Friend the Minister said at the outset of the debate, the Government are determined to put such errors right and to legislate. That will result in the losses that have been sustained by Bromley and Kingston councils, to name but two, being restored. I understand my hon. Friend's plea that interest should be included. I am sure that, from his experience in the Department of the Environment, he will understand that the system is too complex to permit anything as simple as paying interest on forgone money. That is largely because it is not a matter of additional money being available. The issue is about redistribution between authorities when some have received more than their fair share.

The redistribution process takes place every time there is a supplementary report. The matter is complicated enough at the moment, but if those who gain, and it is shown that they should not have gained, are required to pay interest on the money that they received, and those who lost receive such interest it would make the system even more complicated than it is at present. I understand and sympathise with my hon. Friend's point. I hope that he will be content with the fact that, following his strong representations and those made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, the losses that were sustained by Kingston will be restored.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) raised the same point as he raised earlier, about the interest on Bromley's loss. On 5 March, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State told the House that it was not a matter of additional money being available. I must give my hon. Friend the same answer: it will not be possible to pay interest.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst pointed out, the matter of concessionary fares is not new. He argued that point strongly and strenuously. The news that I can give him is that we understand the wish of many London boroughs to see a change in the way in which the concessionary fares GRE is distributed in the capital. It has been raised by the London Boroughs Association for 1988-89, and we shall give it careful consideration. It is not a matter that we considered for the supplementary report before the House.

It would have required a significant methodology change that we would not normally have made retrospectively unless there were overwhelming reasons for doing so. My hon. Friend is the first to recognise that he has a difficult task. He is arguing from the point of view of his borough. All London boroughs entered into an agreement about how the concessionary fares costs should be distributed. That system has many critics, but, at the moment, the Association of London Authorities and the Association of County Councils are opposed to the sort of changes that my hon. Friend put forward.

The hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) raised many issues. We shall certainly write to him on the Tyne and Wear passenger transport authority point and provide him with a more detailed explanation than I would be able to give him this evening. He asked why some of the grant goes to non-local education authorities. There is a small effect on the grant of non-local educational authorities, but, overall, local education authorities gain £51·5 million, and non-local education authorities lose £500,000. That is yet another of the quirks of the present system that we shall resolve when we introduce our new arrangements for the community charge.

This was the first time that I and my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State had heard the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) speak in the House, so from our point of view it was his maiden speech. We were pleased by the tribute that he paid to his predecessor, Mr. Tom Torney, and if we did not know it before we have become aware of the hon. Gentleman's dexterity as a parliamentarian by the way that he was able to include, in a debate on the RSG, references to Trident and the Falklands.

The hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) raised an issue that was first raised on the first supplementary report for 1987-88, concerning why, when extra money is being given to meet the cost of teachers' salaries, no additional money is being paid to the Inner London education authority in grant. It is because of the nature of a block grant system, which is broadly designed to equalise rate poundage costs to ratepayers for providing services at a standard rate. It does not aim to support expenditure at a common percentage rate of grant. ILEA is out of grant because of the enormous wealth of the central authorities on which it precepts. It is possible to demonstrate that by the fact that the cost of the teachers' pay award, after taking account of grant changes, is 0·7p on the rates in Inner London, whereas it is 0·8p elsewhere, even after the grant has been paid. Therefore, it is grossly simplistic and unfair to suggest that the Government have taken money which was due to ILEA. Under the present system no money was due to ILEA.

The hon. Member for Barnsley West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) raised the issue of the South Yorkshire fire and civil defence authority. I am pleased to tell him that if he looks at the detailed figures in the supplementary report he will see that some £158,000 is going to that authority, which means that its grant total will increase to over £6·40 million.

The main effects of the supplementary report are that the AEG increases by £71 million to £11,950 million to reflect the latest estimate of specific and supplementary grants, which is an increase of £20 million. The Exchequer's contribution to the extra cost of teachers' pay is an extra £51 million in block grant. Provision is increased to £111 million, all of which goes on to education authorities' GREs.

We are reflecting other later expenditure information in GREs, including the boundary changes that were made on 1 April, 1985 and 1986. We have removed the temporary safety net that was originally designed to help those authorities that would have suffered an in-year and unexpected grant loss from the correction of the Bromley error. We have carried out a further round of grant recycling and we have made the England-Wales pooling adjustment. I comment the report to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 2) 1986-87 (House of Commons Paper No. 35), a copy of which was laid before this House on 9th July, be approved.

Rate Support Grant (Wales)

9.28 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Walker): I beg to move,

That the Welsh Rate Support Grant Supplementary (No. 2) Report 1986-87, which was laid before the House on 8 July, be approved.

In presenting this report I must say how impressed I am by the good working relationships that have been forged between central and local Government representatives in Wales since the inception of a separate Welsh rate support grant system in 1981, and by the effectiveness of the process of consultation between central and local Government in Wales.

The main purpose of this report is to ensure that additional expenditure provision and grant in respect of the teachers' pay award for 1986-87 is incorporated into the RSG settlement for that year. The report increases provision for relevant expenditure by £7 million in respect of the teachers' pay award and increases block grant by £5 million on that account.

The teachers have been awarded a substantial pay increase and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has asked them to be open-minded about devising effective, long-term machinery for settling questions affecting their pay and conditions. I am obviously encouraged that one union at least has decided to forgo further disruptive action and I hope that we shall now see an end to the disruption that has affected our schools for the past two years.

I have taken the opportunity, in the light of information now available from local authorities, to increase specific grants by £2·7 million to £177·4 million. This, together with the increase on account of teachers' pay, means that the report increases aggregate Exchequer grant by £7·7 million to £1,081·3 million. The aggregate amount of rate support grants and block grant are increased by £5 million to £822·1 million and £856·3 million respectively.

The first supplementary report for 1986-87 stated that the education pooling adjustment between England and Wales for the year would be carried out following the enactment of the Local Government Act 1987. That Act has now received Royal Assent and this report makes the adjustment, which each year compensates English authorities for the fact that more Welsh students are educated in England than are English students in Wales. A transfer of £3·5 million is made on account of that position.

In this report local authorities' revised estimates of current expenditure are £10·1 million higher than their budgeted expenditure reported in the first supplementary report and some £57 million, or 4·1 per cent. higher, than the Government's provision for current expenditure for the year. Total expenditure is some £31 million higher than provision; representing an overspend of £38 million by county councils and an underspend of £7 million by district councils. Ratepayers in Wales felt the consequences of this overspending by county councils in their rate demands for 1986-87.

When I met the Welsh Consultative Council on Local Government Finance last Friday I emphasised the need for all councils to work within the Government's expenditure plans. I would also remind it that extra grant is available to it if budgeted spending for 1987-88 is reduced. It knows that I am anxious to encourage local authorities throughout the Principality to adopt the best and most efficient management practices available, and I urge it to review the savings that could be achieved. Successive Audit Commission and Local Authorities Management Services and Computer Committee studies indicate the scope for real progress.

In my previous incarnation as Secretary of State for Energy, I looked into the potential for improving energy efficiency in local authorities throughout the United Kingdom. Some of the local authorities in Wales were some of the best authorities at coming forward with programmes that had reduced their expenditure on a considerable scale. Others are not pursuing such programmes. I would welcome a discussion with the local authorities on ways in which we could co-operate so that when there is some technical or management breakthrough or some management method that produces results that make expenditure more effective, it can be put into operation quickly throughout Wales. I commend my proposals for the supplementary report to the House.

9.32 pm

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I will be abnormally brief, partly because the Secretary of State and I have spent a long time in each other's company today discussing issues in relation to Wales, and partly because I find the rate support grant such algebraic gobbledegook that I am still trying to master the definitions of the definitions. However, I cannot promise that such brevity will be characteristic of our future exchanges on these issues.

The Secretary of State referred to the need for co-operation with the local authorities. I know from the district councils that they welcome such co-operation. I understand that there was a meeting, which they described as amicable — that is what we could expect with the Secretary of State — last Friday. The Secretary of State may care to tell us whether any meaningful progress was made.

The district councils have made it clear that they want more and better planned medium-term resources and a degree of stability rather than volatility in relation to the block grant settlements and capital spending powers. Whether these are long-term objectives that the Secretary of State sees as unattainable, I do not know. As a newcomer to the subject, I would appreciate his assessment.

The main financial element in this is the sum of £7 million towards the teachers' pay settlement. Settlement is the wrong word; I should say the pay imposition. We welcome the fact that belatedly and inadequately there is to be at least recognition by the Government that they got it wrong in relation to teachers. I am glad that this extra money is to be made available.

The tragedy for education is not just that we had the dispute but that in the course of the dispute and in the lead up to it — in the several years of erosion of the relative earning power of teachers — there has been a desperate loss throughout the country of key specialists and we will find it exceedingly difficult to attract them back. There is certainly a severe shortage of teachers, especially in the fields of mathematics, physics and design and technology. The Minister said that he hopes this will be the end of the dispute. I speak as one whose wife is a teacher, but not a militant one, and a member of one of the main teacher unions.

There is a tendency for the Government to misunderstand the sheer depth of anger among teachers who are not of a militant disposition because, as they see it, they have been despised over recent years. They are also angry because the Government have imposed rather than negotiated a pay settlement and have arbitrarily torn up the previous arrangement for negotiating. After all, we are dealing with mature, educated people who want at least to have a say in their own lives and prospects. In consultations with his colleague the Secretary of State for Education and Science the Minister will have to recognise that there is little chance of achieving the sort of peace that we want in our schools, certainly not with this £7 million, unless the Government come forward with some proper arrangements to provide meaningful pay negotiations.

I was alarmed by a report that the Secretary of State for Education is now talking in terms of imposing a no-strike rule on teachers. I hope that the report was incorrect. I know that the Secretary of State would be involved in such discussions. In a democracy I have no objection to people entering into no-strike agreements as long as they enter into them of their own volition. However, I find repugnant and unacceptable the idea that the Government would impose a no-strike arrangement on teachers. I hope that the Secretary of State will take this opportunity to say that the report which appeared the other day was a mistake. At least the extra money now available is a partial payment of the arrears owed to the teachers, and in that sense we certainly do not want to block it.

9.38 pm

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): As I understand it, this debate is on a Welsh rate support grant supplementary report to a Welsh rate grant supplementary report to a Welsh rate support grant report. I have every sympathy with the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) because it takes a bit of working out to find exactly where we are in terms of the annual debate on the rate support grant.

I was glad to catch the tail end of the previous debate and somewhat relieved to hear the assurance by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment that we shall have to go through this process for only another two years. In view of the difficulties that the right hon. Member for Swansea, West shares with me about understanding the RSG, I hope that this will convert him to the Government's proposed rate reforms.

These matters are complex and almost impossible to understand, though they can usually be simplified to the following equation. The Government provide increased grant, the Opposition says that it is not enough, to which we retort that we are not even convinced that local authorities are spending even their existing resources efficiently and effectively. As my right hon. Friend and the right hon. Member for Swansea, West have said, the biggest item in this second supplementary report is in respect of increased expenditure by county councils following increases in teachers' pay. My understanding of it is that there has not been a mistake by the Government that has led to the extra £7 million being provided. This was promised all along to allow for the May increase to the teachers for 1986-87.

As I said, when we discussed the last rate support grant supplementary report on 5 May, the Government's pay proposals for teachers are extremely generous and give the teachers a 16·4 per cent. pay rise which, added to existing increases, will mean that teachers will have received a 25 per cent. increase between March 1986 and September of this year. That pay award is unique in its generosity, and most other groups would be delighted to receive it.

Most of us know from our increased contact with the electorate over the past few weeks, particularly that with the teaching profession, on the doorstep if not actually in the schools, that pay is no longer an issue between the Government and the teachers. Negotiating machinery is still an issue and one that I hope that the Government will resolve, certainly by March 1990.

The Government have shown their generosity and determination to improve education and educational standards. I hope that local authorities, and especially Clwyd county council, will respond by ensuring that resources are spent more efficiently and effectively.

I can give two instances of where this is not happening in Clwyd. The first is surplus places. There are 22,300 surplus places in primary and secondary schools, in the county costing £3·5 million a year to keep empty. The Government have no wish to remove all those surplus places. Our target is to remove two fifths of them. That would save £1·4 million, which could be reallocated to good effect in the education budget. It is important that Clwyd makes progress in removing these places.

The Government are not anti-rural schools. We do not want to close all, or even many such schools. However, it is absurd to have schools with only nine pupils. That is not in the interests of the educational and social development of the children. They cannot have a school football team or a choir. Nor is it a way of realising the full potential contribution of a teacher when he or she has to teach so few pupils, often of different ages but in the same class. We have to look at this problem, particularly as I have in my constituency so many hard-pressed urban primary schools, some of them with classes numbering up to 43.

The second example of the inefficient use of resources by Clwyd county council, of its wrong set of priorities, is its arts project centred on Bodelwyddan castle. The project is costing a massive £545,000 a year to run, offset by an income of merely £11,000. I do not want to be thought idiosyncratic, but the expenditure at Bodelwyddan has risen to a worrying extent. I was reassured when, during the election campaign, my right hon. Friend's predecessor as Secretary of State was in my constituency, having recently visited Bodelwyddan castle. He thought that the whole project was "a shambles" and he was concerned about the amount of money that Clwyd was spending on it. Having visited the castle, he saw the points that I am making.

I see the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones), who is a member of Clwyd county council smiling benignly. I do not want to put the hon. Gentleman on the spot in the way that I have put so many of his colleagues on the spot, but I notice that he is not rising to intervene and say that he is greatly in favour of the project. I know that he is one of the sensible people who is opposed to it and he is worried about the cockeyed priorities of the council.

Such expenditure of well over £500,000 cannot be justified when the schools and libraries book budget has been slashed since 1985 from £75,000 to £15,000. It has remained at that figure ever since, although an extra £18,000 was allocated for GCSE books this year. I regularly go round my constituency, as no doubt many colleagues go round theirs, and I am appalled by the state of the school library book stock.

The last time that I raised this subject in the House, I had the support of the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek). I hope that the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West will endorse my point as well. It is wrong that the county council in Clwyd is spending so much money on an arts project when it is not fulfilling its statutory obligations with regard to education.

I am also very concerned about the cuts in real terms in the school maintenance budget that have taken effect over the past few years. As a result of my visits to schools, I can endorse what the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West said earlier this afternoon in the Welsh Grand Committee. He referred to the neglect of school building maintenance within the county. There is no doubt that that is false economy.

I recently visited Ysgol Bryn Coch junior school in Mold. The headmaster took me around the building. It has not been painted internally for 18 years. Posters are stuck up to prevent the plaster falling down on to children's heads. He showed me various spots which can be pressed in the corridor ceilings, from which water comes through even when it is not raining. The water drips gently when it is not raining, but they have to put out buckets when there is a heavy shower. Last Friday I visited Ysgol Gwenffrwd at Holywell. The window frames at that school have not been regularly repainted. As a result they are now completely rotten. The headmaster told me that an estimate has been obtained for completely replacing the window frames and that estimate was between £100,000 and £200,000.

Clwyd county council is neglecting its statutory obligations with regard to the education of children in the county. Parents have a right to be annoyed. I for one am quite prepared to go to the Welsh Office and ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for more money for education in the county, but only when I am convinced that existing resources are being spent efficiently and effectively. At the moment, they are not.

"Clwyd is a rotten council and it has got its priorities wrong." — [Official Report, 25 March 1987; Vol. 113, c. 547.]

Those are the words of the hon. Member for Wrexham, not mine. However, they reflect my sentiments. I hope that we members for Clwyd can form an alliance — with a small "a" — across the Chamber. We are members of different parties, but we represent the people and the children of the county. Together with the Government, the Secretary of State and the Welsh Office I hope we can bring home to Clwyd county council the fact that it has its priorities completely wrong. It must get its priorities right for the sake of the people of the county and of their children.

9.46 pm

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Having made my customary remarks about the Secretary of State for Wales at another time, I welcome him to this continuing saga of debates on the Welsh rate support grant formula. Those of us who take part in these debates are becoming a bit of an inward-looking small crowd. The hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) has hit upon a theme that he has hit on many times in these debates. I have been doing my homework. I looked at the similar debate on 18 July 1984when the hon. Member for Delyn spoke. Apart from attacking Clwyd county council, not surprisingly, he concentrated on Bodelwyddan castle. He referred to that in column 430 of the Official Report. Lo and behold, on 16 January 1985 in another rate support grant for Wales debate at column 434 of the Official Report, the hon. Member for Delyn again concentrated on Bodelwyddan castle. When the Secretary of State has had an opportunity to travel around Wales, he will get to know places lke Bodelwyddan castle. However, in the meantime he will hear plenty about such places from his hon. Friend the Member for Delyn.

The other familiar feature of these debates is that we are discussing an incredibly complicated subject. It is the old saw that there were only three people who knew anything about this: one is dead, one has forgotten, and the other has gone mad. That is the feeling we get in these debates every year. The Secretary of State is new to this version of rate support grant debating. Some of us are perennially doomed to go on in every debate on the same subject.

Seriously, the right hon. Gentleman will have noticed already since he became Secretary of State for Wales that there is a different tenor to our debates on local government finance from those that he may have been used to in the English context. Sometimes, we have criticised Welsh local authorities for not pressing harder to spend where services need expenditure. However, by and large, over recent years, those authorities have followed Government guidance. To that extent, many authorities have asked whether we need the same mechanism in Wales as exists in England, which has been used in England against local authorities.

If the formula involves a punishment of loss of grant if expenditure exceeds a certain threshold, it inevitably causes difficulties for the treasurers on the finance committees of local authorities because they cannot plan ahead. That is especially so when there are uncertainties outside their own control, such as teacher's pay, for which they have to make forecasts for the coming year and make provision. It is not until three months after the end of a financial year that they know the exact amount of money that is coming through. Assurances will have been given but authorities would be afraid of overspending because of the loss of grant that would result. Often they will have held back on expenditure and then towards the end of the financial year, thinking that they will be all right, decide to accelerate certain projects. The result is that expenditure patterns may not follow real needs within local authority areas.

In opening this short debate, the Secretary of State underlined his hope that local authorities would underspend, as that would give them more grant. That is the logic of his remarks. If grant-related expenditure has any meaning at all, it reflects need in an area. Local authorities should be encouraged to spend up to that level and not to underspend. If they are underspending, they may not be providing some of the services that are needed so desperately in many communities in Wales.

The Secretary of State will be coming increasingly aware over the next few months of the various forms of deprivation that exist in various communities, and not only in urban areas. There is deprivation in the valleys, where there are housing problems, for example, and there is deprivation in rural areas that do not have the wealth of some of the richer English rural areas such as Worcester. In some rural areas in Wales income is particularly low, the maintenance of services is extemely expensive, and the expense falls on a relatively small rate base. This means that the pressure on local authorities to maintain a basic level of services is great. They have little room in which to manoeuvre.

I hope that we may move away from the sort of rate support grant debate that we are having this evening and which we have had over recent years. As the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) said from the Opposition Front Bench, we should be looking for greater stability. There should be a regime in which local authorities know what their resources will be and in which they will be compensated when changes take place that are outside their control. A rolling capital programme would enable them to make a coherent attack on needs in their areas. The present ad hoc capital programme often results in a rush of finance immediately before a general election, for example. We all know that many road improvement schemes were visible during the general election campaign. That cannot be said of this Government alone, because every Government will use the same tactics. There is a need for greater stability and a pattern within which planning and strategy can be shaped to meet real needs.

If there is a change from the present rate support grant structure and rate structure, I hope that there will be a means of maintaining equalisation in a way that meets the needs of communities. One of the factors that the Secretary of State may not have come across very often in England—it is to be found in certain English counties but in many areas of Wales—is sparsity and super-sparsity. I have no doubt that he will come across the factor increasingly in his deliberations with local authority associations.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Merionnydd Nant Conwy): Will my right hon. Friend accept that there is such a problem in areas such as the vale of Aberconwy, which is a sparsely populated area within my constituency? There is a much heavier density of population in the coastal area that comes within the constituency of the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Conwy (Mr. Roberts). There is the additional problem of the massive influx of tourists and the on-costs of tourism that are not reflected adequately in the rate support grant.

Mr. Wigley: Indeed. This issue arose in the tourism debate two Fridays ago. We know that tourism brings advantages and resources to certain areas, but it brings additional costs as well. For example, there are the costs of maintaining roads, car parks and environmental services generally. In national park areas, there are costs to be met as well. We are looking for a formula—we work to one now and I have no doubt that we shall do so in future—that is sufficiently finely tuned to meet the deprivations of the valley communities, which are great, the problems of inner-city Cardiff, Swansea and Newport, and also those of the rural areas. It is necessary to have the wisdom of Solomon to arrive at the right balance.

We should be aiming at a level of service and if we can maintain a level throughout Wales in terms of social services, education, roads, environmental services and leisure services that is to be found in some of the more prosperous counties in England, we shall increase the real standard of living and the quality of life of our people. That must be our target — to establish standards in terms of what is obtained for the residents, and then to find a means of financing it. I know that it is easier said than done, but I hope that, as we move ahead from the present structure of local government financial support, it will be the main determinant of our policies.

9.54 pm

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I welcome the Secretary of State's announcement of an additional £7 million for teachers' pay. However, I should like to concentrate almost entirely on one aspect of county council spending—that is, education spending. It is clear from the figures presented by the right hon. Gentleman that education spending accounts for £708 million, and is thus way ahead of any other part of the expenditure.

I want to concentrate on that because, as it is the biggest part of the expenditure, there are difficult problems to grapple with, particularly in Wales. I should particularly like to follow on from what was said by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) about population sparsity in rural areas. In Powys, part of which I represent, the population is 111,000 — only 4 per cent. of the total population of Wales—yet Powys covers 25 per cent. of the country's surface area. That creates tremendous problems of population sparsity. Powys also has 25 per cent. of the roads in Wales. The county council has to grapple with those factors to balance its budget.

I criticise the activities of the Audit Commission in this context. I know that the Secretary of State and his predecessor have relied on Audit Commission reports to make decisions. Those reports have been given to county councillors, who have also tended to make decisions on that basis. As a result of one such report, 13 small village schools in Powys were in danger of closure. The matter hung in the balance. Fortunately however, after two debates in the county council the proposals were thrown out. I think that the county council was quite right to make that decision, because only three weeks later the Secretary of State for Education had a conversion on the road to the general election and announced that village schools in England could stay open as well.

The district audit service paper set out to analyse and criticise the county council's expenditure programme for education. It calculated that Powys was spending £4 million above average on primary education. That analysis was wholly misleading, as no attempt was made to quantify the additional cost to the county of providing education in the most sparsely populated area in the whole of England and Wales. Powys is unique in that respect, and the additional cost is therefore fundamental The analysis also turns out to be educationally unsound.

It is all due to a lack of finance to take account of the sparsity factor. The distribution in Powys is one pupil per 26 hectares. The average in Wales being 4 hectares. The English average in non-metropolitan counties is 2·5 hectares. As a result of that disparity, school transport alone cost £1 million more in Powys than the average for primary and secondary schoolchildren and is three and a half times the Welsh average — just to cart schoolchildren around for excessive distances from their homes to their schools.

Mr. Raffan: I should like to pin the hon. Gentleman down. He is always on about the issue of rural schools. But is his party prepared to support any rural school, irrespective of how small it is? Does he believe that it is in the interests of children to be taught in schools that are down to eight or nine pupils? Will the hon. Gentleman answer yes or no to that question?

Mr. Livsey: There are some unique cases. In my constituency there is a school with only 16 pupils. If, however, that school were closed, children aged four, five and six would have to make a 24-mile round trip for their education. That is a unique case, and the school must be kept open. Primary schools with 20 or 25 pupils need to be kept open in predominantly rural areas. In Powys, there are 46 primary schools where there are no more than 50 pupils on the school roll. Due to the geography, 41 per cent. of schoolchildren in primary schools live outside the large areas of population. In Powys, large areas of population mean communities of about 1,200, but that unique factor is not taken into consideration. Education in Powys costs 16 per cent. more than the average for the rest of Wales, but it receives only 11 per cent. of additional funding.

Because of the sparseness of population, the fire service costs 12 per cent. more than it does in the rest of Wales, and roads cost 128 per cent. more because the road system in Powys accounts for 25 per cent. of the Welsh road system. There are 1,700 road bridges in Powys, about half of which need to be repaired. The rate support grant settlements take no account of that fact.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Does my hon. Friend agree that in the context of a Government who believe in parental choice for education it is most important that village primary schools should be maintained? The vast majority of parents in rural mid-Wales, particularly in my hon. Friend's constituency and in mine, infinitely prefer to send their children to village primary schools, and if necessary they are prepared to pay for the education of their children.

Mr. Livsey: My hon. and learned Friend is correct. That is why there have been so many battles to keep certain schools open. It is the preferred option of those communities, some of which have grown in recent years. The school rolls have increased because people prefer to live in smaller communities.

Libraries cost Powys 15 per cent. more than the Welsh average. The Audit Commission's categories of local government expenditure bear no relationship to the sparsity of population in many parts of Wales.

Housing in Wales is crucial. For much of the day we have been discussing in the Welsh Grand Committee the poor housing stock in Wales. The Secretary of State should provide more houses to rent. He should also encourage housing associations to build more houses for key workers. Until the funds from the sale of council houses are released for the building of more houses, there will be insufficient houses to rent. We favour the sale of council houses to their occupants, but if insufficient houses to rent are being built there will be a housing crisis and long waiting lists. The Government must take that major factor into account.

I ask the Secretary of State to back the initiative of Powys, Dyfed and Gwynedd who have approached the European Community to obtain more funding and greater recognition of their plight because of sparsity of population. We suffer from under funding because we are not recognised as being eligible for grant aid. Intermediate development grant aid was taken from Powys in 1983. Therefore, that precludes us from financial assistance from the European Community—and is a source of funding that would assist us all round and, I believe, the Secretary of State, too.

10.04 pm

Mr. Peter Walker: I share completely the view of the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) about the jargon of the rate support grant. When I was privileged to be the first-ever Secretary of State for the Environment—a position that I enjoyed immensely and that I found was one of the most exciting positions that one could occupy — the only thing that spoilt that position was having to deal constantly with the rate support grant. The only pleasure that I had in leaving that position was that I thought that at least I should never again have to deal with it. I believe that the unbelievable jargon of the rate support grant — this will doubtless cause me great difficulty in any coming negotiations — has been invented by the Treasury so that nobody can understand what is happening.

The right hon. Member for Swansea, West asked me about a point about stability that was put to me when I had a meeting with local authorities in Wales last Friday at the request of the district councils. Of course, I should like planning arrangements that would give local authorities the maximum stability. In fairness to all of us who are involved in government, whether local or central, I should say that the reality is that we are happy with stability when the level of expenditure is to our satisfaction, but we are massively against stability when it is not.

One point that was mentioned by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) was housing problems. From previous experience I know that one of the problems of suddenly increasing expenditure on housing improvements is that the jerry builder comes in on a massive scale very quickly and a lot of bad work is done very suddenly. It would be better if such things could be organised on a more planned and arranged basis.

On the teachers' pay offer—the right hon. Member for Swansea, West said that it had been imposed—I believe that many people in the country would like such a pay increase to be imposed on them. That increase was provided by the Government and I hope that as a result of it relationships will be improved. All of us are constituency Members of Parliament and, over the years, meet teachers and visit our schools, and we have immense admiration for the great majority of teachers and for the dedicated work that they do for our children.

My hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) rightly referred to the problem of tackling surplus school places. It is not only a negative problem. As we all know from our constituency experience, the closure of any school of any description is unpopular with the parents whose children attend that school. However, we must weigh up carefully the costs that are involved in those surplus places and consider what that amount of money could do for education if it was better applied.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the Secretary of State accept that when one is considering the closure of village schools, one of the factors that one should take into account—I recognise that it is only one of the factors—is the position of the school as part of the community, and not only its position as an educational institute?

Mr. Walker: Yes, of course I do. Indeed, there was specific mention of that in my party's manifesto at the recent election. I recognise that it would be easy for us all, as politicians, to say that we shall never be in favour of the closure of any school of any description and that that would be popular with the people who are immediately concerned. However, we do not have to face the other side of that equation. If the number on the school's roll is such that the expenditure involved is depriving other areas of education, a balance must be made. It is difficult ever to obtain that balance and to obtain popularity by supporting the idea that using that money elsewhere in the education system is wise and sensible.

My hon. Friend the Member for Delyn gave some examples of the expenditure priorities for his county council. He rightly concentrated on the important factors that parents consider to be the correct priority.

The hon. Member for Carnarfon (Mr. Wigley) dealt with some of the problems of planning and specifically mentioned the problems of tourism in some areas. I recognise that. At present a working party chaired by the tourist board with local authority and Welsh office representation has a remit to look for better methods of reflecting tourism needs. In due course I shall take account of the report and its results and consider them carefully. The potential of tourism in Wales is considerable, not just in terms of income and revenue, but in terms of job creation because it is a labour intensive industry. As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, tourism has far-reaching implications which affect local authority expenditure. I welcome the fact that at present this is being investigated and I shall examine the report with great interest.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor concentrated on education and criticised the Audit Commission. I have seen the work of the Audit Commission in a range of Departments and it does a sophisticated, good job. Obviously, if auditors are suddenly called to investigate a matter, they are not aware of all the implications. I would hate us to get into the habit of thinking that the Audit Commission is foolish, so we will reject everything it says. As a Secretary of State in various Departments I have found that it has come to correct, sensible conclusions which have resulted in considerable improvements in efficiency.

On the other hand, if we think that the Audit Commission has reached conclusions without considering all the factors, the right process is for us to say immediately to it, "Interesting report, but we do not think that you have considered a, b and c. Look at those factors and come to a conclusion." The Audit Commission and LAMSAC, which is the local authorities' organisation for looking at efficiency, have produced good, valid reports. One of the disappointments is that some local authorities take them up and others do nothing about them. There is no doubt that when seeking to improve the efficiency of local authority expenditure we could learn a great deal from independent investigations which come up with ideas and suggestions.

I should like to discuss with local authorities in Wales how, when reports are produced, we can, throughout the Principality, consider them quickly and decide whether they are a bad idea. We can decide then not to put them into operation because they are wrong for whatever reasons, or to implement them because they are a good idea. If we do that we shall improve the efficiency of both local and central government.

Mr. Wigley: The Secretary of State will be aware that from time to time the Audit Commission in Wales has been criticised. Sometimes it has been felt that the Audit Commission relates to a norm, an average or its experience in a generality of circumstances which may not correspond to highly different circumstances and localities, whether regarding rural matters or the Welsh language. Can the Secretary of State impress on the Audit Commission the need to be sensitive to the differences that exist from area to area?

Mr. Walker: Yes, of course. When we feel that the Audit Commission has got it wrong, instead of merely talking about it in a debate we should go directly to it and say, "You have done this before. We think you have got the report wrong for these reasons and we would like your comments on our argument against the report." Our relationship with the Audit Commission should not be hostile or particularly friendly; I want a genuine dialogue. We should look objectively at what it recommends and take advantage of what we can.

I commend the order to the House. It will provide the local authorities of Wales with additional money which they require for the purposes related.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Welsh Rate Support Grant Supplementary (No. 2) Report 1986-87 (House of Commons Paper No. 25), a copy of which was laid before this House on 8th July, be approved.

Urban Development

10.14 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. David Trippier): I beg to move,

That the Urban Development Corporations (Financial Limits) Order 1987, a copy of which was laid before this House on 1st May 1987, in the last Session of Parliament, be approved.

Urban development corporations are set up under the powers in part XVI of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, to regenerate their designated areas. The bulk of UDCs' activities are financed by grant-in-aid, paid out of money voted by Parliament with additional finance provided by loans from the national loans fund. UDCs may also plough back their receipts.

The 1980 Act set a limit of £200 million on the total of UDCs' grants and borrowing but provided for this to be raised to £400 million by order. The New Towns and Urban Development Corporations Act 1985 raised the statutory limit to £600 million with a similar power to raise it to £800 million subject to affirmative resolution of this House.

Present spending plans for the current financial year would take UDCs' overall grant and loan to within £3 million to £4 million of the £600 million. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has therefore made this order, which will increase the limit to £800 million.

The main functions of a UDC are to assemble, reclaim and service land, to provide infrastructure and to encourage development. A UDC brings a co-ordinated, single-minded and public sector backed approach to the regeneration of its area.

Urban development corporations make effective use of public money by concentrating it on particular problems in particular areas and by using it to stimulate private sector investment. They represent a key part of this Government's attack on urban problems. There are now seven UDCs. The first two, the Merseyside and London docklands development corporations, were established in 1981. Five more have been established this year. Four of them are in England — the Black Country, Teesside, Trafford Park and Tyne and Wear development corporations — and one in Wales, the Cardiff bay development corporation. There is no doubt that Merseyside development corporation and London docklands development corporation, have been successful, although their job is not yet complete. The House might find it helpful to have a brief summary of their achievements.

The Merseyside development corporation —

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Before the Minister tells us about the urban development corporations' achievements, can he tell us how much money per year the relevant local boroughs have had from the Government so that we can compare their ability to spend on equal terms? What do the three London boroughs get compared with the £800 million that he proposes for the LDDC and so on?

Mr. Trippier: I knew that I was unwise to allow the hon. Gentleman to intervene. I can certainly give him the figures now for the amount that the LDDC receives annually, and I shall refer to those in my wind-up if I have the information to hand. I shall try to make the comparison for which the hon. Gentleman asks.

The Merseyside development corporation was set up because the Government recognised that the dereliction of the docks coupled with a depressed local economy called for substantial public sector resources to regenerate the area and stimulate private sector investment. Last month, within days of taking up my new responsibilities, I visited the MDC and was impressed at what had been achieved. The UDC had spent about £140 million in total. Its capital expenditure is already in excess of £100 million, with more committed. The private sector has responded and the results are there for all to see.

The corporation mounted the country's first ever international garden festival in 1984, attracting over 3·3 million visitors. Its great success brought new confidence to the area. It has restored the Albert dock warehouses.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): What has happened to the garden festival site subsequently?

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman knows very well what has happened. He will have heard me say, just a few moments ago, that I paid an official visit to the area. He is also well aware that the Merseyside development corporation is seeking, through a partnership with local authority, to work out a compromise so that that part of Liverpool can be further developed.

The MDC has restored the Albert dock warehouses — the largest group of grade 1 listed buildings in the country. About 1·25 million sq ft of buildings have been refurbished. Partnership with the private sector has provided high-quality commercial development with the prospect of residential development to come. In 1988, with the opening of the Tate of the north in Liverpool, we shall see the completion of a transformation that has converted an area of gross dereliction into a hive of activity. By the end of the 1980s private sector investment in the Albert dock scheme is expected to exceed £60 million in return for half that amount from the public sector. Already some 2 million people visit the area each year and this is expected to rise to 5 million eventually. In all, over 200 acres of derelict land have been reclaimed by MDC for housing and commercial development and a further 200 acres of land and water have been reclaimed for recreation and public open space.

MDC is extending its regeneration activities to the area south of the Albert dock and its waterfront strategy envisages a number of tourism and leisure-related projects that will bring desperately needed jobs and investment to the area. The corporation estimates that around 2,300 permanent jobs have already been saved or created within its area and this is not to mention the 1,000 or so people working at any one time on construction and related projects.

I turn now to the London docklands development corporation. In July 1981, LDDC was charged with the regeneration of over eight square miles of London's docklands. Much of this area was severely run down following the closure of the docks and the associated decline of local industry. Land was left derelict and polluted. It was a formidable task. Just six years later LDDC has transformed its area. The docks are once again a focus for growth. Over £2·2 billion of private sector investment commitments have been attracted to the area at a cost of only £324 million in public expenditure. So, for each pound of public money spent, £7 of private money have been attracted. About 7,000 homes have so far been completed on LDDC sites and on private land, mainly by the private sector; 2·5 million sq ft of non-residential floorspace have been completed, 7·5 million sq ft are under construction and a further 7·5 million sq ft are committed. Ten thousand new jobs were attracted to the area between 1981 and 1986.

Improving access to this rather isolated area of London has been a high priority. The docklands light railway, which opens on time and within budget on 30 July, was promoted and part-funded by the corporation. Extensions to the east, and to the City, have now been proposed. In addition some 15 miles of new roads have been built. But the corporation's activities go far wider than that. Some 227 environmental projects have been carried out at a total cost of £26·7 million. About £10 million has been given to projects in the community and social areas to help meet LDDC's wider objectives of making docklands a pleasant environment in which to work and live and £2·4 million has been given to new and existing smaller businesses to ensure that they can survive and expand alongside the major schemes.

The corporation's latest corporate plan shows planned expenditure rising rapidly as its infrastructure programme reaches its peak. Some £135 million is to be spent on projects in this financial year alone, financed by a combination of grant aid and receipts from land sales. Over the next six years to 1993, LDDC has plans for an impressive list of infrastructure, social and environmental projects that will be financed partly from land sales. They will bring the process of regeneration rapidly to the point at which it is self-sustaining. Private sector interest is high. There is now competition for development in an area which, not many years ago, no developer would consider.

I turn now to the new UDCs. The four new English UDCs were each the subject of preliminary studies by consultants. Each UDC will be responsible for drawing up its own strategy, but the consultants' reports indicate what they might achieve. For example for Trafford Park DC, the consultants anticipate nearly 1,000 acres reclaimed or developed, well over 10 million sq ft of floorspace developed and more than 700 houses provided. For the Black Country DC, the consultants recommend the construction of a spine road and anticipate as much as 4 million sq ft of industrial development, 1,700 new homes and 250 acres of open space and parks.

On Teesside the consultants believe that 1 million sq ft of industrial and warehousing space could be provided, a further 1 million sq ft of commercial and retail space and over 2,000 homes. Their recommended strategy includes several projects to change the image of Teesside, including an international nature reserve on the wetlands to the north of the Tees.

In Tyne and Wear the consultants envisage that nearly 1,000 acres of derelict land could be reclaimed for new development, with the creation of over 1 million sq ft of commercial and industrial floorspace and 1,300 houses, taking advantage of the dramatic and potentially attractive locations provided by the rivers.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Will my hon. Friend confirm that both those assessments include assessments of the potential for job creation and that the total for the two corporations is over 9,000 jobs — 6,000 on Teesside and 3,500 on Tyneside?

Mr. Trippier: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention. It is vitally important in all those areas — the four UDCs that have already been established and those to be established — that we try wherever possible to encourage enterprise. An important part of that process is encouraging the new jobs that go with that enterprise.

The Cardiff Bay DC is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. I understand that it, too, has embarked on a series of studies to examine development plans. Our initial estimate is that the new UDCs will each spend more than £100 million over the next decade. The total amount of spending, and its profile over time will depend in each case on the quality of the proposals that they bring forward, the response they receive from the private sector and public resources available.

Whatever the precise allocation of resources to the UDCs, there is no doubt that the total funds to be made available to them must be significant if they are to achieve their goals. This order provides the headroom within which the first two UDCs can build on their success, and the new UDCs can embark on the first stage of their task. I commend the order to the House.

10.26 pm

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): The procedure on financial limit orders such as the Urban Development Corporations (Financial Limits) Order 1987 is that the Opposition usually does not vote against increases in money that might bring some benefit to areas. To all intents and purposes, this order appears to increase funds. The maximum allowed by the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 was £400 million. As the Minister has said, the New Towns and Urban Development Corporations Act 1985 increased that amount to £800 million. We are now considering an order that will allow a maximum of £800 million. However, there is one difference. When it was £400 million, there were only two development corporations — London and Liverpool. There are now another five. The increase from £400 million to £800 million for seven urban developments rather than two is not an increase: it is a major cut. If £800 million has to be shared among seven urban development corporations, when previously there was £400 million shared between two, the seven will not get as much as the previous two. That is common logic. That is not a massive increase.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman should bear in mind the size of the areas that we are dealing with — the size of London docklands compared with the size of Merseyside. It is very different indeed.

Mr. Roberts: I shall come to the size of the area and the unique nature of the London docklands in a minute when I will point out where the Government's policies, in trying to project what they call a success in London docklands, are misguided. It is misleading to suggest that there is a massive increase in money. Notwithstanding that, the Opposition will not divide the House. Whatever little money for public expenditure one manages to wring out of a Conservative Government is welcome when they are the Government who cut public expenditure. There should be no mistake that it is a cut.

[Mr. Roberts]

This is an important debate because the concept of the urban development corporations, as the Minister has tried to outline, is crucial to the Government's so-called inner-city policy initiative. There have been two long-standing urban development corporations that the Government claim are successful that we can look at in terms of the policies outlined by the Government. Apart from the selling-off of council estates over the heads of tenants, and in some cases the selling-off of tenants, this seems to be one of the crucial parts, with no great increase in public expenditure, of the Government's long-heralded inner-city initiatives.

The London docklands development corporation is unique. To suggest that eight square miles of land, with massive areas available for housing and other developments, situated right in the centre of London next to the City can be repeated elsewhere throughout the country and applied in other inner-city areas is nonsense. Whether one considers it successful or unsuccessful, as some of my colleagues will say later, it is unique. There is no City of London, or equivalent in Merseyside, Tyne and Wear, Trafford Park, the Black Country, Teesside or Cardiff. What the London docklands development corporation has done will not be repeated elsewhere and has not been repeated in Liverpool, where the docklands development corporation covers parts of the city of Liverpool and parts of my constituency in the local authority area of Sefton.

The other major difference between the London docklands development corporation area and the Merseyside experience is that there were people living and working in the London docklands before the development corporation was established. That was not true, except for one small council estate in my constituency, of Liverpool docklands.

Despite what the Government claim, the way that the London docklands has been developed by the corporation has ignored the local people. The corporation has brought in city-type office development; there has been speculative development; buildings have been erected; the plastic, steel and glass is there and there is plenty of activity for everyone to see, but conditions for local people have not improved in terms of jobs or housing conditions. Nothing has been done for the local community.

Jobs and housing are the two key matters with regard to the inner city—except for law and order and drugs—at which Government policy is directed. Jobs have been created in docklands but others have been driven out to make way for the large, prestigious, speculative developments. Compulsory purchase orders have been used on small and medium businesses that used to employ local labour, which has now been driven out. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) will point out later, on the Government's figures there has been a net loss of jobs.

Of the jobs that have been created, only 8 per cent. have gone to people who were living in the area before the London docklands development corporation was set up. The local community has been shut out. The developments that the docklands corporation has initiated have been for labour that is commuting in to the area. The docklands light railway may be a welcome development, but it does not go through the populated areas where the existing communities live. It is designed as a form of in-and-out transport and the proposed new West Ferry road, if it is built, will destroy local communities in docklands. A lot of the activity has been speculative and has created jobs for people outside, with some people coming from the United States of America. When I was in America recently there were advertisements in the press about the luxury housing in docklands saying, "It is the place to move to; bring your business and buy a house."

As to housing and private capital, 90 per cent. of the available land in the borough of Tower Hamlets for housing was handed over to the development corporation. What did it do? It massively increased the land values. That increase in land values has been the main source of finance. The private finance that the Minister talks about is not people putting money down, it is people obtaining land, selling it at inflated prices and using that money to build in docklands for profit. That is where a lot of the private finance has come from. No real private capital has yet been invested on any significant scale, except for what has accrued from the massive increase in land values as a result of the development corporation being declared.

The consequence of the massively inflated land values is that housing is for sale at prices that none of the local people have any hope of affording. One has only to look at the advertisements for houses. A one-bedroom flat in Acorn yard costs £41,000. A three-bedroom house in Greenland quay costs £109,000. The development corporation claims that it offers the houses at, for example, £40,000, but that is a lot of money for people on Merseyside and elsewhere. The development corporation thinks that that is cheap. Local people cannot afford that, but within three or four months of them being bought the houses are resold for £100,000 or more. I know, because I live in the east end of London, that if one wants to get hold of one of the houses and one is not a local resident, there are rackets for buying fake local rent books so that one can prove that one is a local resident in order to buy a house at £40,000. Such houses are not lived in but are sold for £90,000 or £110,000 a few months later. Therefore, there is no housing for local people, but the areas are attracting a lot of people who are very rich and can afford houses at prices of £100,000.

It is obscene that there are 7,000 people on Tower Hamlets' waiting list. There are 1,000 homeless people in Tower Hamlets. The Liberal council is claiming that it cannot house the Bengali families and is evicting them. It is obscene that they cannot get housing but that riverside flats are selling for £500,000. Local people, because of those developments, are being denied access to their own river in the area where they grew up. That is the sort of casino economy that is being created in the London docklands.

However, Liverpool is different. As I said, very few people lived in the docklands area except for those on the small Rimrose estate. As the Minister admitted, the Merseyside docklands development corporation has produced only three initiatives. One was the garden festival. That was very successful as a one-off. People came to see it. It was very prestigious. However, the year after, because the Government would not support Liverpool city council and the other local councils in terms of rate support grant to enable them to take it over, a company called Transworld took it over. That company opened it for one season and then went into liquidation leaving hundreds of thousands of pounds' worth of debts. Since then—the Minister said that he has visited the area—there is a big fence around it, local people cannot get in.

There is nothing there except the remains of a garden festival that once existed, with a fence round to keep people out because the Government, for doctrinaire reasons, would not allow the local authorities to take it over and run it and would not give them the rate support grant to enable them to do so. That was one initiative that was welcome at the time but it did not last very long.

Another initiative is the Albert dock. It is said that 90 per cent. of the contracts to develop it went to local firms, which, I should point out, do not necessarily employ local labour. The dock is welcome. It looks good. I visit it and enjoy it. However, if anyone suggests that that is a significant contribution to the area or that it will have a significant impact on the inner-city problems of Merseyside, Bootle, Liverpool and elsewhere they are fooling themselves. It is very nice and it is welcome but it is not stopping the hard drug-taking. It has done nothing about the high levels of unemployment, especially youth unemployment on Merseyside.

The other day I went just one mile away in my constituency and drove around with someone I brought in from another part of the country. We had just visited the prestigious Albert dock and as we were driving around my friend said, "Do you know what this area reminds me of? It is like the pictures we see on television after the bomb has dropped. It is like the pictures of where the survivors live after a nuclear war." The dereliction and empty factories are there for everybody to see. Welcome as the Albert dock is, it is not a major contribution to solving the inner-city problems of Merseyside.

Another initiative, welcome in itself, is that the development corporation has taken the negative value away from derelict land by cleaning it up. The land is there with big signs up advertising its availability. The trouble is that nobody has come to build factories on it. There is nothing on the derelict land, even though the negative value has been taken off by public expenditure.

As the Minister said, there is a hope that there will be a leisure scheme, a conference centre and a hotel built in parts of docklands. I hope that it happens, but this must be about the tenth time that those things have been proposed for Merseyside. Even in the days well before the development corporation we were told that people were coming to carry out that sort of scheme. What we need from the Government is public expenditure to make sure that kind of thing happens, because it is vital pump-priming.

I say to the people who have urban development corporations in Tyne and Wear, Trafford Park, the Black Country, Teesside and Cardiff: do not be too optimistic. As we have seen from the Government announcement today, there is a little bit of public expenditure, a bit of pump-priming and a lot of window-dressing. Those things will contribute to a small extent to the provision of some facilities, although they will create other problems for local communities of the kind that we have seen in London docklands.

What we really need is mainstream expenditure on housing, education, social services, on cleaning up the environment and on creating new jobs. The Government shy away from that and, having made massive cuts in rate support grant, they set up these development corporations as a substitute, as palliatives. We shall not vote against the extra money, because we are lucky to get any public expenditure out of the Government. However, we say quite clearly that it is too little and it is window-dressing.

The Secretary of State for the Environment in 1981 was the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). Speaking to the Tory party conference he said that the principle of self-help was not applicable to inner-city problems. He said that the Tories must realise the true impact of unemployment. He went on:
